

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

THAT posterity may not be deceived, by the prosperous wickedness of these times, into an opinion, that less than a general combination, and universal apostasy in the whole nation from their religion and allegiance, could, in so short a time, have produced such a total and prodigious alteration and confusion over the whole kingdom; and so the memory of those few, who, out of duty and conscience, have opposed and resisted that torrent, which hath overwhelmed them, may lose the recompense due to their virtue; and, having undergone the injuries and reproaches of this, may not find a vindication in a better age; it will not be unuseful, at least to the curiosity if not the conscience of men, to present to the world a full and clear narration of the grounds, circumstances, and artifices of this rebellion: not only from the time since the flame hath been visible in a civil war, but, looking farther back, from those former passages, accidents, and actions, by which the seed-plots were made and framed, from whence these mischiefs have successively grown to the height they are now at.

And then, though the hand and judgment of God will be very visible, in the infatuating a people (as ripe and prepared for destruction) into all the perverse actions of folly and madness, making the weak to contribute to the designs of the wicked, and suffering even those, by degrees, out of the conscience of their guilt, to grow more wicked than they intended to be; letting the wise to be imposed upon by men of no understanding, and possessing the innocent with laziness and sleep in the most visible article of danger; uniting the ill, though of the most different opinions, divided interests, and distant affections, in a firm and constant league of mischief; and dividing those, whose opinions and interests are the same, into faction and emulation, more pernicious to the public than the treason of the others: whilst the poor people, under pretence of zeal to religion, law, liberty, and parliaments, (words of precious esteem in their just signification,) are furiously hurried into actions introducing atheism, and dissolving all the elements of Christian religion; cancelling all obligations, and destroying all foundations of law and liberty; and rendering, not only the privileges, but very being, of parliaments desperate and impossible: I say, though the immediate finger and wrath of God must be acknowledged in these perplexities and distractions; yet he who shall diligently observe the distempers and conjunctures of time, the ambition, pride, and folly of persons, and the sudden growth of wickedness, from want of care and circumspection in the first impressions, will find all this bulk of misery to have proceeded, and to have been brought upon us, from the same natural causes and means, which have usually attended kingdoms, swoln with long plenty, pride, and excess, towards some signal mortifications, and castigation of Heaven. And it may be, upon the view of the impossibility of foreseeing many things that have happened, and of the necessity of overseeing many other things, we may not yet find the cure so desperate, but that, by God's mercy, the wounds may be again bound up; though no question many must first bleed to death; and then this prospect may not make the future peace less pleasant and durable.

And I have the more willingly induced myself to this unequal task, out of the hope of contributing somewhat to that end: and though a piece of this nature (wherein the infirmities of some, and the malice of others, both things and persons, must be boldly looked upon and mentioned) is not likely to be published at least in the age in which it is writ, yet it may serve to inform myself, and some others, what we are to do, as well as to comfort us in what we have done, and then possibly it may not be very difficult to collect somewhat out of that store, more proper, and not unuseful for the public view. And as I may not be thought altogether an incompetent person for this communication, having been present as a member of parliament in those councils before and till the breaking out of the rebellion, and having since had the honour to be near two great kings in some trust, so I shall perform the same with all faithfulness and ingenuity; with an equal observation of the faults and infirmities of both sides, with their defects and oversights in pursuing their own ends; and shall no otherwise mention small and light occurrences, than as they have been introductions to matters of the greatest moment; nor speak of persons otherwise, than as the mention of their virtues or vices is essential to the work in hand: in which as I shall have the fate to be suspected rather for malice to many, than of flattery to any, so I shall, in truth, preserve myself from the least sharpness, that may proceed from private provocation, or a more public indignation, in the whole observing the rules that a man should, who deserves to be believed.

I shall not then lead any man farther back in this journey, for the discovery of the entrance into these dark ways, than the beginning of this king's reign. For I am not so sharp-sighted as those, who have discerned this rebellion contriving from (if not before) the death of queen Elizabeth, and fomented by several princes and great ministers of state in Christendom, to the time that it brake out. Neither do I look so far back as believing the design to be so long since formed; (they who have observed the several accidents, not capable of being contrived, which have contributed to the several successes, and do know the persons who have been the grand instruments towards this change, of whom there have not been any four of familiarity and trust with each other, will easily absolve them from so much industry and foresight in their mischief;) but that, by viewing the temper, disposition, and habit, of that time, of the court and of the country, we may discern the minds of men prepared, of some to do, and of others to suffer, all that hath since happened; the pride of this man, and the popularity of that; the levity of one, and the morosity of another; the excess of the court in the greatest want, and the parsimony and retention of the country in the greatest plenty; the spirit of craft and subtlety in some, and the rude and unpolished integrity of others, too much despising craft or art; like so many atoms contributing jointly to this mass of confusion now before us.

KING JAMES in the end of March 1625 died, leaving his majesty that now is, engaged in a war with Spain, but unprovided with money to manage it; though it was undertaken by the consent and advice of parliament: the people being naturally enough inclined to the war (having surfeited with the uninterrupted pleasures and plenty of twenty-two years peace) and sufficiently inflamed against the Spaniard; but quickly weary of the charge of it: and therefore, after an unprosperous and chargeable attempt in a voyage by sea upon Cadiz, and as unsuccessful and more unfortunate a one upon France, at the Isle of Rhé, (for some difference had likewise at the same time begotten a war with that prince,) a general peace was shortly concluded with both kingdoms; the exchequer being so exhausted with the debts of king James, the bounty of his majesty that now is, (who, upon his first access to the crown, gave many costly instances of his favour to persons near him,) and the charge of the war upon Spain, and France, that both the known and casual revenue being anticipated, the necessary subsistence of the house-
 1 was unprovided for; and the king on the
 2 driven to those straits for his own support,
 3 any ways were resorted to, and inconveniently
 4 submitted to, for supply; as selling the crown-lands, creating peers for money, and many other particulars, which no access of power or plenty since could repair.

Parliaments were summoned, and again dissolved: and that in the fourth year (after the dissolution of the two former) was determined with a profession and declaration that there should be no more assemblies of that nature expected, and all men inhibited upon the penalty of censure, so much as to speak of a parliament. And here I cannot but let myself loose to say, that no man can shew me a source, from whence these waters of bitterness we now taste have more probably flowed, than from these unseasonable, unskilful, and precipitate dissolutions of parliaments; in which, by an unjust survey of the passion, insolence, and ambition of particular persons, the court measured the temper and affection of the country; and by the same standard the people considered the honour, justice, and piety of the court; and so usually parted, at those sad seasons, with no other respect and charity one toward the other, than accompanies persons who never meant to meet but in their own defence. In which the king had always the disadvantage to harbour persons about him, who, with their utmost industry, information, and malice, improved the faults and infirmities of the court to the people; and again, as much as in them lay, rendered the people suspected, if not odious to the king.

I am not altogether a stranger to the passages of those parliaments, (though I was not a member of them,) having carefully perused the journals of both houses, and familiarly conversed with many who had principal parts in them. And I cannot but wonder at those counsels, which persuaded the courses then taken; the habit and temper of men's minds being, no question, very applicable to the public ends; and those ends being only discredited by the jealousies the people entertained from the manner of the prosecution, that they were other, and worse than in truth they were. It is not to be denied, that there were, in all those parliaments, especially in that of the fourth year, several passages, and distempered speeches of particular persons, not fit for the dignity and honour of those places, and unsuitable to the reverence due to his majesty and his councils. But I do not know any formed act of either house (for neither the remonstrance or votes of the last day were such) that was not agreeable to the wisdom and justice of great courts, upon those extraordinary occasions. And whoever considers the acts of power and injustice in the intervals of parliament, will not be much scandalized at the warmth and vivacity of those meetings.

In the second parliament there was a mention, and intention declared, of granting five subsidies, a proportion (how contemptible soever in respect of the pressures now every day imposed) never before heard of in parliament. And that meeting being, upon very unpopular and unpalatable reasons, immediately dissolved, those five subsidies were exacted, throughout the whole kingdom, with the same rigour, as if, in truth, an act had passed to that purpose. Very many gentlemen of prime quality, in all the several counties of England, were, for refusing to pay the same, committed to prison, with great rigour and extraordinary circumstances. And could it be imagined, that these men would meet again in a free convention of parliament, without a sharp and severe expostulation, and inquisition into their own right, and the power that had imposed upon that right? And yet all these provocations, and many other, almost of as large an extent, produced no other resentment, than the petition of right, (of no prejudice to the crown,) which was likewise purchased at the price of five subsidies more, and, in a very short time after that supply granted, that parliament was likewise, with strange circumstances of passion on all sides, dissolved.

The abrupt and ungracious breaking off the two first parliaments was wholly imputed to the duke of Buckingham; and of the third, principally to the lord Weston, then lord high treasurer of England; both in respect of the great power and interest they then had in the affections of his majesty, and for that the time of the dissolutions happened to be, when some charges and accusations were preparing, and ready to be preferred against those two great persons. And therefore the envy and hatred, that attended them thereupon, was insupportable, and was visibly the cause of the murder of the first, (stabbed to the heart by the hand of an obscure villain, upon the mere impious pretence of his being odious to the parliament,) and made, no doubt, so great an impression upon the understanding and nature of the other, that, by degrees, he lost that temper and serenity of mind he had been before master of, and which was most fit to have accompanied him in his weighty employments: insomuch as, out of indignation to find himself worse used than he deserved, he cared less to deserve well, than he had done; and insensibly grew into that public hatred, that rendered him less useful to the service that he only intended.

I wonder less at the errors of this nature in the duke of Buckingham; who, having had a most generous education in courts, was utterly ignorant of the ebbs and floods of popular councils, and of the winds that move those waters; and could not, without the spirit of indignation, find himself, in the space of a few weeks, without any visible cause intervening, from the greatest height of popular estimation that any person hath ascended to, (insomuch as sir Edward Coke blasphemously called him our Saviour,) by the same breath thrown down to the depth of calumny and reproach. I say, it is no marvel, (besides that he was naturally to follow such counsel as was given him,) that he could think of no better way to be freed of the inconveniences and troubles the passions of those meetings gave him, than to dissolve them, and prevent their coming together: and that, when they seemed to neglect the public peace, out of animosity to him, that he intended his own ease and security in the first place, and easily believed the public might be otherwise provided for, by more intent and dispassionate councils. But that the other, the lord Weston, who had been very much and very popularly conversant in those conventions, who exactly knew the frame and constitution of the kingdom, the temper of the people, the extent of the courts of law, and the jurisdiction of parliaments, which at that time had never committed any excess of jurisdiction, (modesty and moderation in words never was, nor ever will be, observed in popular councils, whose foundation is liberty of speech,) should believe, that the union, peace, and plenty of the kingdom could be preserved without parliaments, or that the passion and distemper gotten and received into parliaments could be removed and reformed by the more passionate breaking and dissolving them; or that that course would not inevitably prove the most pernicious to himself, is as much my wonder, as any thing that hath since happened.

There is a protection very gracious and just, which princes owe to their servants, when, in obedience to their just commands, upon extraordinary and necessary occasions, in the execution of their trusts, they swerve from the strict rule of the law, which, without that mercy, would be penal to them. In any case, it is as legal (the law presuming it will always be done upon great reason) for the king to pardon, as for the party to accuse, and the judge to condemn. But for the supreme power to interpose, and shelter an accused servant from answering, does not only seem an obstruction of justice, and lay an imputation upon the prince, of being privy to the offence; but leaves so great a scandal upon the party himself, that he is generally concluded guilty of whatsoever he is charged; which is commonly more than the worst man ever deserved. And it is worthy the observation, that, as no innocent man who made his defence ever suffered in those times by judgment of parliament; so many guilty persons, and against whom the spirit of the time went as high, by the wise managing their defence, have been freed from their accusers, not only without censure, but without reproach; as the bishop of Lincoln, then lord keeper, sir H. Marten, and sir H. Spiller; men, in their several degrees, as little beholden to the charity of that time, as any men since. Whereas scarce a man, who, with industry and skill, laboured to keep himself from being accused, or by power to stop or divert the course of proceeding, escaped without some signal mark of infamy or prejudice. And the reason is clear; for besides that, after the first storm, there is some compassion naturally attends men like to be in misery; and besides the latitude of judging in those places, whereby there is room for kindness and affection, and collateral considerations to interpose; the truth is, those accusations (to which this man contributes his malice, that his wit, all men what they please, and most upon hearsay, with a kind of uncharitable delight of making the charge as heavy as may be) are commonly stuffed with many odious generals, that the proofs seldom make good: and then a man is no sooner found less guilty than he is expected, but he is concluded more innocent than he is; and it is thought but a just reparation for the reproach that he deserved not, to free him from the censure he deserved. So that, very probably, those two noble persons had been happy, if they had stoutly submitted to the proceedings [which] were designed against them; and, without question, it had been of sovereign use to the king, if, in those peaceable times, parliaments had been taught to know their own bounds, by being suffered to proceed as far as they could go; by which the extent of their power would quickly have been manifested: from whence no inconvenience of moment could have proceeded; the house of commons never then pretending to the least part of judicature, or exceeding the known verge of their own privileges; the house of peers observing the rules of law and equity in their judgments, and proceeding deliberately upon clear testimony and evidence of matter of fact; and the king retaining the sole power of pardoning, and receiving the whole profit of all penalties and judgments; and indeed having so great an influence upon the body of the peerage, that it was never known that any person of honour was severely censured in that house, (before this present parliament,) who was not either immediately prosecuted by the court, or in evident disfavour there; in which, it may be, (as it usually falls out,) some doors were opened, at which inconveniences to the crown have got in, that were not then enough weighed and considered.

But the course of exempting men from prosecution, by dissolving of parliaments, made the power of parliaments much more formidable, as conceived to be without limit; since the sovereign power seemed to be compelled (as unable otherwise to set bounds to their proceedings) to that rough cure, and to determine their being, because it could not determine their jurisdiction. Whereas, if they had been frequently summoned, and seasonably dissolved, after their wisdom in applying medicines and cures, as well as their industry in discovering diseases, had been discerned, they would easily have been applied to the uses for which they were first instituted; and been of no less esteem with the crown, than of veneration with the people. And so I shall conclude this digression, which I conceived not unseasonable for this place, nor upon this occasion, and return to the time when that brisk resolution was taken of totally declining those conventions; all men being inhibited (as I said before) by proclamation at the dissolution of the parliament in the fourth year, so much as to mention or speak as if a parliament should be called.

And here it will give much light to that which follows, if we take a view of the state of the court and of the council at that time, by which, as in a mirror, we may best see the face of that time, and the affections and temper of the people in general.

And for the better taking this prospect, we will take a survey of the person of that great man, the duke of Buckingham, (who was so barbarously murdered at this time,) whose influence had been unfortunate in the public affairs, and whose death produced a change in all the counsels. The duke was indeed a very extraordinary person; and never any man, in any age, nor, I believe, in any country or nation, rose, in so short a time, to so much greatness of honour, fame, and fortune, upon no other advantage or recommendation, than of the beauty and gracefulness and becomingness of his person. And I have not the least purpose of undervaluing his good parts and qualities, (of which there will be occasion shortly to give some testimony,) when I say, that his first introduction into favour was purely from the handsomeness of his person.

He was the younger son of sir George Villiers, of Brookesby, in the county of Leicester; a family of an ancient extraction, even from the time of the conquest, and transported then with the conqueror out of Normandy, where the family hath still remained, and still continues with lustre. After sir George's first marriage, in which he had two or three sons, and some daughters, who shared an ample inheritance from him; by a second marriage, with a young lady of the family of the Beaumonts, he had this gentleman, and two other sons and a daughter, who all came afterwards to be raised to great titles and dignities. George, the eldest son of this second bed, was, after the death of his father, by the singular affection and care of his mother, who enjoyed a good jointure in the account of that age, well brought up; and, for the improvement of his education, and giving an ornament to his hopeful person, he was by her sent into France; where he spent two or three years in attaining the language, and in learning the exercises of riding and dancing; in the last of which he excelled most men, and returned into England by the time he was twenty-one years old.

King James reigned at that time; and though he was a prince of more learning and knowledge than any other of that age, and really delighted more in books, and in the conversation of learned men; yet, of all wise men living, he was the most delighted and taken with handsome persons, and with fine clothes. He began to be weary of his favourite, the earl of Somerset, who was the only favourite that kept that post so long, without any public reproach from the people: and, by the instigation and wickedness of his wife, he became, at least, privy to a horrible murder, that exposed him to the utmost severity of the law, (the poisoning of sir Thomas Overbury,) upon which both he and his wife were condemned to die, after a trial by their peers; and many persons of quality were executed for the same.

Whilst this was in agitation, and before the utmost discovery was made, Mr. Villiers appeared in court, and drew the king's eyes upon him. There were enough in the court enough angry and incensed against Somerset, for being what themselves desired to be, and especially for being a Scotsman, and ascending, in so short a time, from being a page, to the height he was then at, to contribute all they could to promote the one, that they might throw out the other: which being easily brought to pass, by the proceeding of the law upon his crime aforesaid, the other found very little difficulty in rendering himself gracious to the king, whose nature and disposition was very flowing in affection towards persons so adorned. Insomuch that, in few days after his first appearance in court, he was made cupbearer to the king; by which he was naturally to be much in his presence, and so admitted to that conversation and discourse, with which that prince always abounded at his meals.

And his inclination to his new cupbearer disposed him to administer frequent occasions of discoursing of the court of France, and the transactions there, with which he had been so lately acquainted, that he could pertinently enlarge upon that subject, to the king's great delight, and to the reconciling the esteem and value of all the standers by likewise to him: which was a thing the king was well pleased with. He acted very few weeks upon this stage, when he mounted higher; and, being knighted, without any other qualification, he was at the same time made gentleman of the bedchamber, and knight of the order of the garter; and in a short time (very short for such a prodigious ascent) he was made a baron, a viscount, an earl, a marquis, and became lord high admiral of England, lord warden of the cinque ports; master of the horse, and entirely disposed of all the graces of the king, in conferring all the honours and all the offices of the three kingdoms, without a rival; in dispensing whereof, he was guided more by the rules of appetite than of judgment; and so exalted almost all of his own numerous family and dependants, who had no other virtue or merit than their alliance to him, which equally offended the ancient nobility, and the people of all conditions, who saw the flowers of the crown every day fading and withered; whilst the demesnes and revenue thereof was sacrificed to the enriching a private family, (how well soever originally extracted,) not heard of before ever to the nation; and the expenses of the court so vast and unlimited by the old good rules of economy, that they had a sad prospect of that poverty and necessity, which afterwards befell the crown, almost to the ruin of it.

Many were of opinion, that king James, before his death, grew weary of his favourite; and that, if he had lived, he would have deprived him at least of his large and unlimited power. And this imagination prevailed with some men, as the lord keeper Lincoln, the earl of Middlesex, lord high treasurer of England, and other gentlemen of name, though not in so high stations, that they had the courage to withdraw from their absolute dependence upon the duke, and to make some other essays, which proved to the ruin of every one of them; there appearing no marks, or evidence, that the king did really lessen his affection to him, to the hour of his death. On the contrary, as he created him duke of Buckingham in his absence, whilst he was with the prince in Spain; so, after his return, he executed the same authority in conferring all favours and graces, and revenging himself upon those, who had manifested any unkindness towards him. And yet, notwithstanding all this, if that king's nature had equally disposed him to pull down, as to build and erect, and if his courage and severity in punishing and reforming had been as great as his generosity and inclination was to oblige, it is not to be doubted, but that he would have withdrawn his affection from the duke entirely, before his death; which those persons, who were admitted to any privacy with [him,] and were not in the confidence of the other, (for before those he knew well how to dissemble,) had reason enough to expect.

For it is not to be doubted, that the king was never well pleased with the duke, after the prince's going into Spain; which was infinitely against his will, and contrived wholly by the duke: who, out of envy, that the earl of Bristol should have the sole management of so great an affair (as hitherto that treaty had been wholly managed by him in Spain, where he was now extraordinary ambassador, and all particulars agreed upon,) had one day insinuated to the prince the common misfortune of princes, that in so substantial a part of their happiness in this world, as depended upon their marriage, themselves had never any part, but must receive only an account from others of the nature, and humour, and beauty of the ladies they were to marry; and those reports seldom proceeded from persons totally uninterested, at least uninclined from the parts they had acted towards such preparations. From hence [he] discoursed how gallant and how brave a thing it would be, for his highness to make a journey into

Spain, and to fetch home his mistress; that it would put an end presently to all those formalities, which, (though all substantial matters were agreed upon already,) according to the style of that court, and the slow progress in all things of ceremony, might yet long retard the infanta's voyage into England many months; all which would be in a moment removed by his own presence; that it would be such an obligation to the infanta herself, as she could never enough value or requite; and being a respect never paid by any other prince, upon the like addresses, could proceed only from the high regard and reverence he had for her person; that in the great affair that only remained undetermined, and was not entirely yielded to, though under a very civil deliberation, which was the restoring the palatinate, it was very probable, that the king of Spain himself might choose, in the instant, to gratify his personal interposition, which, in a treaty with an ambassador, might be drawn out in length, or attended with overtures of recompense by some new concessions, which would create new difficulties: however, that the mediation could not but be frankly undertaken by the infanta herself, who would ambitiously make it her work to pay a part of her great debt to the prince; and that he might with her, and by her, present to his majesty the entire peace and restitution of his family, which by no other human means could be brought to pass.

These discourses made so deep impression upon the mind and spirit of the prince, (whose nature was inclined to adventures,) that he was transported with the thought of it, and most impatiently solicitous to bring it to pass. The greatest difficulty that was in view was, how they might procure the king's consent, who was very quick-sighted in discerning difficulties and raising objections, and very slow in mastering them, and untying the knots he had made: in a word, he knew not how to wrestle with desperate contingencies, and so abhorred the being entangled in such. This was to be first attempted by the prince himself, by communicating it to the king, as his earnest desire and suit, with this circumstance; that since his doing or not doing what he most desired, depended wholly and entirely upon his majesty's own approbation and command, that he would vouchsafe to promise not to communicate the thing proposed, before he had first taken his own resolution; and that this condition should be first humbly insisted on, before the substantial point should be communicated; and so, this approach being first made; the success and prosecution was to be left to the duke's credit, dexterity, and cultivation. All things being thus concerted between his highness and the duke, (and this the beginning of an entire confidence between them, after a long time of declared jealousy and displeasure on the prince's part, and occasion enough administered on the other,) they shortly found a fit opportunity (and there were seasons when that king was to be approached more hopefully than in others) to make their address together. And his majesty cheerfully consented to the condition, and being well pleased that all should depend upon his will, frankly promised that he would not, in any degree, communicate to any person the matter, before he had taken, and communicated to them, his own resolution.

The prince then, upon his knees, declared his suit and very importunate request, the duke standing a long time by, without saying a word, and until the king discoursed the whole matter to the prince, with less passion than they expected, and then looked upon the duke, as inclined to hear what he would say; who spoke nothing to the point, whether in point of prudence counsellable, or not; but enlarged upon the infinite obligation his majesty would confer upon the prince, by his concession of the violent passion his highness was transported with; and, after many exalted expressions to that purpose, concluded, that he doubted that his majesty refusing to grant the prince this his humble request would make a deep impression upon his spirits, and peace of mind; and that he would, he feared, look upon it as the greatest misfortune and affliction that could befall him in this world. The prince then taking the opportunity, from the good temper he saw his father in, to enlarge upon these two points, which he knew were most important in the king's own wishes and judgment, that this expedient would put a quick end to this treaty, which could not be continued after his arrival in that court; but that his marriage must presently ensue, which, he well knew, the king did the most impatiently desire of all blessings in this world: he said likewise, he would undertake (and he could not but be believed from the reasonableness of it) that his presence would in a moment determine the restitution of the palatinate to his brother and sister; which was the second thing the king longed most passionately to see before he should leave this world.

These discourses, urged with all the artifice and address imaginable, so far wrought upon and prevailed with the king, that, with less hesitation than his nature was accustomed to, and much less than was agreeable to his great wisdom, he gave his approbation, and promised that the prince should make the journey he was so much inclined to: whether he did not upon the sudden comprehend the consequences, which would naturally attend such a rash undertaking, or whether he the less considered them, because the provisions, which must be made for such a journey, both with reference to the expense and security of it, would take up much time, and could not be done in such a secret way, but that the council itself might be resumed again, when new measures should be taken. But this imagination was too reasonable not to be foreseen by them; and so they had provided themselves accordingly. And therefore, as soon as they had the king's promise upon the main, they told him, the security of such a design depended on the expedition, without which there could be no secrecy observed, or hoped for; that, if it were deferred till such a fleet could be made ready, and such an equipage prepared, as might be fit for the prince of Wales, so much time would be spent, as would disappoint the principal ends of the journey: if they should send for a pass to France, the ceremony in the asking and granting it, and that which would flow from it, in his passage through that kingdom, would be at least liable to the same objection of delay: besides that, according to the mysteries and intrigues of state, such a pass could not in point of security be reasonably depended upon; and therefore they had thought of an expedient, which would avoid all inconveniences and hazards; and that it should be executed before it should be suspected: that it had never hitherto been, in the least degree, consulted but between themselves, (which was really true;) and therefore, if they now undertook the journey only with two servants, who should not know any thing till the moment they were to depart, they might easily pass through France, before they should be missed at Whitehall: which was not hard to be conceived, and so with the less disquisition was consented to by the king: and the farther deliberation of what was more to be done both in matter and manner, and the nomination of the persons who should attend them, and the time for their departure, was deferred to the consultation of the next day.

When the king, in his retirement, and by himself, came to revolve what had been so loosely consulted before, as he had a wonderful sagacity in such reflections, a thousand difficulties and dangers occurred to him, and so many precipices, which could hardly be avoided in such a journey. Besides those considerations, which the violent affection of a father to his only son suggested to him, he thought how ill an influence it might have on his people, too much disposed to murmur and complain of the least inadvertence, and that they looked upon the prince as the son of the kingdom, as well as his natural son. He considered the reputation he should lose with all foreign princes, (especially if any ill accident should happen,) by so much departing from his dignity in exposing the immediate heir of the crown, his only son, to all the dangers, and all the jealousies, which particular malice, or that fathomless abyss of reason of state, might prepare and contrive against him; and then, in how desperate a condition himself and his kingdoms should remain, if the prince miscarried by such an unparalleled weakness of his, contrary to the light of his understanding, as well as the current of his affection.

These reflections were so terrible to him, that they robbed him of all peace and quiet of mind; insomuch as when the prince and duke came to him about the dispatch, he fell into a great passion of tears, and told them that he was undone, and that it would break his heart, if they pursued their resolution; that, upon a true and dispassionate disquisition he had made with himself, he was abundantly convinced, that, besides the almost inevitable hazards of the prince's person, with whom his life was bound up, and besides the entire loss of the affections of his people, which would unavoidably attend this rash action, he foresaw it would ruin the whole design, and irrecoverably break the match. For whereas all those particulars, upon which he could positively and of right insist, were fully granted, (for that, which concerned the prince elector, who had unexcusably, and directly against his advice, incurred the ban of the empire in an imperial diet, must be wrought off by mediation and treaty, could not be insisted on in justice,) nor could Spain make any new demands, all the overtures they had made being adjusted; the prince should no sooner arrive at Madrid, than all the articles of the treaty should be laid aside, and new matters be proposed, which had not been yet mentioned, and could never be consented to by him: that the treaty of this marriage, how well soever received, and how much soever desired by the king and his chief ministers, was in no degree acceptable to the Spanish nation in general, and less to the court of Rome, where, though the new pope seemed more inclined to grant the dispensation than his predecessor had been, it was plain enough, that it proceeded only from the apprehension he had to displease the king of Spain, not that he was less averse from the match, it having been always believed, both in Spain and in Rome, that this marriage was to be attended with a full repeal of all the penal laws against the catholics, and a plenary toleration of the exercise of that religion in England, which they now saw concluded, without any signal or real benefit or advantage to them. And therefore they might expect, and be confident, that when they had the person of the prince of Wales in their hands, the king of Spain (though in his own nature and inclinations full of honour and justice) would be even compelled by his clergy (who had always a great influence upon the counsels of that kingdom) and the importunities from Rome, who would tell him, that God had now put it into his hand to advance the catholic cause, to make new demands for those of that religion here; which, though he could never consent to, would at best interpose such delays in the marriage, that he should never live to see it brought to pass, nor probably to see his son return again out of Spain. Then he put the duke in mind (whom he hitherto believed only to comply with the prince to oblige him, after a long alienation from his favour) how inevitable his ruin must be, by the effect of this counsel, how ungracious he was already with the people, and how many enemies he had amongst the greatest persons of the nobility, who would make such use of this occasion, that it would not be in his majesty's power to protect him. And he concluded with the disorder and passion, with which he began, with sighs and tears, to conjure them, that they would no more press him to give his consent to a thing so contrary to his reason, and understanding, and interest, the execution whereof would break his heart, and that they would give over any further pursuit of it.

The prince and the duke took not the pains to answer any of the reasons his majesty had insisted on; his highness only putting him in mind of the promise he had made to him the day before, which was so sacred, that he hoped he would not violate it; which would make him never think more of marriage. The duke, who better knew what kind of arguments were of prevalence with him, treated him more rudely; told him, nobody could believe any thing he said, when he retracted so soon the promise he had so solemnly made; that he plainly discerned, that it proceeded from another breach of his word, in communicating with some rascal, who had furnished him with those pitiful reasons he had alleged; and he doubted not but he should hereafter know who his counsellor had been: that if he receded from what he had promised, it would be such a disobligation upon the prince, who had set his heart now upon the journey, after his majesty's approbation, that he could never forget it, nor forgive any man who had been the cause of it.

The prince, who had always expressed the highest duty and reverence towards the king, by his humble and importunate entreaty, and the duke by his rougher dialect, in the end prevailed so far,

(after his majesty had passionately, and with many oaths, renounced the having communicated the matter with any person living,) that the debate was again resumed upon the journey, which they earnestly desired might not be deferred, but that they might take their leaves of the king within two days, in which they would have all things ready which were necessary, his highness pretending to hunt at Theobald's, and the duke to take physic at Chelsea.

They told him, that being to have only two more in their company, as was before resolved, they had thought (if he approved them) upon sir Francis Cottington and Endymion Porter, who, though they might safely, should not be trusted with the secret, till they were even ready to be embarked. The persons were both grateful to the king, the former having been long his majesty's agent in the court of Spain, and was now secretary to the prince; the other, having been bred in Madrid, and after many years attendance upon the duke, was now one of the bedchamber to the prince: so that his majesty cheerfully approved the election they had made, and wished it might be presently imparted to them; saying, that many things would occur to them, as necessary to the journey, that they two would never think of; and took that occasion to send for sir Francis Cottington to come presently to him, (whilst the other two remained with him,) who, being of custom waiting in the outward rooms, was quickly brought in; whilst the duke whispered the prince in the ear, that Cottington would be against the journey, and his highness answered he durst not.

The king told him, that he had always been an honest man, and therefore he was now to trust him in an affair of the highest importance, which he was not upon his life to disclose to any man alive; then said to him, "Cottington, here is baby Charles and 'Stenny,' (an appellation he always used of and towards the duke,) 'who have a great mind to go by post into Spain, to fetch home the infanta, and will have but two more in their company, and have chosen you for one. What think you of the journey?'" He often protested, that when he heard the king, he fell into such a trembling, that he could hardly speak. But when the king commanded him to answer him, what he thought of the journey, he replied, that he could not think well of it, and that he believed it would render all that had been done towards the match fruitless: for that Spain would no longer think themselves obliged by those articles, but that, when they had the prince in their hands, they would make new overtures, which they believed more advantageous to them; amongst which they must look for many which would concern religion, and the exercise of it in England. Upon which the king threw himself upon his bed, and said, "I told you this before," and fell into new passion and lamentation, that he was undone, and should lose baby Charles.

There appeared displeasure and anger enough in the countenances both of the prince and duke; the latter saying, that as soon as the king sent for him, he whispered the prince in the ear, that he would be against it; that he knew his pride well enough; and that, because he had not been first advised with, he was resolved to dislike it; and thereupon he reproached Cottington with all possible bitterness of words; told him the king asked him only of the journey, and which would be the best way, of which he might be a competent counsellor, having made the way so often by post : but that he had the presumption to give his advice upon matter of state, and against his master, without being called to it, which he should repent as long as he lived ; with a thousand new reproaches, which put the poor king into a new agony on the behalf of a servant, who he foresaw would suffer for answering him honestly. Upon which he said, with some commotion, "Nay, by God, Stenny, you are very much to blame to use him so. He answered me directly to the question I asked him, and very honestly and wisely : and yet you know he said no more than "I told you, before he was called in." However, after all this passion on both parts, the king yielded, and the journey was at that very conference agreed upon, and all directions given accordingly to sir Francis Cottington ; the king having now plainly discovered, that the whole intrigue was originally contrived by the duke, and so violently pursued by his spirit and impetuosity.

The manner, circumstances, and conclusion of that voyage, with the rare accidents which happened in it, will no doubt be at large remembered by whosoever shall have the courage to write the transactions of that time, with that integrity he ought to do : in which it will manifestly appear, how much of the prophet was in the wisdom of the king ; and that that designed marriage, which had been so many years in treaty, even from the death of prince Harry, and so near concluded, was solely broken by that journey : which, with the passages before mentioned, king James never forgave the duke of Buckingham ; but retained as sharp a memory of it as his nature could contain.

This indisposition in the king towards the duke was exceedingly increased and aggravated upon and after the prince's return out of Spain. For though it brought infinite joy and delight to his majesty, which he expressed in all imaginable transportation, and was the argument of the loudest and most universal rejoicing over the whole kingdom, that the nation had ever been acquainted with ; in which the duke had so full a harvest, that the impudence and presumption (to say no more) of carrying the prince into Spain was totally forgotten, or forgotten with any reference to him, and the high merit and inestimable obligation, in bringing him home, was remembered, magnified, and celebrated by all men in all places ; yet the king was wonderfully disquieted, when he found (which he had not before their return suspected) that the prince was totally alienated from all thoughts of, or inclination to, the marriage ; and that they were resolved to break it, with or without his approbation or consent. And in this the duke resumed the same impetuosity he had so much indulged to himself in the debate of the journey into Spain.

The king had, upon the prince's return, issued out writs to call a parliament, which was in the twenty-first year of his reign, thinking it necessary, with relation to the perplexities he was in, for the breach of this match with Spain, (which he foresaw must ensue,) and the sad condition of his only daughter in Germany, with her numerous issue, to receive their grave advice. By the time the parliament could meet, the prince's entire confidence being still reposed in the duke, as the king's seemed to be, the duke had wrought himself into the very great esteem and confidence of the principal members of both houses of parliament, who were most like to be the leading men, and had all a desire to have as much reputation in the court, as they had in the country. It was very reasonably thought necessary, that as the king would, at the opening of the parliament, make mention of the treaty with Spain, and more at large of his daughter's being driven out of the palatinate, which would require their assistance and aid ; so that the prince and duke should afterwards, to one or both houses, as occasion should be offered, make a relation of what had passed in Spain, especially concerning the palatinate : that so putting the houses into some method and order of their future debate, they would be more easily regulated, than if they were in the beginning left to that liberty, which they naturally affected, and from which they would not be restrained, but in such a manner as would be grateful to themselves.

Things being thus concerted, after the houses had been three or four days together, (for in that time some days were always spent in the formality of naming committees, and providing for common occurrences, before they made an entrance upon more solemn debates,) the prince began to speak of the Spanish affairs, and of his own journey thither ; and forgot not to mention the duke with more than ordinary affection. Whereupon it was thought fit, that the whole affair, which was likewise to be the principal subject matter of all their consultations, should be stated and enlarged upon, in a conference between the two houses, which his highness and the duke were desired to manage. How little notice soever any body else could take of the change, the duke himself too well knew the hearty resentment the king had of what had passed, and of the affection he still had for the Spanish treaty ; and therefore he had [done], and resolved still to do, all he could, to make himself grateful to the parliament, and popular amongst the people, who he knew had always detested the match with Spain, or in truth any alliance with that nation.

So when, at the conference, the prince had made a short introduction to the business, and said some very kind things of the duke, of his wonderful care of him whilst he was in Spain, and the great dexterity he used in getting him away, he referred the whole relation to him ; who made "the true ground" of the prince's journey into Spain, which he well knew had begot such a terrible panting in the hearts of all good Englishmen, had been only to make a clear discovery of the sincerity of the Spaniard, and, if his intention were real, to put a speedy end to it by marrying the lady upon the place : if he found it otherwise, to put his father and himself into liberty to dispose of himself in some other place. That the ambassador, in whose hands that great affair was solely managed, when in one dispatch he wrote that all was concluded, in the next used to give an account of new difficulties, and new demands : and, when all things were adjusted at Madrid, some unexpected scruples discovered themselves at Rome, with which the councils in Spain seemed to be surprised, and appeared to be confounded, and not to know what to say. These ebbs and floods made the prince apprehend, that the purpose was to amuse us, whilst they had other designs in secret agitation. And thereupon, that his highness had prevailed with his father (how unwilling soever) to permit him to make that journey, that he might make that useful discovery, which could not be otherwise made in any seasonable time.

"That they no sooner came to Madrid, than they discovered (though the prince was treated with all the respect due to his greatness, and the obligation he had laid upon that nation) that there had never been any real purpose that the infanta should be given to him: that, during so long an abode as his highness made there, they had never procured the dispensation from Rome, which they might easily have done: and that, at last, upon the death of the pope, Gregory XV, the whole process was to begin again, and would be transacted with the formalities, which they should find necessary to their other affairs. That, instead of proceeding upon the articles, which had been pretended to be concluded, they urged nothing but new demands, and in matters of religion so peremptorily, that the principal clergymen, and the most eminent of that king's preachers, had frequent conferences with the prince, to persuade him to change his religion, and become a catholic. And, in order to move him the more successfully thereunto, they procured the pope to write a letter himself to his highness, putting him in mind of the religion of his ancestors and progenitors, and conjuring him to return to the same faith: but that it had pleased God not only to give the prince a constant and unshakable heart in his religion, but such wonderful abilities to defend the same in his discourse and arguments, that they stood amazed to hear him, and upon the matter confessed, that they were not able to answer him.

"That they would not suffer the prince to confer with, or so much as to speak to hardly, and very rarely to see his mistress, who they pretended he should forthwith marry. That they could never obtain any better answer in the business of the palatinate, than that the restoring it was not in the power of that king, though it had been taken by the sole power of Spain, and the Spanish army, under the command of the marquis Spinola, who was then in the entire possession of it: but that his catholic majesty would use his interposition, with all the credit he had with the emperor and duke of Bavaria, without whose joint consent it could not be done, and whose consent he hoped to obtain: but that he was well assured, that there was no more real intention in that point of restitution, than in the other of the marriage; and that the palatinate must not be looked to be recovered any other way than by force, which would easily bring it to pass."

Throughout his whole discourse he made frequent reflections upon the earl of Bristol, as if he very well knew the Spaniards' purposes in the whole, and concurred with them in it. "That he was so much troubled when he first saw the prince, who alighted at his house, that he could not contain himself, but wished that his highness were at home again; that he had afterwards, when he found that his highness liked the infanta, persuaded him in private that he would become a catholic; and that, without changing his religion, it would not be possible ever to compass that marriage."

He told them, "That the king had sent for the earl to return home, where he should be called to account for all his miscarriages." Whereas in truth the king had recalled him rather to assist him against the duke, than to expose him to his malice and fury; his majesty having a great esteem of that earl's fidelity to him, and of his great abilities.

The conference ended in a wonderful applause, in both houses, of the prince and duke's behaviour and carriage throughout the affair, and in a hasty resolution to dissuade the king from entertaining any farther motions towards the match, and frankly and resolutely to enter into a war with Spain; towards the carrying on of which they raised great mountains of promises, and, prevailing in the first, never remembered to make good the latter; which too often falls out in such counsels.

When king James was informed of what the duke had so confidently avowed, for which he had no authority, or the least direction from him, and a great part whereof himself knew to be untrue; and that he had advised an utter breach of the treaty, and to enter upon a war with Spain, he was infinitely offended; so that he wanted only a resolute and brisk counsellor to assist him in destroying him: and such a one he promised himself in the arrival of the earl of Bristol, whom he expected every day.

He had another exception against the duke, which touched him as near, and in which he enlarged himself much more. Lionel Cranfeild, who, though extracted from a gentleman's family, had been bred in the city, and, being a man of great wit and understanding in all the mysteries of trade, had found means to work himself into the good opinion and favour of the duke of Buckingham; and having shortly after married a near ally of the duke's, with wonderful expedition was made a privy-counsellor, master of the wardrobe, master of the wards, and, without parting with any of these, was now become lord high treasurer of England, and earl of Middlesex, and had in truth gained so much credit with the king, (being in truth a man of great parts and notable dexterity), that, during the duke's absence in Spain, he was not only negligent in the issuing out such sums of money as were necessary to the defraying those unlimited expenses, and to correspond with him with that deference he had used to do, but had the courage to dispute his commands, and to appeal to the king, whose ear was always inclined to him, and in whom he began to believe himself so far fastened, that he should not stand in need of the future support of the favourite. And of all this the duke could not be without ample information, as well from his own creatures, who were near enough to observe, as from others; who, caring for neither of them, were more scandalized at so precipitate a promotion of a person of such an education, and whom they had long known so much their inferior, though it could not be denied, that he filled the places he held with great abilities.

The duke no sooner found the parliament disposed to a good opinion of him, and being well assured of the prince's fast kindness, than he projected the ruin of this bold rival of his, of whom he saw clearly enough that the king had so good an opinion, that it would not be in his sole power to crush him, as he had done others in the same and as high a station. And so he easily procured some leading men in the house of commons, to cause an impeachment for several corruptions and misdemeanours to be sent up to the house of peers against that great minister, whom they had so lately known their equal in that house; which (besides their natural inclination to those kinds of executions) disposed them with great alacrity to the prosecution. The wise king knew well enough the ill consequence that must attend such an activity; and that it would shake his own authority in the choice of his own ministers, when they should find, that their security did not depend solely upon his own protection: which breach upon his kingly power was so much without a precedent, (except one unhappy one made three years before, to gratify likewise a private displeasure,) that the like had not been practised in some hundred of years, and never in such a case as this.

When this prosecution was first entered upon, and that the king clearly discerned that it was contrived by the duke, and that he had likewise prevailed with the prince to be well pleased with it; his majesty sent for them, and with much warmth and passion dissuaded them from appearing farther in it; and conjured them "to use all their interest and authority to restrain it, as such a wound to the crown, that would not be easily healed." And when he found the duke unmoved by all the considerations, and arguments, and commands he had offered, he said, in great choler, "By God, Stenny, you are a fool, and will shortly repent this folly, and will find, that, in this fit of popularity, you are making a rod, with which you will be scourged yourself." And turning in some anger to the prince, told him, "That he would live to have his bellyfull of parliaments: and that when he should be dead, he would have too much cause to remember, how much he had contributed to the weakening of the crown, by this precedent he was now so fond of;" intending as well the engaging the parliament in the war, as the prosecution of the earl of Middlesex.

But the duke's power (supported by the prince's countenance) was grown so great in the two houses, that it was in vain for the king to interpose; and so (notwithstanding so good a defence made by the earl, that he was absolved from any notorious crime by the impartial opinion of many of those who heard all the evidence) he was at last condemned in a great fine to a long and strict imprisonment, and never to sit in parliament during his life: a clause of such a nature as was never before found in any judgment of parliament, and, in truth, not to be inflicted upon any peer but by attainder.

And how alienated soever the king's affection was in truth from the duke, upon these three provocations; 1. The prince's journey into Spain; 2. The engaging the parliament to break the match and treaty with Spain, and to make a war against that crown; and, 3. The sacrificing the earl of Middlesex in such a manner, upon his own animosity; yet he was so far from thinking fit to manifest it, (except in whispers to very few men,) that he was prevailed with to restrain the earl of Bristol upon his first arrival, without permitting him to come into his presence, which he had positively promised, and resolved to do; and in the end suffered his attorney general to exhibit a charge of high treason, in his majesty's name, against the said earl, who was thereupon committed to the Tower; but so little dejected with it, that he answered the articles with great steadiness and unconcernedness, and exhibited another charge of high treason against the duke in many particulars.

And in this order and method the war was hastily entered into against Spain, and a new treaty set on foot for the prince of Wales with the daughter of France; which was quickly concluded, though not executed till after the death of king James; who, in the spring following, after a short indisposition by the gout, fell into a quartan ague, which, meeting many humours in a fat, unwieldy body of [fifty-eight] years old, in four or five fits carried him out of the world. After whose death many scandalous and libellous discourses were raised, without the least colour or ground; as appeared upon the strictest and malicious examination that could be made, long after, in a time of license, when nobody was afraid of offending majesty, and when prosecuting the highest reproaches and contumelies against the royal family was held very meritorious.

Upon the death of king James, Charles prince of Wales succeeded to the crown, with as universal a joy in the people as can be imagined, and in a conjuncture, when all the other parts of Christendom, being engaged in war, were very solicitous for his friendship; and the more, because he had already discovered an activity, that was not like to suffer him to sit still. The duke continued in the same degree of favour at the least with the son, which he had enjoyed so many years under the father. Which was a rare felicity; seldom known, and in which the expectation of very many was exceedingly disappointed; who, knowing the great jealousy and indignation that the prince had heretofore had against the duke, insomuch as he was once very near striking him, expected that he would now remember that insolence, of which he then so often complained; without considering the opportunity the duke had, by the conversation with the prince, during his journey into Spain, (which was so grateful to him,) and whilst he was there, to wipe out the memory of all former oversights, by making them appear to be of a less magnitude than they had been understood before, and to be excusable from other causes, still being severe enough to himself for his unwary part, whatsoever excuses he might make for the excess; and by this means to make new vows for himself, and to tie new knots to restrain the prince from future jealousies. And it is very true, his hopes in this kind never failed him; the new king, from the death of the old even to the death of the duke himself, discovering the most entire confidence in, and even friendship to him, that ever king had shewed to any subject: all preferments in church and state given by him; all his kindred and friends promoted to the degree in honour, or riches, or offices, as he thought fit, and all his enemies and enviers discountenanced, and kept at that distance from the court as he appointed.

But a parliament was necessary to be called, as at the entrance of all kings to the crown, for the continuance of some supplies and revenue to the king, which have been still used to be granted in that season. And now he quickly found how prophetic the last king's predictions had [proved], and were like to prove. The parliament that had so furiously advanced the war, and so factiously adhered to his person, was now no more; and though the house of peers consisted still of the same men, and most of the principal men of the house of commons were again elected to serve in this parliament, yet they were far from wedding the war, or taking themselves to be concerned to make good any declarations made by the former: so that, though the war was entered in, all hope of obtaining money to carry it on was even desperate; and the affection they had for the duke, and confidence in him, was not then so manifest, as the prejudice they had now, and animosity against him, was visible to all the world: all the actions of his life ripped up and surveyed, and all malicious glosses made upon all he had said and all he had done: votes and remonstrances passed against him as an enemy to the public; and his ill management made the ground of their refusal to give the king that supply he had reason to expect, and was absolutely necessary to the state he was in. And this kind of treatment was so ill suited to the duke's great spirit, which indeed might easily have been bowed, but could very hardly be broken, that it wrought contrary effects upon his high mind, and his indignation, to find himself so used by the same men. For they who flattered him most before, mentioned him now with the greatest bitterness and acrimony; and the same men who had called him our saviour, for bringing the prince safe out of Spain, called him now the corrupter of the king, and betrayer of the liberties of the people, without imputing the least crime to him, to have been committed since the time of that exalted adulation, or that was not then as much known to them, as it could be now; so fluctuating and unsteady a testimony is the applause of popular councils.

This indignation, I say, so transported the duke, that he thought it necessary to publish and manifest a greater contempt of them than he should have done; causing this and the next parliament to be quickly dissolved, as soon as they seemed to entertain counsels not grateful to him, and before he could well determine and judge what their temper was in truth like to prove: and upon every dissolution, such who had given any offence were imprisoned or disgraced; new projects were every day set on foot for money, which served only to offend and incense the people, and brought little supply to the king's occasions, yet raised a great stock for expostulation, murmur, and complaint, to be exposed when other supplies should be required. And many persons of the best quality and condition under the peerage were committed to several prisons, with circumstances unusual and unheard of, for refusing to pay money required by those extraordinary ways; and the duke himself would passionately say, and frequently do, many things, which only grieved his friends and incensed his enemies, and gave them as well the ability as the inclination to do him much harm.

In this fatal conjuncture, and after several costly embassies into France, in the last of which the duke himself went, and brought triumphantly home with him the queen, to the joy of the nation; in a time, when all endeavours should have been used to have extinguished that war, in which the kingdom was so unhappily engaged against Spain, a new war was as precipitately declared against France; and the fleet, that had been unwarily designed to have surprised Calais, under a general very unequal to that great work, was no sooner returned without success, and with much damage, than the fleet was repaired, and the army reinforced for the invasion of France; in which the duke was general himself, and made that notable descent upon the Isle of Rhé, which was quickly afterwards attended with many unprosperous attempts, and then with a miserable retreat, in which the flower of the army was lost. So that how ill soever Spain and France were inclined to each other, they were both mortal enemies to England; whilst England itself was so totally taken up with the thought of revenge upon the person who they thought had been the cause of their distress, that they never considered, that the sad effects of it (if not instantly provided against) must inevitably destroy the kingdom; and gave no truce to their rage, till the duke finished his course by the wicked means mentioned before in the fourth year of the king, and the thirty-sixth of his age.

John Felton, an obscure person, who had been bred a soldier, and lately a lieutenant of a foot company, whose captain had been killed upon the retreat at the Isle of Rhé, upon which he conceived that the company of right ought to have been conferred upon him, and it being refused to him by the duke of Buckingham, general of the army, he had given up his commission of lieutenant, and withdrawn himself from the army. He was of a melancholic nature, and had little conversation with anybody, yet of a gentleman's family in Suffolk, of good fortune and reputation. From the time that he had quitted the army, he resided in London; when the house of commons, transported with passion and prejudice against the duke of Buckingham, had accused him to the house of peers for several misdemeanours and miscarriages, and in some declaration had styled him, "the cause of all the evils the kingdom suffered, "and an enemy to the public."

Some transcripts of such expressions, (for the late license of printing all mutinous and seditious discourses was not yet in fashion,) and some general invectives he met with amongst the people, to whom that great man was not grateful, wrought so far upon this melancholic gentleman, that, by degrees, and (as he said upon some of his examinations) by frequently hearing some popular preachers in the city, (who were not yet arrived at the presumption and impudence they have been since transported with,) he believed he should do God good service, if he killed the duke; which he shortly after resolved to do. He chose no other instrument to do it with than an ordinary knife, which he bought of a common cutler for a shilling: and, thus provided, he repaired to Portsmouth, where he arrived the eve of St. Bartholomew. The duke was then there, in order to the preparing and making ready the fleet and the army, with which he resolved in few days to transport himself to the relief of Rochelle, which was then straitly besieged by the cardinal of Richelieu; and for relief whereof the duke was the more obliged, by reason that, at his being at the Isle of Rhé, he had received great supplies of victual, and some companies of their garrison from that town, the want of both which they were at this time very sensible of, and grieved with.

This morning of St. Bartholomew the duke had received letters, in which he was advertised that Rochelle had relieved itself; upon which he directed that his breakfast might speedily be made ready, and he would make haste to acquaint the king with the good news, the court being then at Southwick, the house of sir Daniel Norton, five miles from Portsmouth. The chamber wherein he was dressing himself was full of company, of persons of quality, and officers of the fleet and army.

There was monsieur de Soubise, brother to the duke of Rohan, and other French gentlemen, who were very solicitous for the embarkation of the army, and for the departure of the fleet for the relief of Rochelle; and they were at this time in much trouble and perplexity, out of apprehension that the news the duke had received that morning might slacken the preparations for the voyage, which their impatience and interest persuaded were not advanced with expedition; and so they had then held much discourse with the duke of the impossibility that his intelligence could be true, and that it was contrived by the artifice and dexterity of their enemies, in order to abate the warmth and zeal that was used for their relief, the arrival of which they had so much reason to apprehend; and a little longer delay in sending it would ease them of that terrible apprehension, their forts and works toward the sea and in the harbour being almost finished.

This discourse, according to the natural custom of that nation, and by the usual dialect of that language, was held with that passion and vehemence, that the standers by, who understood not French, did believe that they were very angry, and that they used the duke very rudely. He being ready, and informed that his breakfast was ready, drew towards the door, where the hangings were held up; and, in the very passage, turning himself to speak with sir Thomas Fryer, a colonel of the army, who was then speaking near his ear, he was on a sudden struck over his shoulder upon the breast with a knife; upon which, without using any other words but that, "The villain hath killed me," and in the same moment pulling out the knife himself, he fell down dead, the knife having pierced his heart.

No man had seen the blow, or the man who made it; but in the confusion they were in, every man made his own conjectures, and declared it as a thing known; most agreeing that it was done by the French, from the angry discourse they thought they heard from them. And it was a kind of a miracle, that they were not all killed in that instant; the soberer sort, that preserved them from it, having the same opinion of their guilt, and only reserving them for a more judicial examination and proceeding.

In the crowd near the door there was found upon the ground a hat, in the inside whereof there was sewed upon the crown a paper, in which were writ four or five lines of that declaration made by the house of commons, in which they had styled the duke an enemy to the kingdom, and under it a short ejaculation or two towards a prayer. It was easily enough concluded that the hat belonged to the person who had committed the murder: but the difficulty remained still as great, who that person should be; for the writing discovered nothing of the name; and whosoever it was, it was very natural to believe that he was gone far enough not to be found without a hat.

In this hurry, one running one way, another another way, a man was seen walking before the door very composedly without a hat; whereupon one crying out, "Here is the fellow that killed the duke!" upon which others ran thither, every body asking, "Which is he? Which is he?" To which the man without the hat very composedly answered, "I am he." Thereupon some of those who were most furious, suddenly ran upon the man with their drawn swords to kill him; but others, who were at least equally concerned in the loss, and in the sense of it, defended him; himself with open arms very calmly and cheerfully exposing himself to the fury and swords of the most enraged, as being very willing to fall a sacrifice to their sudden anger, rather than to be kept for that deliberate justice which he knew must be exercised upon him.

He was now known enough, and easily discovered to be that Felton, whom we mentioned before, who had been a lieutenant in the army. He was quickly carried into a private room by the persons of the best condition, some whereof were in authority, who first thought fit so far to dissemble, as to mention the duke only as grievously wounded, but not without hope of recovery. Upon which Felton smiled, and said, he knew well he had given him a blow, that had determined all those hopes. Being then asked (which was the discovery principally aimed at) by whose instigation he had performed that horrid and wicked act, he answered them with a wonderful assurance, "That they should not trouble themselves in that inquiry; that no man living had credit or power enough in him, to have engaged or disposed him to such an action; that he had never intrusted his purpose and resolution to any man; that it proceeded only from himself and the impulsion of his own conscience; and that the motives thereunto would appear, if his hat were found, in which he had therefore fixed them, because he believed it very probable that he might perish in the attempt. He confessed that he had come to the town but the night before, and had kept his lodging, that he might not be seen or taken notice of; and that he had come that morning to the duke's lodging, where he had waited at the door for his coming out; and when he found, by the motions within, that he was coming, he drew to the door, as if he held up the hanging; and sir Thomas Fryer speaking at that time to the duke, as hath been said, and being of a much lower stature than the duke, who a little inclined towards him, he took the opportunity of giving the blow over his shoulder."

He spoke very frankly of what he had done, and bore the reproaches of those who spoke to him, with the temper of a man who thought he had not done amiss. But after he had been in prison some time, where he was treated without any rigour, and with humanity enough; and before, and at his trial, which was about four months after, at the king's bench bar, he behaved himself with great modesty and wonderful repentance; being, as he said, convinced in his conscience, that he had done wickedly, and asked the pardon of the king, the duchess, and of all the duke's servants, whom he acknowledged to have offended; and very earnestly besought the judges, that he might have his hand struck off, with which he had performed that impious act, before he should be put to death.

The court was too near Portsmouth, and too many courtiers upon the place, to have this murder (so wonderful in the nature and circumstances, the like whereof had not been known in England in many ages) long concealed from the king. His majesty was at the public prayers of the church, when sir John Hippeasy came into the room, with a troubled countenance, and, without any pause in respect of the exercise they were performing, went directly to the king, and whispered in his ear what had fallen out. His majesty continued unmoved, and without the least change in his countenance, till prayers were ended; when he suddenly departed to his chamber, and threw himself upon his bed, lamenting with much passion, and with abundance of tears, the loss he had of an excellent servant, and the horrid manner in which he had been deprived of him; and he continued in this melancholic and discomposure of mind many days.

Yet the manner of his receiving the news in public, when it was first brought to him in the presence of so many, (who knew or saw nothing of the passion he expressed upon his retreat,) made many men to believe that the accident was not very ungrateful; at least, that it was very indifferent to him; as being rid of a servant very ungracious to the people, and the prejudice to whose person exceedingly obstructed all overtures made in parliament for his service.

And, upon this observation, persons of all conditions took great license in speaking of the person of the duke, and dissecting all his infirmities, believing they should not thereby incur any displeasure of the king. In which they took very ill measures; for from that time almost to the time of his own death, the king admitted very few into any degree of trust, who had ever discovered themselves to be enemies to the duke, or against whom he had ever manifested a notable prejudice. And sure never any prince manifested a more lively regret for the loss of a servant, than his majesty did for this great man, in his constant favour and kindness to his wife and children, in a wonderful solicitous care for the payment of his debts, (which, it is very true, were contracted for his service; though in such a manner, that there remained no evidence of it, nor was any of the duke's officers intrusted with the knowledge of it, nor was there any record of it, but in his majesty's own generous memory,) and all offices of grace towards his servants.

After all this, and such a transcendent mixture of ill fortune, of which as ill conduct and great infirmities seem to be the foundation and source, this great man was a person of a noble nature, and generous disposition, and of such other endowments, as made him very capable of being a great favourite to a great king. He understood the arts and artifices of a court, and all the learning that is professed there, exactly well. By long practice in business, under a master that discoursed excellently, and surely knew all things wonderfully, and took much delight in indoctrinating his young unexperienced favourite, who, he knew, would be always looked upon as the workmanship of his own hands, he had obtained a quick conception, and apprehension of business, and had the habit of speaking very gracefully and pertinently. He was of a most flowing courtesy and affability to all men who made any address to him; and so desirous to oblige them, that he did not enough consider the value of the obligation, or the merit of the person he chose to oblige; from which much of his misfortune resulted. He was of a courage not to be daunted, which was manifested in all his actions, and his contests with particular persons of the greatest reputation; and especially in his whole demeanour at the Isle of Rhé, both at the landing and upon the retreat: in both which no man was more fearless, or more ready to expose himself to the brightest dangers. His kindness and affection to his friends was so vehement, that it was as so many marriages for better and worse, and so many leagues offensive and defensive; as if he thought himself obliged to love all his friends, and to make war upon all they were angry with, let the cause be what it would. And it cannot be denied that he was an enemy in the same excess, and prosecuted those he looked upon as his enemies with the utmost rigour and animosity, and was not easily induced to a reconciliation. And yet there were some examples of his receding in that particular. And in the highest passion, he was so far from stooping to any dissimulation, whereby his displeasure might be concealed and covered till he had attained his revenge, (the low method of courts,) that he never endeavoured to do any man an ill office, before he first told him what he was to expect from him, and reproached him with the injuries he had done, with so much generosity, that the person found it in his power to receive further satisfaction, in the way he would choose for himself.

And in this manner he proceeded with the earl of Oxford, a man of great name in that time, and whom he had endeavoured by many civil offices to make his friend, and who seemed equally to incline to the friendship: when he discovered (or, as many thought, but suspected) that the earl was entered into some cabal in parliament against him; he could not be dissuaded by any of his friends, to whom he imparted his resolution; but meeting the earl the next day, he took him aside, and after many reproaches for such and such ill offices he had done, and for breaking his word towards him, he told him, "he would rely no longer on his friendship, nor should he expect any further friendship from him, but, on the contrary, he would be for ever his enemy, and do him all the mischief he could." The earl, (who, as many thought, had not been faulty towards him, was as great-hearted as he, and thought the very suspecting him to be an injury unpardonable,) without any reply to the particulars, declared, "that he neither cared for his friendship, nor feared his hatred;" and from thence avowedly entered into the conversation and confidence of those who were always awake to discover, and solicitous to pursue, any thing that might prove to his disadvantage; which was of evil consequence to the duke, the earl being of the most ancient of the nobility, and a man of great courage, and of a family which had in no time swerved from its fidelity to the crown.

Sir Francis Cottington, who was secretary to the prince, and not grown courtier enough to dissemble well his opinion, had given the duke offence before the journey into Spain, as is before touched upon, and improved that prejudice, after his coming thither, by disposing the prince all he could to the marriage of the infants; and by his behaviour after his return, in justifying to king James, who had a very good opinion of him, the sincerity of the Spaniards in the treaty of the marriage, "That they did in truth desire it, and were fully resolved to gratify his majesty in the business of the palatinate; and only desired, in the manner

"of it, to gratify the emperor and the duke of Bavaria all they could, which would take up very little time." All which being so contrary to the duke's positions and purposes, his displeasure to Cottington was sufficiently manifest. And king James was no sooner dead, and the new officers and orders made, but the profits and privileges which had used to be continued to him who had been secretary, till some other promotion, were all retrenched. And when he was one morning attending in the privy lodgings, as he was accustomed to do, one of the secretaries of state came to him, and told him, "that it was the king's pleasure that he should no more presume to come into those rooms;" (which was the first instance he had received of the king's disfavour;) and at the same instant the duke entered into that quarter. Upon which sir Francis Cottington addressed himself towards him, and desired "he would give him leave to speak to him:" upon which the duke inclining his ear, moved to a window from the company, and the other told him, "that he received every day fresh marks of his severity;" mentioned the message which had been then delivered to him, and desired only to know, "whether it could not be in his power, by all dutiful application, and all possible service, to be restored to the good opinion his grace had once vouchsafed to have of him, and to be admitted to serve him?" The duke heard him without the least commotion, and with a countenance serene enough, and then answered him, "That he would deal very clearly with him; that it was utterly impossible to bring that to pass which he had proposed: that he was not only firmly resolved never to trust him, or to have to do with him; but that he was, and would be always, his declared enemy; and that he would do always whatever should be in his power to ruin and destroy him, and of this he might be most assured;" without mentioning any particular ground for his so heightened displeasure.

The other very calmly replied to him, (as he was master of an incomparable temper,) "That since he was resolved never to do him good, that he hoped, from his justice and generosity, that he would not suffer himself to gain by his loss; that he had laid out by his command so much money for jewels and pictures, which he had received: and that, in hope of his future favour, he had once presented a suit of hangings to him, which cost him 800*l.* which he hoped he would cause to be restored to him, and that he would not let him be so great a loser by him." The duke answered, "he was in the right; that he should the next morning go to Oliver, (who was his receiver,) and give him a particular account of all the money due to him, and he should presently pay him;" which was done the next morning accordingly, without the least abatement of any of his demands.

And he was so far reconciled to him before his death, that being resolved to make a peace with Spain, to the end he might more vigorously pursue the war with France, (to which his heart was most passionately fixed,) he sent for Cottington to come to him, and after conference with him, told him, "the king would send him ambassador thither, and that he should attend him at Portsmouth for his despatch."

His single misfortune was, (which indeed was productive of many greater,) that he never made a noble and a worthy friendship with a man so near his equal, that he would frankly advise him for his honour and true interest, against the current, or rather the torrent, of his impetuous passion; which was partly the vice of the time, when the court was not replenished with great choice of excellent men; and partly the vice of the persons who were most worthy to be applied to, and looked upon his youth, and his obscurity, as obligations upon him to gain their friendships by extraordinary application. Then his ascent was so quick, that it seemed rather a flight than a growth; and he was such a darling of fortune, that he was at the top before he was seen at the bottom, for the gradation of his titles was the effect, not cause, of his first promotion; and, as if he had been born a favourite, he was supreme the first month he came to court; and it was want of confidence, not of credit, that he had not all at first which he obtained afterwards; never meeting with the least obstruction from his setting out, till he was as great as he could be: so that he wanted dependants before he thought he could want coadjutors. Nor was he very fortunate in the election of those dependants, very few of his servants having been ever qualified enough to assist or advise him, and were intent only upon growing rich under him, not upon their master's growing good as well as great: insomuch as he was throughout his fortune a much wiser man than any servant or friend he had.

Let the fault or misfortune be what or whence it will, it may very reasonably be believed, that, if he had been blessed with one faithful friend, who had been qualified with wisdom and integrity, that great person would have committed as few faults, and done as transcendent worthy actions, as any man who shined in such a sphere in that age in Europe. For he was of an excellent nature, and of a capacity very capable of advice and counsel. He was in his nature just and candid, liberal, generous, and bountiful; nor was it ever known, that the temptation of money swayed him to do an unjust or unkind thing. And though he left a very great inheritance to his heirs; considering the vast fortune he inherited by his wife, the sole daughter and heir of Francis earl of Rutland, he owed no part of it to his own industry or solicitation, but to the impatient humour of two kings his masters, who would make his fortune equal to his titles, and the one [as much] above other men, as the other was. And he considered it no otherwise than as theirs, and left it at his death engaged for the crown, almost to the value of it, as is touched upon before.

If he had an immoderate ambition, with which he was charged; and is a weed (if it be a weed) apt to grow in the best soils; it doth not appear that it was in his nature, or that he brought it with him to the court, but rather found it there, and was a garment necessary for that air. Nor was it more in his power to be without promotion, and titles, and wealth, than for a healthy man to sit in the sun in the brightest dog-days, and remain without any warmth. He needed no ambition, who was so seated in the hearts of two such masters.

There are two particulars, which lie heaviest upon his memory, either of them aggravated by circumstances very important, and which administer frequent occasions by their effects to be remembered.

The first, his engaging his old unwilling master and the kingdom in the war with Spain, (not to mention the bold journey thither, or the breach of that match,) in a time when the crown was so poor, and the people more inclined to a bold inquiry, how it came to be so, than dutifully to provide for its supply: and this only upon personal animosities between him and the duke of Olivarez, the sole favourite in that court, and those animosities from very trivial provocations, and flowed indeed from no other fountain, than that the nature and education of Spain restrained men from that gaiety of humour, and from that frolic humour, to which the prince's court was more inclined. And Olivarez had been heard to censure very severely the duke's familiarity and want of respect towards the prince, (a crime monstrous to the Spaniard,) and had said, that "if the infanta did not, as soon as she was married, suppress that license, she would herself quickly undergo the mischief of it:" which gave the first alarm to the duke to apprehend his own ruin in that union, and accordingly to use all his endeavours to break and prevent it: and from that time he took all occasions to quarrel with and reproach the Conde duke.

One morning the king desired the prince to take the air, and to visit a little house of pleasure he had (the Prado) four miles from Madrid, standing in a forest, where he used sometimes to hunt; and the duke not being ready, the king and the prince and the infante don Carlos went into the coach, the king likewise calling the earl of Bristol into that coach to assist them in their conversation, the prince then not speaking any Spanish; and left Olivarez to follow in the coach with the duke of Buckingham. When the duke came, they went into the coach, accompanied with others of both nations, and proceeded very cheerfully towards overtaking the king: but when upon the way he heard that the earl of Bristol was in the coach with the king, he broke out into great passion, reviled the Conde duke as the contriver of the affront, reproached the earl of Bristol for his presumption, in taking the place which in all respects belonged to him, who was joined with him as ambassador extraordinary, and came last from the presence of their master, and resolved to go out of the coach, and to return to Madrid. Olivarez easily discovered by the disorder, and the noise, and the tone, that the duke was very angry, without comprehending the cause of it; only found that the earl of Bristol was often named with such a tone, that he began to suspect what in truth might be the cause. And thereupon he commanded a gentleman, who was on horseback, with all speed to overtake the king's coach, and desire that it might stay; intimating, that the duke had taken some displeasure, the ground whereof was not enough understood. Upon which the king's coach stayed; and when the other approached within distance, the Conde duke alighted, and acquainted the king with what he had observed, and what he conceived. The king himself alighted, made great compliments to the duke, the earl of Bristol excusing himself upon the king's command, that he should serve as a trustman. In the end don Carlos went into the coach with the favourite, and the duke and the earl of Bristol went with the king and the prince; and so they prosecuted their journey, and after dinner returned in the same manner to Madrid.

This, with all the circumstances of it, administered wonderful occasion of discourse in the court and country, there having never been such a comet seen in that hemisphere; and their submissive reverence to their princes being a vital part of their religion.

There were very few days passed afterwards, in which there was not some manifestation of the highest displeasure and hatred in the duke against the other. And when the Conde duke had some eclaireissement with the duke, in which he made all the protestations of his sincere affection, and his desire to maintain a clear and faithful friendship with him, which he conceived might be, in some degree, useful to both their masters; the other received his protestations with all contempt, and declared, with a very unnecessary frankness, "that he would have no friendship with him."

And the next day after the king returned from accompanying the prince towards the sea, where, at parting, there were all possible demonstrations of mutual affection between them; and the king caused a fair pillar to be erected in the place where they last embraced each other, with inscriptions of great honour to the prince; their being then in that court not the least suspicion, or imagination, that the marriage would not succeed. Insomuch that afterwards, upon the news from Rome, that the dispensation was granted, the prince having left the desponsorios in the hands of the earl of Bristol, in which the infante don Carlos was constituted the prince's proxy to marry the infanta on his behalf; she was treated as princess of Wales, the queen gave her place, and the English ambassador had frequent audiences, as with his mistress, in which he would not be covered: yet, I say, the very next day after the prince's departure from the king, Mr. Clark, one of the prince's bedchamber, who had formerly served the duke, was sent back to Madrid, upon pretence that somewhat was forgotten there, but in truth, with orders to the earl of Bristol not to deliver the desponsorios (which, by the articles, he was obliged to do within fifteen days after the arrival of the dispensation) until he should receive further orders from the prince, or king, after his return into England.

Mr. Clark was not to deliver this letter to the ambassador, till he was sure the dispensation was come; of which he could not be advertised in the instant. But he lodging in the ambassador's house, and falling sick of a calenture, which the physicians thought would prove mortal, he sent for the earl to come to his bedside, and delivered him the letter before the arrival of the dispensation, though long after it was known to be granted; upon which all those ceremonies were performed to the infanta.

By these means, and by this method, this great affair, upon which the eyes of Christendom had been so long fixed, came to be dissolved, without the least mixture with, or contribution from, those amours, which were afterwards so confidently discoursed of. For though the duke was naturally carried violently to those passions, when there was any grace or beauty in the object; yet the duchess of Olivarez, of whom the talk was, was then a woman so old, past children, of so abject a presence, in a word, so crooked and deformed, that she could neither tempt his appetite, or magnify his revenge. And whatever he did afterwards in England was but tueri opus, and to prosecute the design he had, upon the reasons and provocations aforesaid, so long before contrived during his abode in Spain.

The other particular, by which he involved himself in so many fatal intricacies, from which he could never extricate himself, was, his running violently into the war with France, without any kind of provocation, and upon a particular passion very unwarrantable. In his embassy in France, where his person and presence was wonderfully admired and esteemed, (and in truth it was a wonder in the eyes of all men,) and in which he appeared with all the lustre the wealth of England could adorn him with, and outshined all the bravery that court could dress itself in, and overacted the whole nation in their own most peculiar vanities; he had the ambition to fix his eyes upon, and to dedicate his most violent affection to, a lady of a very sublime quality, and to pursue it with most importunate addresses: inasmuch as when the king had brought the queen his sister as far as he meant to do, and delivered her into the hands of the duke, to be by him conducted into England; the duke, in his journey, after his departure from that court, took a resolution once more to make a visit to that great lady, which he believed he might do with great privacy. But it was so easily discovered, that provision was made for his reception; and if he had pursued his attempt, he had been without doubt assassinated; of which he had only so much notice, as served him to decline the danger. But he swore, in the instant, "that he would see and speak with that lady, in spite of the strength and power of France." And from the time that the queen arrived in England, he took all the ways he could to undervalue and exasperate that court and nation, by causing all those who fled into England from the justice and displeasure of that king, to be received and entertained here, not only with ceremony and security, but with bounty and magnificence; and the more extraordinary the persons were, and the more notorious the king's displeasure was towards them, (as in that time there were very many lords and ladies of that class,) the more respectfully they were received and esteemed. He omitted no opportunity to incense the king against France, and to dispose him to assist the Hugonots, whom he likewise encouraged to give their king some trouble.

And, which was worse than all this, he took great pains to lessen the king's affection towards his young queen, being exceedingly jealous, lest her interest might be of force enough to cross his other designs: and in this stratagem, he so far swerved from the instinct of his nature and his proper inclinations, that he, who was compounded of all the elements of affability and courtesy towards all kind of people, had brought himself to a habit of neglect, and even of rudeness, towards the queen.

One day, when he unjustly apprehended that she had shewed some disrespect to his mother, in not going to her lodging at an hour she had intended to do, and was hindered by a very accident, he came into her chamber in much passion, and, after some expostulations rude enough, he told her, "she should repent it." And her majesty answering with some quickness, he replied insolently to her, "that there had been queens in England who had lost their heads." And it was universally known, that, during his life, the queen never had any credit with the king, with reference to any public affairs, and so could not divert the resolution of making a war with France.

The war with Spain had found the nation in a surfeit of a long peace, and in a disposition inclinable enough to war with that nation, which might put an end to an alliance the most ungrateful to them, and which they most feared, and from whence no other damage had yet befallen them, than a chargeable and unsuccessful voyage by sea, without the loss of ships or men. But a war with France must be carried on at another rate and expense. Besides, the nation was weary and surfeited with the first, before the second was entered upon; and it was very visible to wise men, that when the general trade of the kingdom, from whence the support of the crown principally resulted, should be utterly extinguished with France, as it was with Spain, and interrupted or obstructed with all other places, (as it must be, in a war, how prosperously soever carried on,) the effects would be very sad, and involve the king in many perplexities; and it could not but fall out accordingly.

Upon the return from Cales without success, though all the ships, and, upon the matter, all the men were seen, (for though some had so surfeited in the vineyards, and with the wines, that they had been left behind, the generosity of the Spaniards had sent them all home again;) and though by that fleet's putting in at Plymouth, near two hundred miles from London, so that there could be very imperfect relations, and the news of yesterday was contradicted the morrow; besides the expedition had been undertaken by the advice of the parliament, and with an universal approbation of the people, so that nobody could reasonably speak loudly against it; yet, notwithstanding all this, the ill success was heavily borne, and imputed to ill conduct; the principal officers of the fleet and army divided amongst themselves, and all united in their murmurs against the general, the lord viscount Wimbledon; who, though an old officer in Holland, was never thought equal to the enterprise, and had in truth little more of a Holland officer than the pride and formality. In a word, there was indisposition enough quickly discovered against the war itself, that it was easily discerned it would not be pursued with the vigour it was entered into, nor carried on by any cheerful contribution of money from the public.

But the running into this war with France (from whence the queen was so newly and so joyfully received) without any colour of reason, or so much as the formality of a declaration from the king, containing the ground, and provocation, and end of it, according to custom and obligation in the like cases, (for it was observed that the declaration which was published was in the duke's own name, who went admiral and general of the expedition,) opened the mouths of all men to inveigh against it with all bitterness, and the sudden ill effects of it, manifested in the return of the fleet to Portsmouth, within such a distance of London, that nothing could be concealed of the loss sustained; in which most noble families found a son, or brother, or near kinsman wanting, without such circumstances of their deaths which are usually the consolations and recompenses of such catastrophes. The retreat had been a rout without an enemy, and the French had their revenge by the disorder and confusion of the English themselves; in which great numbers of noble and ignoble were crowded to death, or drowned without the help of an enemy: and as many thousands of the common men were wanting, so few of those principal officers who had attained to a name in war, and by whose courage and experience any war was to be conducted, could be found.

The effects of this overthrow did not at first appear in whispers, murmurs, and invectives, as the retirement from Cales had done; but produced such a general consternation over the face of the whole nation, as if all the armies of France and Spain were united together, and had covered the land: mutinies in the fleet and army, under pretence of their want of pay, (whereof no doubt there was much due to them,) but in truth, out of detestation of the service, and the authority of the duke. The counties throughout the kingdom were so incensed, and their affections poisoned, that they refused to suffer the soldiers to be billeted upon them; by which they often underwent greater inconveniences and mischiefs than they endeavoured to prevent. The endeavour to raise new men for the recruit of the army by pressing (the only method that had ever been practised upon such occasions) found opposition in many places; and the authority by which it was done not submitted to, as illegal; which produced a resort to martial law, by which many were executed; which raised an asperity in the minds of more than of the common people. And this distemper was so universal, the least spark still meeting with combustible matter enough to make a flame, that all wise men looked upon it as the prediction of the destruction and dissolution that would follow. Nor was there a serenity in the countenance of any man, who had age and experience enough to consider things to come; but only in those who wished the destruction of the duke, and thought it could not be purchased at too dear a price, and looked upon this flux of humours as an inevitable way to bring it to pass.

And it cannot be denied, that from these two wars so wretchedly entered into, and the circumstances before mentioned, and which flowed from thence, the duke's ruin took its date: and never left pursuing him, till that execrable act upon his person; the malice whereof was contracted by that sole evil spirit of the time, without any partner in the conspiracy. And the venom of that season increased and got vigour, until, from one license to another, it proceeded till the nation was corrupted to that monstrous degree, that it grew satiated, and weary of the government itself; under which it had enjoyed a greater measure of felicity, than any nation was ever possessed of; and which could never be continued to them, but under the same. And as these calamities originally sprung from the inordinate appetite and passion of this young man, under the too much easiness of two indulgent masters, and the concurrence of a thousand other accidents; so that, if he had lived longer, (for he was taken away at the age of thirty-six years,) the observation and experience he had, which had very much improved his understanding, with the greatness of his spirit, and jealousy of his master's honour, (to whom his fidelity was superior to any temptation,) might have repaired many of the inconveniences which he had introduced, and would have prevented the mischiefs which were the natural effects of those causes.

There were many stories scattered abroad at that time, of several prophecies and predictions of the duke's untimely and violent death. Amongst the rest there was one, which was upon a better foundation of credit than usually such discourses are founded upon. There was an officer in the king's wardrobe in Windsor castle, of a good reputation for honesty and discretion, and then about the age of fifty years, or more. This man had, in his youth, been bred in a school, in the parish where sir George Villiers, the father of the duke, lived, and had been much cherished and obliged, in that season of his age, by the said sir George, whom afterwards he never saw. About six months before the miserable end of the duke of Buckingham, about midnight, this man being in his bed at Windsor, where his office was, and in very good health, there appeared to him, on the side of his bed, a man of a very venerable aspect, who drew the curtains of his bed, and, fixing his eyes upon him, asked him, if he knew him. The poor man, half dead with fear and apprehension, being asked the second time, whether he remembered him; and having in that time called to his memory the presence of sir George Villiers, and the very clothes he used to wear, in which at that time he seemed to be habited, he answered, "that he thought him to be that person." He replied, "he was in the right; that he was the same, and that he expected a service from him; which was, that he should go from him to his son the duke of Buckingham, and tell him, if he did not do somewhat to ingratiate himself to the people, or, at least, to abate the extreme malice they had against him, he would be suffered to live a short time." And after this discourse he disappeared; and the poor man, if he had been at all waking, slept very well till morning, when he believed all this to be a dream, and considered it no otherwise.

The next night, or shortly after, the same person appeared to him again in the same place, and about the same time of the night, with an aspect a little more severe than before, and asked him, whether he had done as he had required him: and perceiving he had not, gave him very sharp reprehensions; told him, "he expected more compliance from him; and that, if he did not perform his commands, he should enjoy no peace of mind, but should be always pursued by him;" upon which, he promised him to obey him. But the next morning waking out of a good sleep, though he was exceedingly perplexed with the lively representation of all particulars to his memory, he was willing still to persuade himself that he had only dreamed; and considered, that he was a person at such a distance from the duke, that he knew not how to find any admission to his presence, much less had any hope to be believed in what he should say. And so with great trouble and uneasiness, he spent some time in thinking what he should do, and in the end resolved to do nothing in the matter.

The same person appeared to him the third time, with a terrible countenance, and bitterly reproaching him for not performing what he had promised to do. The poor man had by this time recovered the courage to tell him, "That in truth he had deferred the execution of his commands, upon considering, how difficult a thing it would be for him to get any access to the duke, having acquaintance with no person about him; and if he could obtain admission to him, he should never be able to persuade him, that he was sent in such a manner; but he should at best be thought to be mad, or to be set on and employed, by his own or the malice of other men, to abuse the duke; and so he should be sure to be undone." The person replied, as he had done before, "That he should never find rest, till he should perform what he required; and therefore he were better to despatch it: that the access to his son was known to be very easy; and that few men waited long for him: and for the gaining him credit, he would tell him two or three particulars, which he charged him never to mention to any person living, but to the duke himself; and he should no sooner hear them, but he would believe all the rest he should say;" and so repeating his threats, he left him.

And in the morning, the poor man, more confirmed by the last appearance, made his journey to London; where the court then was. He was very well known to sir Ralph Freeman, one of the masters of requests, who had married a lady that was nearly allied to the duke, and was himself well received by him. To him this man went; and though he did not acquaint him with all particulars, he said enough to him to let him see there was somewhat extraordinary in it; and the knowledge he had of the sobriety and discretion of the man made the more impression in him. He desired that "by his means he might be brought to the duke; to such a place, and in such a manner, as should be thought fit: that he had much to say to him; and of such a nature, as would require much privacy, and some time and patience in the hearing." Sir Ralph promised "he would speak first with the duke of him, and then he should understand his pleasure:" and accordingly, in the first opportunity, he did inform him of the reputation and honesty of the man, and then what he desired, and of all he knew of the matter. The duke, according to his usual openness and condescension, told him, "That he was the next day early to hunt with the king; that his horses should attend him at Lambeth-bridge, where he would land by five of the clock in the morning; and if the man attended him there at that hour, he would walk, and speak with him, as long as should be necessary." Sir Ralph carried the man with him the next morning, and presented him to the duke at his landing, who received him courteously; and walked aside in conference near an hour, none but his own servants being at that hour in that place; and they and sir Ralph at such a distance, that they could not hear a word, though the duke sometimes spoke, and with great commotion; which sir Ralph the more easily observed, and perceived, because he kept his eyes always fixed upon the duke; having procured the conference, upon somewhat he knew there was of extraordinary. And the man told him in his return over the water, "That when he mentioned those particulars which were to gain him credit, the substance whereof

"he said he durst not impart to him, the duke's colour changed, and he swore he could come to that knowledge only by the devil; for that those particulars were only known to himself, and to one person more, who, he was sure, would never speak of it."

The duke pursued his purpose of hunting; but was observed to ride all the morning with great pensiveness, and in deep thoughts, without any delight in the exercise he was upon; and before the morning was spent, left the field, and alighted at his mother's lodgings in Whitehall; with whom he was shut up for the space of two or three hours; the noise of their discourse frequently reaching the ears of those who attended in the next rooms: and when the duke left her, his countenance appeared full of trouble, with a mixture of anger; a countenance that was never before observed in him; in any encounters with her: towards her he had ever a most profound reverence. And the countess herself (for though she was married to a private gentleman, sir Thomas Compton, she had been created countess of Buckingham, shortly after her son had first assumed that title) was, at the duke's leaving her, found overwhelmed in tears, and in the highest agony imaginable. Whatever there was of all this, it is a notorious truth, that when the news of the duke's murder (which happened within few months after) was brought to his mother, she seemed not in the least degree surprised; but received it as if she had foreseen it; nor did afterwards express such a degree of sorrow, as was expected from such a mother, for the loss of such a son.

This digression, much longer than it was intended, may not be thought altogether unnatural in this discourse. For as the mention of his death was very pertinent, in the place, and upon the occasion, it happened to be made; so upon that occasion it seemed the more reasonable to enlarge upon the nature, and character, and fortune of the duke; as being the best mirror to discern the temper and spirit of that age, and the rather and because all the particulars before set down are to be found in the papers and memorials of the person, whose life is the subject of this discourse, who was frequently heard to relate the wonderful concurrence of many fatal accidents, to disfigure the government of two excellent kings; under whom their kingdoms in general prospered exceedingly, and enjoyed a longer peace, a greater plenty, and in fuller security, than had been in any former age; and who was so far from any acrimony to the memory of that great favourite, (whose death he had lamented at that time, and endeavoured to vindicate him from some libels and reproaches, which vented after his death,) that he took delight in remembering his many virtues, and to magnify his affability and most obliging nature; and he kept the memorial of that prediction, (though no man looked upon relations of that nature with less reverence and consideration,) the substance of which (he said) was confirmed to him by sir Ralph Freeman, and acknowledged by some servants of the duke's, who had the nearest trust with him, and who were informed of much of it before the murder of the duke.

And because there was so total a change of all counsels, and in the whole face of the court, upon the death of that omnipotent favourite; all thoughts of war being presently laid aside, (though there was a faint looking towards the relief of Rochelle by the fleet, that was ready under the command of the earl of Lindsey, and the provisions for peace and plenty taken to heart; it will not be unuseful nor unpleasant to enlarge the digression, before a return to the proper subject of the discourse, by a prospect of the constitution of the court, after that bright star was shot out of the horizon; who were the chief ministers, that had the principal management of public affairs in church and state; and how equal their faculties and qualifications were for those high transactions; in which mention shall be only made of those who were then in the highest trust; there being at that time no ladies, who had disposed themselves to intermeddle in business: and hereafter, when that activity began, and made any progress, it will be again necessary to take a new survey of the court upon that alteration.

Sir Thomas Coventry was then lord keeper of the great seal of England, and newly made a baron. He was a son of the robe, his father having been a judge in the court of the common pleas; who took great care to breed his son, though his first-born, in the study of the common law; by which himself had been promoted to that degree; and in which, in the society of the Inner Temple, his son made a notable progress, by an early eminence in practice and learning: insomuch as he was recorder of London, solicitor general, and king's attorney, before he was forty years of age. A rare ascent! All which offices he discharged with great abilities, and singular reputation of integrity. In the first year after the death of king James, he was advanced to be keeper of the great seal of England (the natural advancement from the office of attorney general) upon the removal of the bishop of Lincoln; who, though a man of great wit and good scholastic learning, was generally thought so very unequal to the place, that his remove was the only recompense and satisfaction that could be made for his promotion. And yet it was enough known, that the disgrace proceeded only from the private displeasure of the duke of Buckingham. The lord Coventry enjoyed this place with an universal reputation (and sure justice was never better administered) for the space of about sixteen years, even to his death, some months before he was sixty years of age; which was another important circumstance of his felicity, that great office being so slippery, that no man had died in it before for near the space of forty years. Nor had his successors, for some time after him, much better fortune. And he himself had use of all his strength and skill (as he was an excellent wrestler) to preserve himself from falling, in two shocks: the one given him by the earl of Portland, lord high treasurer of England; the other by the marquis of Hamilton, who had the greatest power over the affections of the king of any man of that time.

He was a man of wonderful gravity and wisdom; and understood not only the whole science and mystery of the law, at least equally with any man who had ever sate in that place; but had a clear conception of the whole policy of the government both of church and state, which, by the unskilfulness of some well-meaning men, justified each the other too much.

He knew the temper and disposition and genius of the kingdom most exactly; saw their spirits grow every day more sturdy and inquisitive and impatient; and therefore naturally abhorred all innovations which he foresaw would produce ruinous effects. Yet many, who stood at a distance, thought that he was not active and stout enough in the opposing those innovations. For though, by his place, he presided in all public councils, and was most sharp-sighted in the consequence of things; yet he was seldom known to speak in matters of state, which, he well knew, were for the most part concluded, before they were brought to that public agitation; never in foreign affairs, which the vigour of his judgment could well comprehend; nor indeed freely in any thing, but what immediately and plainly concerned the justice of the kingdom; and in that, as much as he could, he procured references to the judges. Though in his nature he had not only a firm gravity, but a severity, and even some morosity, (which his children and domestics had evidence enough of,) yet it was so happily tempered, and his courtesy and affability towards all men was so transcendent, so much without affectation, that it marvellously reconciled to all men of all degrees, and he was looked upon as an excellent courtier, without receding from the native simplicity of his own manner.

He had, in the plain way of speaking and delivery, without much ornament of elocution, a strange power of making himself believed, the only justifiable design of eloquence: so that though he used very frankly to deny, and would never suffer any man to depart from him with an opinion that he was inclined to gratify, when in truth he was not, holding that dissimulation to be the worst of lying; yet the manner of it was so gentle and obliging, and his condescension such, to inform the persons whom he could not satisfy, that few departed from him with ill will, and ill wishes.

But then, this happy temper and these good faculties rather preserved him from having many enemies, and supplied him with some well-wishers, than furnished him with any fast and unshaken friends; who are always procured in courts by more ardour, and more vehement professions and applications, than he would suffer himself to be entangled with. So that he was a man rather exceedingly liked, than passionately loved: insomuch that it never appeared, that he had any one friend in the court, of quality enough to prevent or divert any disadvantage he might be exposed to. And therefore it is no wonder, nor to be imputed to him, that he retired within himself as much as he could, and stood upon his defence without making desperate sallies against growing mischiefs; which, he knew well, he had no power to hinder, and which might probably begin in his own ruin. To conclude; his security consisted very much in the little credit he had with the king; and he died in a season most opportune, and in which a wise man would have prayed to have finished his course, and which in truth crowned his other signal prosperity in the world.

Sir Richard Weston had been advanced to the white staff, to the office of lord high treasurer of England, some months before the death of the duke of Buckingham; and had, in that short time, so much obliged him, at least disappointed his expectation, that many, who were privy to the duke's most secret purposes, did believe, that, if he had outlived that voyage in which he was engaged, he would have removed him, and made another treasurer. And it is very true, that great office too had been very slippery, and not fast to those who had trusted themselves in it: insomuch as there were at that time five noble persons alive, who had all succeeded one another immediately in that unsteady charge, without any other person intervening: the earl of Suffolk; the lord viscount Mandeville, afterwards earl of Manchester; the earl of Middlesex; and the earl of Marlborough, who was removed under pretence of his age and disability for the work, (which had been a better reason against his promotion, so few years before, that his infirmities were very little increased,) to make room for the present officer; who, though advanced by the duke, may properly be said to be established by his death.

He was a gentleman of a very good and ancient extraction by father and mother. His education had been very good amongst books and men. After some years study of the law in the Middle Temple, he travelled into foreign parts, and at an age fit to make observations and reflections; out of which, that which is commonly called experience is constituted. After this he betook himself to the court, and lived there some years; at that distance, and with that awe, as was agreeable to the modesty of the age, when men were seen some time before they were known; and well known before they were preferred, or durst pretend to be preferred.

He spent the best part of his fortune (a fair one, that he inherited from his father) in his attendance at court, and involved his friends in securities with him, who were willing to run his hopeful fortune, before he received the least fruit from it, but the countenance of great men and those in authority, the most natural and most certain stairs to ascend by.

He was then sent ambassador to the archdukes, Albert and Isabella, into Flanders; and to the diet in Germany, to treat about the restitution of the palatinate; in which negotiation he behaved himself with great prudence, and with the concurrent testimony of a wise man, from all those with whom he treated, princes and ambassadors, and upon his return was made a privy counsellor, and chancellor of the exchequer, in the place of the lord Brooke, who was either persuaded, or put out of the place; which, being an office of honour and trust, is likewise an excellent stage for men of parts to tread, and expose themselves upon; and where they have occasion of all natures to lay out and spread all their faculties and qualifications most for their advantage. He behaved himself very well in this function, and appeared equal to it; and carried himself so luckily in parliament, that he did his master much service, and preserved himself in the good opinion and acception of the house; which is a blessing not indulged to many by those high powers. He did swim in those troubled and boisterous waters, in which the duke of Buckingham rode as admiral, with a good grace, when very many who were about him were drowned, or forced on shore with shrewd hurts and bruises: which shewed he knew well how and when to use his limbs and strength to the best advantage; sometimes only to avoid sinking, and sometimes to advance and get ground: and by this dexterity he kept his credit with those who could do him good, and lost it not with others, who desired the destruction of those upon whom he most depended.

He was made lord treasurer in the manner and at the time mentioned before, upon the removal of the earl of Marlborough, and few months before the death of the duke. The former circumstance, which is often attended by compassion towards the degraded, and prejudice towards the promoted brought him no disadvantage: for besides the delight that season had in changes, there was little reverence towards the person removed; and the extreme visible poverty of the exchequer sheltered that province from the envy it had frequently created, and opened a door for much applause to be the portion of a wise and provident minister. For the other, of the duke's death, though some, who knew the duke's passions and prejudice, (which often produced rather sudden indisposition, than obstinate resolution,) believed he would have been shortly cashiered, as so many had lately been; and so that the death of his founder was a greater confirmation of him in the office, than the delivery of the white staff had been: many other wise men, who knew the treasurer's talent in removing prejudice, and reconciling himself to wavering and doubtful affections, believed, that the loss of the duke was very unseasonable; and that the awe or apprehension of his power and displeasure was a very necessary allay for the impetuosity of the new officer's nature, which needed some restraint and check, for some time, to his immoderate pretences and appetite of power.

He did indeed appear on the sudden wonderfully elated, and so far threw off his old affectation to please some very much, and to displease none, in which art he had excelled, that in few months after the duke's death he found himself to succeed him in the public displeasure, and in the malice of his enemies, without succeeding him in his credit at court, or in the affection of any considerable dependants. And yet, though he was not superior to all other men in the affection, or rather resignation, of the king, so that he might dispense favours and disfavours according to his own election, he had a full share in his master's esteem, who looked upon him as a wise and able servant, and worthy of the trust he reposed in him, and received no other advice in the large business of his revenue; nor was any man so much his superior, as to be able to lessen him in the king's affection by his power. So that he was in a post, in which he might have found much ease and delight, if he could have contained himself within the verge of his own province, which was large enough, and of such an extent, that he might, at the same time, have drawn a great dependence upon him of very considerable men, and appeared a very useful and profitable minister to the king; whose revenue had been very loosely managed during the late years, and might, by industry and order, have been easily improved: and no man better understood what method was necessary towards that good husbandry, than he.

But I know not by what frowardness in his stars, he took more pains in examining and inquiring into other men's offices, than in the discharge of his own; and not so much joy in what he had, as trouble and agony for what he had not. The truth is, he had so vehement a desire to be the sole favourite, that he had no relish of the power he had: and in that contention he had many rivals, who had credit enough to do him ill offices, though not enough to satisfy their own ambition; the king himself being resolved to hold the reins in his own hands, and to put no further trust in others, than was necessary for the capacity they served in. Which resolution in his majesty was no sooner believed, and the treasurer's pretence taken notice [of,] than he found the number of his enemies exceedingly increased, and others to be less eager in the pursuit of his friendship; and every day discovered some infirmities in him, which being before known to few, and not taken notice of, did now expose him both to public reproach, and to private animosities; and even his vices admitted those contradictions in them, that he could hardly enjoy the pleasant fruit of any of them. That which first exposed him to the public jealousy, which is always attended with public reproach, was the concurrent suspicion of his religion. His wife and all his daughters were declared of the Romish religion: and though himself, and his sons, sometimes went to church, he was never thought to have zeal for it; and his domestic conversation and dependants, with whom only he used entire freedom, were all known catholics, and were believed to be agents for the rest. And yet, with all this disadvantage to himself, he never had reputation and credit with that party, who were the only people of the kingdom who did not believe him to be of their profession. For the penal laws (those only excepted which were sanguinary, and even those sometimes let loose) were never more rigidly executed, nor had the crown ever so great a revenue from them, as in his time; nor did they ever pay so dear for the favours and indulgences of his office towards them.

No man had greater ambition to make his family great, or stronger designs to leave a great fortune to it. Yet his expenses were so prodigiously great, especially in his house, that all the ways he used for supply, which were all that occurred, could not serve his turn; insomuch that he contracted so great debts, (the anxiety whereof, he pretended, broke his mind, and restrained that intemperance and industry, which was necessary for the due execution of his office,) that the king was pleased twice to pay his debts; at least, towards it, to disburse forty thousand pounds in ready money out of his exchequer. Besides, his majesty gave him a whole forest (Chute forest in Hampshire) and much other land belonging to the crown; which was the more taken notice of, and murmured against, because, being the chief minister of the revenue, he was particularly obliged, as much as in him lay, to prevent, and even oppose, such disinherison; and because, under that obligation, he had, avowedly and sourly, crossed the pretences of other men, and restrained the king's bounty from being exercised almost to any. And he had that advantage, (if he had made the right use of it,) that his credit was ample enough (seconded by the king's own experience, and observation, and inclination) to retrench very much of the late unlimited expenses, and especially those of bounties; which from the death of the duke ran in narrow channels, which never so much overflowed as towards himself, who stopped the current to other men.

He was of an imperious nature, and nothing wary in disobliging and provoking other men, and had too much courage in offending and incensing them: but after having offended and incensed them, he was of so unhappy a feminine temper, that he was always in a terrible fright and apprehension of them.

He had not that application, and submission, and reverence for the queen, as might have been expected from his wisdom and breeding, and often crossed her pretences and desires, with more rudeness than was natural to him. Yet he was imperitently solicitous to know what her majesty said of him in private, and what resentments she had towards him. And when by some confidants, who had their ends upon him from those offices, he was informed of some bitter expressions fallen from her majesty, he was so exceedingly afflicted and tormented with the sense of it, that sometimes by passionate complaints and representations to the king; sometimes by more dutiful addresses and expostulations with the queen, in bewailing his misfortunes; he frequently exposed himself, and left his condition worse than it was before: and the eclaireissement commonly ended in the discovery of the persons from whom he had received his most secret intelligence.

He quickly lost the character of a bold, stout, and magnanimous man, which he had been long reputed to be in worse times; and, in his most prosperous season, fell under the reproach of being a man of big looks, and of a mean and abject spirit.

There was a very ridiculous story at that time in the mouths of many, which, being a known truth, may not be unfitly mentioned in this place, as a kind of illustration of the humour and nature of the man. Sir Julius Cæsar was then master of the rolls, and had, inherent in his office, the indubitable right and disposition of the six clerks' places; all which he had, for many years, upon any vacancy, bestowed to such persons as he thought fit. One of those places was become void, and designed by the old man to his son Robert Cæsar, a lawyer of a good name, and exceedingly beloved. The treasurer (as he was vigilant in such cases) had notice of the clerk's expiration so soon, that he procured the king to send a message to the master of the rolls, expressly forbidding him to dispose of that six-clerk's place, till his majesty's pleasure should be further made known to him. It was the first command of that kind that had been heard of, and was felt by the old man very sensibly. He was indeed very old, and had outlived most of his friends, so that his age was an objection against him; many persons of quality being dead, who had, for recompense of services, procured the reversion of his office. The treasurer found it no hard matter so far to terrify him, that (for the king's service, as was pretended) he admitted for a six-clerk a person recommended by him, (Mr. Fern, a dependant upon him,) who paid six thousand pound ready money; which, poor man! he lived to repent in a gaol. This work being done at the charge of the poor old man, who had been a privy-counsellor from the entrance of king James, had been chancellor of the exchequer, and served in other offices; the depriving him of his right made a great noise: and the condition of his son, (his father being not like to live to have the disposal of another office in his power,) who, as was said before, was generally beloved and esteemed, was argument of great compassion, and was lively and successfully represented to the king himself; who was graciously pleased to promise, that, "if the old man chanced to die

"before any other of the six-clerks, that office, when it should fall, should be conferred on his son, whosoever should succeed him as master of the rolls;" which might well be provided for; and the lord treasurer obliged himself (to expiate for the injury) to procure some declaration to that purpose, under his majesty's sign manual; which, however easy to be done, he long forgot, or neglected.

One day the earl of Tullibardine, who was nearly allied to Mr. Cæsar, and much his friend, being with the treasurer, passionately asked him, "Whether he had done that business?" To whom he answered with a seeming trouble, "That he had forgotten it, for which he was heartily sorry; and if he would give him a little in writing, for a memorial, he would put it amongst those which he would despatch with the king that afternoon." The earl presently writ in a little paper, Remember Cæsar; and gave it to him; and he put it into that little pocket, where, he said, he kept all his memorials which were first to be transacted.

Many days passed, and Cæsar never thought of. At length, when he changed his clothes, and he who waited on him in his chamber, according to custom, brought him all the notes and papers which were left in those he had left off, which he then commonly perused; when he found this little billet, in which was only written, Remember Cæsar, and which he had never read before, he was exceedingly confounded, and knew not what to make or think of it. He sent for his bosom friends, with whom he most confidently consulted, and shewed the paper to them, the contents whereof he could not conceive; but that it might probably have been put into his hand (because it was found in that enclosure, wherein he put all things of moment which were given him) when he was in motion, and in the privy lodgings in the court. After a serious and melancholic deliberation, it was agreed, that it was the advertisement from some friend, who durst not own the discovery: that it could signify nothing but that there was a conspiracy against his life, by his many and mighty enemies: and they all knew Cæsar's fate, by contemning or neglecting such animadversions. And therefore they concluded, that he should pretend to be indisposed, that he might not stir abroad all that day, nor that any might be admitted to him, but persons of undoubted affections; that at night the gate should be shut early, and the porter enjoined to open it to nobody, nor to go himself to bed till the morning; and that some servants should watch with him, lest violence might be used at the gate; and that they themselves, and some other gentlemen, would sit up all the night, and attend the event. Such houses are always in the morning haunted by early suitors; but it was very late before any could now get admittance into the house, the porter having quitted some of that arrear of sleep, which he owed to himself for his night's watching; which he excused to his acquaintance, by whispering to them, "That his lord should have been killed that night, which had kept all the house from going to bed." And shortly after, the earl of Tullibardine asking him, whether he had remembered Cæsar; the treasurer quickly recollected the ground of his perturbation, and could not forbear imparting it to his friends, who likewise affected the communication, and so the whole jest came to be discovered.

To conclude, all the honours the king conferred upon him (as he made him a baron, then an earl, and knight of the garter; and above this, gave a young beautiful lady nearly allied to him, and to the crown of Scotland, in marriage to his eldest son) could not make him think himself great enough. Nor could all the king's bounties, nor his own large accessions, raise a fortune to his heir; but after six or eight years spent in outward opulency, and inward murmur and trouble that it was no greater; after vast sums of money and great wealth gotten, and rather consumed than enjoyed, without any sense or delight in so great prosperity, with the agony that it was no greater; he died unlamented by any; bitterly mentioned by most who never pretended to love him, and severely censured and complained of by those who expected most from him, and deserved best of him; and left a numerous family, which was in a short time worn out, and yet outlived the fortune he left behind him.

The next greatest counsellor of state was the lord privy-seal, who was likewise of a noble extraction, and of a family at that time very fortunate. His grandfather had been lord chief justice, and left by king Harry the Eighth one of the executors of his last will. He was the younger son of his father, and brought up in the study of the law in the Middle Temple; and had passed through, and, as it were, made a progress through all the eminent degrees of the law, and in the state. At the death of queen Elizabeth, or thereabouts, he was recorder of London; then the king's sergeant at law; afterwards chief justice of the king's bench. Before the death of king James, by the favour of the duke of Buckingham, he was raised to the place of lord high treasurer of England; and within less than a year afterwards, by the withdrawing of that favour, he was reduced to the empty title of president of the council; and, to allay the sense of the dishonour, created viscount Mandevile. He bore the diminution very well, as he was a wise man, and of an excellent temper, and quickly recovered so much grace, that he was made lord privy-seal, and earl of Manchester, and enjoyed that office to his death; whilst he saw many removes and degradations in all the other offices of which he had been possessed.

He was a man of great industry and sagacity in business, which he delighted in exceedingly; and preserved so great a vigour of mind, even to his death, (when he was very near eighty years of age,) that some, who had known him in his younger years, did believe him to have much quicker parts in his age, than before. His honours had grown faster upon him than his fortunes; which made him too solicitous to advance the latter, by all the ways which offered themselves; whereby he exposed himself to some inconvenience, and many reproaches, and became less capable of serving the public by his counsels and authority; which his known wisdom, long experience, and confessed gravity and ability, would have enabled him to have done; most men considering more the person that speaks, than the things he says. And he was unhappily too much used as a check upon the lord Coventry; and when the other perplexed their counsels and designs with inconvenient objections in law, his authority, who had trod the same paths, was still called upon; and he did too frequently gratify their unjustifiable designs and pretences: a guilt and mischief, all men who are obnoxious, or who are thought to be so, are liable to, and can hardly preserve themselves from. But his virtues so far weighed down his infirmities, that he maintained a good general reputation and credit with the whole nation and people; he being always looked upon as full of integrity and zeal to the protestant religion, as it was established by law, and of unquestionable loyalty, duty, and fidelity to the king; which two qualifications will ever gather popular breath enough to fill the sails, if the vessel be competently provided with ballast. He died in a lucky time, in the beginning of the rebellion, when neither religion, or loyalty, or law, or wisdom, could have provided for any man's security.

The earl of Arundel was next to the officers of state, who, in his own right and quality, preceded the rest of the council. He was a man supercilious and proud, who lived always within himself, and to himself, conversing little with any who were in common conversation; so that he seemed to live as it were in another nation, his house being a place to which all men resorted, who resorted to no other place; strangers, or such who affected to look like strangers, and dressed themselves accordingly. He resorted sometimes to the court, because there only was a greater man than himself; and went thither the seldomer, because there was a greater man than himself. He lived towards all favourites, and great officers, without any kind of condescension; and rather suffered himself to be ill treated by their power and authority (for he was always in disgrace, and once or twice prisoner in the Tower) than to descend in making any application to them.

And upon these occasions he spent a great interval of his time in several journeys into foreign parts, and, with his wife and family, had lived some years in Italy, the humour and manners of which nation he seemed most to like and approve, and affected to imitate. He had a good fortune by descent, and a much greater from his wife, who was the sole daughter upon the matter (for neither of the two sisters left any issue) of the great house of Shrewsbury: but his expenses were without any measure, and always exceeded very much his revenue. He was willing to be thought a scholar, and to understand the most mysterious parts of antiquity, because he made a wonderful and costly purchase of excellent statues, whilst he was in Italy and in Rome, (some whereof he could never obtain permission to remove from Rome, though he had paid for them,) and had a rare collection of the most curious medals; whereas in truth he was only able to buy them, never to understand them; and as to all parts of learning he was almost illiterate, and thought no other part of history considerable, but what related to his own family; in which, no doubt, there had been some very memorable persons. It cannot be denied that he had in his person, in his aspect, and countenance, the appearance of a great man, which he preserved in his gait and motion. He wore and affected a habit very different from that of the time, such as men had only beheld in the pictures of the most considerable men; all which drew the eyes of most, and the reverence of many, towards him, as the image and representative of the primitive nobility, and native gravity of the nobles, when they had been most venerable: but this was only his outside, his nature and true humour being so much disposed to vulgar delights, which indeed were very despicable and childish. He was never suspected to love anybody, nor to have the least propensity to justice, charity, or compassion, so that though he got all he could, and by all the ways he could, and spent much more than he got or had; he was never known to give any thing, nor in all his employments (for he had employments of great profit as well as honour, being sent ambassador extraordinary into Germany, for the treaty of that general peace, for which he had great appointments, and in which he did nothing of the least importance, and which is more wonderful, he was afterwards made general of the army raised for Scotland, and received full pay as such; and in his own office of earl marshal, more money was drawn from the people by his avidity and pretence of jurisdiction, than had ever been extorted by all the officers preceding,) yet, I say, in all his offices and employments, never man used or employed by him, ever got any fortune under him, nor did ever any man acknowledge any obligation to him. He was rather thought to be without religion, than to incline to this or that party of any; he would have been a proper instrument for any tyranny, if he could have a man tyrant enough to have been advised by him, and had no other affection for the nation or the kingdom, than as he had a great share in it, in which, like the great leviathan, he might sport himself; from which he withdrew himself, as soon as he discerned the repose thereof was like to be disturbed, and died in Italy, under the same doubtful character of religion in which he lived.

William earl of Pembroke was next, a man of another mould and making, and of another fame and reputation with all men, being the most universally loved and esteemed of any man of that age; and, having a great office in the court, he made the court itself better esteemed, and more revered in the country. And as he had a great number of friends of the best men, so no man had ever the wickedness to avow himself to be his enemy. He was a man very well bred, and of excellent parts, and a graceful speaker upon any subject, having a good proportion of learning, and a ready wit to apply it, and enlarge upon it; of a pleasant and facetious humour, and a disposition affable, generous, and magnificent. He was master of a great fortune from his ancestors, and had a great addition by his wife, another daughter and heir of the earl of Shrewsbury, which he enjoyed during his life, she outliving him: but all served not his expense, which was only limited by his great mind, and occasions to use it nobly.

He lived many years about the court, before in it; and never by it; being rather regarded and esteemed by king James, than loved and favoured. After the foul fall of the earl of Somerset, he was made lord chamberlain of the king's house, more for the court's sake than his own; and the court appeared with the more lustre, because he had the government of that province. As he spent and lived upon his own fortune, so he stood upon his own feet, without any other support than of his proper virtue and merit; and lived towards the favourites with that decency, as would not suffer them to censure or reproach his master's judgment and election, but as with men of his own rank. He was exceedingly beloved in the court, because he never desired to get that for himself, which others laboured for, but was still ready to promote the pretences of worthy men. And he was equally celebrated in the country, for having received no obligations from the court which might corrupt or sway his affections and judgment; so that all who were displeased and unsatisfied in the court, or with the court, were always inclined to put themselves under his banner, if he would have admitted them; and yet he did not so reject them, as to make them choose another shelter, but so far to depend on him, that he could restrain them from breaking out beyond private resentments and murmurs.

He was a great lover of his country, and of the religion and justice, which he believed could only support it; and his friendships were only with men of those principles. And as his conversation was most with men of the most pregnant parts and understanding, so towards any, who needed support or encouragement, though unknown, if fairly recommended to him, he was very liberal. And sure never man was planted in a court, that was fitter for that soil, or brought better qualities with him to purify that air.

Yet his memory must not be so flattered, that his virtues and good inclinations may be believed without some alloy of vice, and without being clouded with great infirmities, which he had in too exorbitant a proportion. He indulged to himself the pleasures of all kinds, almost in all excesses. To women, whether out of his natural constitution, or for want of his domestic content and delight, (in which he was most unhappy, for he paid much too dear for his wife's fortune, by taking her person into the bargain,) he was immoderately given up. But therein he likewise retained such a power and jurisdiction over his very appetite, that he was not so much transported with beauty and outward allurements, as with those advantages of the mind, as manifested an extraordinary wit, and spirit, and knowledge, and administered great pleasure in the conversation. To these he sacrificed himself, his precious time, and much of his fortune. And some, who were nearest his trust and friendship, were not without apprehension, that his natural vivacity and vigour of mind began to lessen and decline by those excessive indulgences.

About the time of the death of king James, or presently after, he was made lord steward of his majesty's house, that the staff of chamberlain might be put into the hands of his brother, the earl of Montgomery, upon a new contract of friendship with the duke of Buckingham; after whose death, he had likewise such offices of his, as he most affected, of honour and command; none of profit, which he cared not for; and within two years after, he died himself of an apoplexy, after a full and cheerful supper.

A short story may not be unfitly inserted, it being very frequently mentioned by the person whose character is here undertaken to be set down, and who, at that time, being on his way to London, met at Maidenhead some persons of quality, of relation or dependance upon the earl of Pembroke, sir Charles Morgan, commonly called General Morgan, who had commanded an army in Germany, and defended Stoad; Dr. Feild, then bishop of Saint David's; and Dr. Chafin, the earl's then chaplain in his house, and much in his favour. At supper one of them drank a health to the lord steward: upon which another of them said, "that he believed his lord was at that "time very merry, for he had now outlived the "day, which his tutor Sandford had prognosticated upon his nativity he would not outlive; "which he had done now, for that was his birth-day, which had completed his age to fifty years." The next morning, by the time they came to Colebrook, they met with the news of his death.

He died exceedingly lamented by all qualities of men, and left many of his servants and dependants owners of good estates, raised out of his employments and bounty. Nor had his heir cause to complain: for though his expenses had been very magnificent, (and it may be the less considered, and his providence the less, because he had no child to inherit,) insomuch as he left a great debt charged upon the estate; yet considering the wealth he left in jewels, plate, and furniture, and the estate his brother enjoyed in the right of his wife (who was not fit to manage it herself) during her long life, he may be justly said to have inherited as good an estate from him, as he had from his father, which was one of the best in England.

The earl of Montgomery, who was then lord chamberlain of the household, and now earl of Pembroke, and the earl of Dorset, were likewise of the privy-council; men of very different talents and qualifications. The former being a young man, scarce of age at the entrance of king James, had the good fortune, by the comeliness of his person, his skill, and indefatigable industry in hunting, to be the first who drew the king's eyes towards him with affection; which was quickly so far improved, that he had the reputation of a favourite. And before the end of the first or second year, he was made gentleman of the king's bedchamber, and earl of Montgomery; which did the king no harm: for besides that he received the king's bounty with more moderation than other men, who succeeded him, he was generally known, and as generally esteemed; being the son and younger brother to the earl of Pembroke, who liberally supplied his expense, beyond what his annuity from his father would bear.

He pretended to no other qualifications, than to understand horses and dogs very well, which his master loved him the better for, (being, at his first coming into England, very jealous of those who had the reputation of great parts,) and to be believed honest and generous, which made him many friends, and left him no enemy. He had not sat many years in that sunshine, when a new comet appeared in court, Robert Carr, a Scotsman, quickly after declared favourite: upon whom the king no sooner fixed his eyes, but the earl, without the least murmur or indisposition, left all doors open for his entrance; (a rare temper! and could proceed from nothing, but his great perfection in loving field sports;) which the king received as so great an obligation, that he always after loved him in the second place, and commended him to his son at his death, as a man to be relied on in point of honesty and fidelity; though it appeared afterwards, that he was not strongly built, nor had sufficient ballast to endure a storm; of which more will be said hereafter.

The other, the earl of Dorset, was, to all intents, principles, and purposes, another man; his person beautiful, and graceful, and vigorous; his wit pleasant, sparkling, and sublime; and his other parts of learning, and language, of that lustre, that he could not miscarry in the world. The vices he had were of the age, which he was not stubborn enough to condemn or resist. He was a younger brother, grandchild to the great treasurer Buckhurst, created, at the king's first entrance, earl of Dorset, who outlived his father, and took care and delight in the education of his grandchild, and left him a good support for a younger brother, besides a wife, who was heir to a fair fortune. As his person and parts were such as are before mentioned, so he gave them full scope, without restraint; and indulged to his appetite all the pleasures that season of his life (the fullest of jollity and riot of any that preceded or succeeded) could tempt or suggest to him.

He entered into a fatal quarrel, upon a subject very unwarrantable, with a young nobleman of Scotland, the lord Bruce; upon which they both transported themselves into Flanders, and attended only by two surgeons placed at a distance, and under an obligation not to stir but upon the fall of one of them, they fought under the walls of Antwerp, where the lord Bruce fell dead upon the place; and sir Edward Sackville (for so he was then called) being likewise hurt, retired into the next monastery, which was at hand. Nor did this miserable accident, which he did always exceedingly lament, make that thorough impression upon him, but that he indulged still too much to those importunate and insatiate appetites, even of that individual person, that had so lately embarked him in that desperate enterprise; being too much tinder not to be inflamed with those sparks.

His elder brother did not enjoy his grandfather's title many years, before it descended, for want of heirs male, to the younger brother. But in these few years, by an excess of expense in all the ways to which money can be applied, he so entirely consumed almost the whole great fortune that descended to him, that, when he was forced to leave the title to his younger brother, he left upon the matter nothing to him to support it; which exposed him to many difficulties and inconveniences. Yet his known great parts, and the very good general reputation he had, notwithstanding his defects, acquired, (for as he was eminent in the house of commons, whilst he sat there; so he shined in the house of peers, when he came to move in that sphere,) inclined king James to call him to his privy-council before his death. And if he had not too much cherished his natural constitution and propensity, and been too much grieved and wrung by an uneasy and strait fortune, he would have been an excellent man of business; for he had a very sharp, discerning spirit, and was a man of an obliging nature, much honour, and great generosity, and of most entire fidelity to the crown.

There were two other persons of much authority in the council, because of great name in the court; as they deserved to be, being, without doubt, two as accomplished courtiers as were found in the palaces of all the princes in Europe; and the greatest (if not too great) improvers of that breeding, and those qualifications, with which courts use to be adorned; the earl of Carlisle, and earl of Holland: both, (though men of pleasure,) by their long experience in court, well acquainted with the affairs of the kingdom, and better versed in those abroad, than any other who sat then at that board.

The former, a younger brother of a noble family in Scotland, came into the kingdom with king James, as a gentleman; under no other character, than a person well qualified by his breeding in France, and by study in human learning, in which he bore a good part in the entertainment of the king, who much delighted in that exercise; and by these means, and notable gracefulness in his behaviour, and affability, in which he excelled, he had wrought himself into a particular interest with his master, and into greater affection and esteem with the whole English nation, than any other of that country; by choosing their friendships and conversation, and really preferring it to any of his own: insomuch as upon the king's making him gentleman of his bedchamber and viscount Doncaster, and by his royal mediation (in which office he was a most prevalent prince) he obtained the sole daughter and heir of the lord Denny to be given him in marriage; by which he had a fair fortune in land provided for any issue he should raise, and which his son by that lady lived long to enjoy.

He ascended afterwards, and with the expedition he desired, to the other conveniences of the court. He was groom of the stole, and an earl, and knight of the garter; and married a beautiful young lady, daughter to the earl of Northumberland, without any other approbation of her father, or concernment in it, than suffering him and her to come into his presence after they were married. He lived rather in a fair intelligence than any friendship with the favourites; having credit enough with his master to provide for his own interest, and he troubled not himself for that of other men; and had no other consideration of money, than for the support of his lustre; and whilst he could do that, he cared not for money, having no bowels in the point of running in debt, or borrowing all he could.

He was surely a man of the greatest expense in his own person, of any in the age he lived; and introduced more of that expense in the excess of clothes and diet, than any other man; and was indeed the original of all those inventions, from which others did but transcribe copies. He had a great universal understanding, and could have taken as much delight in any other way, if he had thought any other as pleasant, and worth his care. But he found business was attended with more rivals and vexation; and, he thought, with much less pleasure, and not more innocence.

He left behind him the reputation of a very fine gentleman, and a most accomplished courtier; and after having spent, in a very jovial life, above four hundred thousand pounds, which, upon a strict computation, he received from the crown, he left not a house, nor acre of land, to be remembered by. And when he had in his prospect (for he was very sharp-sighted, and saw as far before him as most men) the gathering together of that cloud in Scotland, which shortly after covered both kingdoms, he died with as much tranquillity of mind to all appearance, as used to attend a man of more severe exercise of virtue, and as little apprehension of death, which he expected many days.

The earl of Holland was a younger son of a noble house, and a very fruitful bed, which divided a numerous issue between two great fathers; the eldest, many sons and daughters to the lord Rich; the younger, of both sexes, to Mountjoy earl of Devonshire, who had been more than once married to the mother. The reputation of his family gave him no great advantage in the world, though his eldest brother was earl of Warwick, and owner of a great fortune; and his younger earl of Newport, of a very plentiful revenue likewise. He, after some time spent in France, betook himself to the war in Holland, which he intended to have made his profession; where, after he had made two or three campaigns, according to the custom of the English volunteers, he came in the leisure of the winter to visit his friends in England, and the court, that shined then in the plenty and bounty of king James; and about the time of the infancy of the duke of Buckingham's favour, to whom he grew in a short time very acceptable. But his friendship was more entire to the earl of Carlisle, who was more of his nature and humour, and had a generosity more applicable at that time to his fortune and his ends. And it was thought by many who stood within view, that for some years he supported himself upon the familiarity and friendship of the other; which continued mutually between them very many years, with little interruption, to their death.

He was a very handsome man, of a lovely and winning presence, and gentle conversation; by which he got so easy an admission into the court, and grace of king James, that he gave over the thought of further intending the life of a soldier. He took all the ways he could to endear himself to the duke, and to his confidence, and wisely declined the receiving any grace or favour, but as his donation; above all, avoided the suspicion that the king had any kindness for him, upon any account but of the duke, whose creature he desired to be esteemed, though the earl of Carlisle's friend. And he prospered so well in that pretence, that the king scarce made more haste to advance the duke, than the duke did to promote the other.

He first preferred him to a wife, the daughter and heir of Cope, by whom he had a good fortune; and, amongst other things, the manor and seat of Kensington, of which he was shortly after made baron. And he had quickly so entire a confidence in him, that he prevailed with the king to put him about his son the prince of Wales, and to be a gentleman of his bedchamber, before the duke himself had reason to promise himself any proportion of his highness's grace and protection. He was then made earl of Holland, captain of the guard, knight of the order, and of the privy-council; sent the first ambassador into France to treat the marriage with the queen, or rather privately to treat about the marriage before he was ambassador. And when the duke went to the Isle of Rhé, he trusted the earl of Holland with the command of that army with which he was to be recruited and assisted.

And in this confidence, and in this posture, he was left by the duke when he died; and having the advantage of the queen's good opinion and favour, (which the duke neither had, nor cared for,) he made all possible approaches towards the obtaining his trust, and succeeding him in his power; or rather that the queen might have solely that power, and he only be subservient to her; and upon this account he made a continual war upon the earl of Portland the treasurer, and all others who were not gracious to the queen, or desired not the increase of her authority. And in this state, and under this protection, he received every day new obligations from the king, and great bounties, and continued to flourish above any man in the court, whilst the weather was fair: but the storm did no sooner arise, but he changed so much, and declined so fast from the honour he was thought to be master of, that he fell into that condition, which there will be hereafter too much cause to mention, and to enlarge upon.

The two secretaries of state (which were not in those days officers of that magnitude they have been since, being only to make despatches upon the conclusion of councils, not to govern, or preside in those councils) were sir John Coke, who, upon the death of sir Albert Moreton, was, from being master of requests, preferred to be secretary of state; and sir Dudley Carleton, who, from his employment in Holland, was put into the place of the lord Conway, who, for age and incapacity, was at last removed from the secretary's office, which he had exercised for many years with very notable insufficiency; so that king James was wont pleasantly to say, "That Stenny" (the duke of Buckingham) "had given him two very proper servants; a secretary, who could neither write or read; and a groom of his bedchamber, who could not truss his points;" Mr. Clark having but one hand.

Of these two secretaries, the former was a man of a very narrow education, and a narrower nature; having continued long in the university of Cambridge, where he had gotten Latin learning enough; and afterwards in the country in the condition of a private gentleman, till after he was fifty years of age; when, upon some reputation he had for industry and diligence, he was called to some painful employment in the office of the navy, which he discharged well; and afterwards to be master of requests, and then to be secretary of state, which he enjoyed to a great age: and was a man rather unadorned with parts of vigour and quickness, and unendowed with any notable virtues, than notorious for any weakness or defect of understanding, than transported with any vicious inclinations, appetite to money only excepted. His cardinal perfection was industry, and his most eminent infirmity covetousness. His long experience had informed him well of the state and affairs of England; but of foreign transactions, or the common interest of Christian princes, he was entirely ignorant and undiscerning.

Sir Dudley Carleton was of a quite contrary nature, constitution, and education, and understood all that related to foreign employment, and the condition of other princes and nations, very well: but was utterly unacquainted with the government, laws, and customs of his own country, and the nature of the people. He was a younger son in a good gentleman's family, and bred in Christ Church, in the university of Oxford, where he was a student of the foundation, and a young man of parts and towards expectation. He went from thence early into France, and was soon after secretary to sir Harry Nevil, the ambassador there. He had been sent ambassador to Venice, where he resided many years with good reputation; and was no sooner returned from thence into England, than he went ambassador into Holland, to the States General, and resided there when that synod was assembled at Dort, which hath given the world so much occasion since for uncharitable disputations, which they were called together to prevent. Here the ambassador was not thought so equal a spectator, or assessor, as he ought to have been; but by the infusions he made into king James, and by his own activity, he did all he could to discountenance that party that was most learned, and to raise the credit and authority of the other; which has since proved as inconvenient and troublesome to their own country, as to their neighbours.

He was once more ambassador extraordinary in Holland after the death of king James, and was the last who was admitted to be present, and to vote in the general assembly of the States, under that character; of which great privilege the crown had been possessed from a great part of the reign of queen Elizabeth, and through the time of king James to that moment; which administered fresh matter of murmur for the giving up the towns of the Brill, and Flushing, which had been done some years before by king James; without which men thought those States would not have had the courage so soon to have degraded the crown of England from a place in their councils, which had prospered so eminently under the shadow of that power and support. As soon as he returned from Holland, he was called to the privy-council; and the making him secretary of state, and a peer of the realm, when his estate was scarce visible, was the last piece of workmanship the duke of Buckingham lived to finish, who seldom satisfied himself with conferring a single obligation.

The duke had observed, and discovered, that the channel, in which the church promotions had formerly run, had been liable to some corruptions, at least to many reproaches; and therefore had committed the sole representation of those affairs, and the vacancies which should happen, to Dr. Laud, then bishop of Bath and Wells, and sworn of the privy-council. And the king, after his death, continued that trust in the same hands, infinitely to the benefit and honour of the church, though, it may be, no less to the prejudice of the poor bishop; who, too secure in a good conscience, and most sincere worthy intentions, (with which no man was ever more plentifully replenished,) thought he could manage and discharge the place and office of the greatest minister in the court (for he was quickly made archbishop of Canterbury) without the least condescension to the arts and stratagems of the court, and without any other friendship, or support, than what the splendour of a pious life, and his unpolished integrity, would reconcile to him; which was an unskilful measure in a licentious age, and may deceive a good man in the best that shall succeed; which exposed him to such a torrent of adversity and misery, as we shall have too natural an occasion to lament in the following discourse, in which it will be more seasonable to enlarge upon his singular abilities, and immense virtue.

There were more (too many more) honourable persons in that time of the privy-council, whose faculties were not notorious enough to give them any great part in the affairs, nor had their advice much influence upon them. Other very notable men were shortly after added to the council, who will anon be remembered in their proper places and seasons. What hath been said before contains information enough of the persons in employment, and the state of the court and kingdom, when the duke of Buckingham was taken from it; by which, and the lively reflections upon the qualities and qualifications of the several persons in authority in court and council, no man could expect that the vigorous designs and enterprises, undertaken by the duke, would be pursued with equal resolution and courage; but that much the greater part of them would be wholly intent upon their own accommodations in their fortunes, (in which they abounded not,) and in their ease and pleasure, which they most passionately affected; having, as hath been said, no other consideration of the public, than that no disturbance therein might interrupt their quiet in their own days: and that the rest, who had larger hearts and more public spirits, would extend their labour, activity, and advice, only to secure the empire at home by all peaceable arts, and advancement of trade, which might gratify the people, and fill the empty coffers of the impoverished crown. To which end the most proper expedients were best understood by them, not to enlarge it, by continuing and propagating the war; the ways and means whereof they knew not how to comprehend; and had all the desperate imaginations and jealousies of the end and necessary consequences of it. And so they all concurred (though in nothing else) in their unanimous advice to the king "to put the quickest period he could possibly to the expensive war against the two crowns:" and, his majesty following their advice, a peace was made with both, upon better terms and conditions, and in less time, than, from the known impatience of the war, could reasonably have been expected, or hoped for. And after some short unquietness of the people, and unhappy assaults upon the prerogative by the parliament, which produced its dissolution, and thereupon some froward and obstinate disturbances in trade, there quickly followed so excellent a composure throughout the whole kingdom, that the like peace, and plenty, and universal tranquillity for ten years was never enjoyed by any nation; and was the more visible and manifest in England, by the sharp and bloody war suddenly entered into between the two neighbour crowns, and the universal conflagration, that, from the inundation of the Swedes, covered the whole empire of Germany. And so we shall return to the discourse, which this very long digression hath interrupted longer than was intended.

That proclamation, mentioned before, at the break of the last parliament, and which "inhibited all men to speak of another parliament," produced two very ill effects of different natures. It afflicted many good men (who otherwise were enough scandalized at those distempers which had incensed the king) to that degree, that it made them capable of receiving some impressions from those who were diligent in whispering and infusing an opinion into men, "that there was really an intention to alter the form of government, both in church and state; of which, said they, a greater instance cannot be given, than this public declaring that we shall have no more parliaments." Then, this freedom from the danger of such an inquisition did not only encourage ill men to all boldness and license, but wrought so far upon men less inclined to ill, (though not built for examples,) that they kept not those strict guards upon themselves they used to do; especially if they found themselves above the reach of ordinary justice, and feared not extraordinary, they by degrees thought that no fault which was like to find no punishment. Supplemental acts of state were made to supply defect of laws; and so tonnage, and poundage, and other duties upon merchandises, were collected by order of the board, which had been perversely refused to be settled by act of parliament, and new and greater impositions laid upon trade: obsolete laws were revived, and rigorously executed, wherein the subject might be taught how unthrifty a thing it was, by too strict a detaining of what was his, to put the king as strictly to inquire what was his own.

And by this ill husbandry the king received a vast sum of money from all persons of quality, or indeed of any reasonable condition throughout the kingdom, upon the law of knighthood; which, though it had a foundation in right, yet, in the circumstances of proceeding, was very grievous. And no less unjust projects of all kinds, many ridiculous, many scandalous, all very grievous, were set on foot; the envy and reproach of which came to the king, the profit to other men: insomuch as, of two hundred thousand pound drawn from the subject, by these ways, in a year, scarce fifteen hundred came to the king's use or account. To recompense the damage the crown sustained by the sale of the old lands, and by the grant of new pensions, the old laws of the forest are revived, by which not only great fines are imposed, but great annual rents intended, and like to be settled by way of contract; which burden lighted most upon persons of quality and honour, who thought themselves above ordinary oppressions, and therefore like to remember it with more sharpness. Lastly, for a spring and magazine that should have no bottom, and for an everlasting supply of all occasions, a writ is framed in a form of law, and directed to the sheriff of every county of England, "to provide a ship of war for the king's service, and to send it, amply provided and fitted, by such a day, to such a place;" and with that writ were sent to each sheriff instructions, that, "instead of a ship, he should levy upon his county such a sum of money, and return the same to the treasurer of the navy for his majesty's use, with direction, in what manner he should proceed against such as refused;" and from hence that tax had the denomination of ship-money; a word of a lasting sound in the memory of this kingdom; by which for some years really accrued the yearly sum of two hundred thousand pounds to the king's coffers: and was in truth the only project that was accounted to his own service. And, after the continued receipt of it for four years together, was at last (upon the refusal of a private gentleman to pay thirty shillings as his share) with great solemnity publicly argued before all the judges of England in the exchequer-chamber, and by the major part of them, the king's right to impose asserted, and the tax adjudged lawful; which judgment proved of more advantage and credit to the gentleman condemned (Mr. Hambden) than to the king's service.

For the better support of these extraordinary ways, and to protect the agents and instruments, who must be employed in them, and to discountenance and suppress all bold inquirers and opposers, the council-table and star-chamber enlarge their jurisdictions to a vast extent, "holding" (as Thucydides said of the Athenians) "for honourable that which pleased, and for just that which profited;" and being the same persons in several rooms, grew both courts of law to determine right, and courts of revenue to bring money into the treasury; the council-table by proclamations enjoining this, that was not enjoined by the law, and prohibiting that which was not prohibited; and the star-chamber censuring the breach, and disobedience to those proclamations, by very great fines and imprisonment; so that any disrespect to acts of state, or to the persons of statesmen, was in no time more penal, and those foundations of right, by which men valued their security, to the apprehension and understanding of wise men, never more in danger to be destroyed.

And here I cannot but again take the liberty to say, that the circumstances and proceedings in those new extraordinary cases, stratagems, and impositions, were very unpolitic, and even destructive to the services intended. As if the business of ship-money, being an imposition by the state, under the notion of necessity, upon a prospect of danger, which private persons could not modestly think themselves qualified to discern, had been managed in the same extraordinary way as the royal loan (which was the imposing the five subsidies after the second parliament spoken of before) was, men would much easier have submitted to it; as it is notoriously known, that pressure was borne with much more cheerfulness before the judgment for the king, than ever it was after; men before pleasing themselves with doing somewhat for the king's service, as a testimony of their affection, which they were not bound to do; many really believing the necessity, and therefore thinking the burden reasonable; others observing, that the access to the king was of importance, when the damage to them was not considerable; and all assuring themselves, that when they should be weary, or unwilling to continue the payment, they might resort to the law for relief, and find it. But when they heard this demanded in a court of law, as a right, and found it, by sworn judges of the law, adjudged so, upon such grounds and reasons as every stander-by was able to swear was not law, and so had lost the pleasure and delight of being kind and dutiful to the king; and, instead of giving, were required to pay, and by a logic that left no man any thing which he might call his own; they no more looked upon it as the case of one man, but the case of the kingdom, nor as an imposition laid upon them by the king, but by the judges; which they thought themselves bound in conscience to the public justice not to submit to. It was an observation long ago by Thucydides, "That men are much more passionate for injustice, than for violence; because (says he) the one coming as from an equal, seems rapine; when the other, proceeding from one stronger, is but the effect of necessity." So, when ship-money was transacted at the council-board, they looked upon it as a work of that power they were always obliged to trust, and an effect of that foresight they were naturally to rely upon. Imminent necessity, and public safety, were convincing persuasions; and it might not seem of apparent ill consequence to them, that upon an emergent occasion the regal power should fill up an hiatus, or supply an impotency in the law. But when they saw in a court of law, (that law that gave them title and posseesion of all that they had) apothegms of state urged as elements of law, judges as sharp-sighted as secretaries of state, and in the mysteries of state; judgment of law grounded upon matter of fact, of which there was neither inquiry or proof; and no reason given for the payment of the thirty shillings in question, but what concluded the estates of all the standers-by; they had no reason to hope that that doctrine, or the preachers of it, would be contained within any bounds; and it was no wonder that they, who had so little reason to be pleased with their own condition, were not less solicitous for, or apprehensive of, the inconveniences that might attend any alteration.

And here the damage and mischief cannot be expressed, that the crown and state sustained by the deserved reproach and infamy that attended the judges, by being made use of in this and the like acts of power; there being no possibility to preserve the dignity, reverence, and estimation of the laws themselves, but by the integrity and innocency of the judges. And no question, as the exorbitancy of the house of commons this parliament hath proceeded principally from their contempt of the laws, and that contempt from the scandal of that judgment; so the concurrence of the house of peers in that fury can be imputed to no one thing more, than to the irreverence and scorn the judges were justly in; who had been always before looked upon there as the oracles of the law, and the best guides and directors of their opinions and actions: and they now thought themselves excused for swerving from the rules and customs of their predecessors (who in altering and making of laws, in judging of things and persons, had always observed the advice and judgment of those sages) in not asking questions of those whom they knew nobody would believe; and thinking it a just reproach upon them, (who out of their gentleness had submitted the difficulties and mysteries of the law to be measured by the standard of general reason, and explained by the wisdom of state,) to see those men make use of the license they had taught, and determine that to be law, which they thought reasonable, or found to be convenient. If these men had preserved the simplicity of their ancestors, in severely and strictly defending the laws, other men had observed the modesty of theirs, in humbly and dutifully obeying them.

And upon this consideration it is very observable, that in the wisdom of former times, when the prerogative went highest, (as very often it hath been swoln above any pitch we have seen it at in our times,) never any court of law, very seldom any judge, or lawyer of reputation, was called upon to assist in an act of power; the crown well knowing the moment of keeping those the objects of reverence and veneration with the people: and that though it might sometimes make sallies upon them by the prerogative, yet the law would keep the people from any invasion of it, and that the king could never suffer, whilst the law and the judges were looked upon by the subject, as the asyla for their liberties, and security. And therefore you shall find the policy of many princes hath endured as sharp animadversions and reprehensions from the judges of the law, as their piety hath from the bishops of the church; imposing no less upon the people, under the reputation of justice, by the one, than of conscience and religion, by the other.

To extend this consideration of the form and circumstance of proceeding in cases of an unusual nature a little farther; as it may be most behoveful for princes in matters of grace and honour, and in conferring of favours upon their people, to transact the same as publicly as may be, and by themselves, or their ministers, to dilate upon it, and improve the lustre by any addition, or eloquence of speech; (where, it may be, every kind word, especially from the prince himself, is looked upon as a new bounty;) so it is as requisite in matters of judgment, punishment, and censure upon things, or persons, (especially when the case, in the nature of it, is unusual, and the rules in judging as extraordinary,) that the same be transacted as privately, and with as little noise and pomp of words, as may be. For (as damage is much easier borne and submitted to by generous minds, than disgrace) in the business of the ship-money, and in many other cases in the star-chamber, and at council-board, there were many impertinencies, incongruities, and insolencies, in the speeches and orations of the judges, much more offensive, and much more scandalous than the judgments and sentences themselves. Besides that men's minds and understandings were more instructed to discern the consequence of things, which before they considered not. As undoubtedly, my lord Finch's speech in the exchequer-chamber made ship-money much more abhorred and formidable, than all the commitments by the council-table, and all the distresses taken by the sheriffs in England; the major part of men (besides the common unconcernedness in other men's sufferings) looking upon those proceedings as a kind of applause to themselves, to see other men punished for not doing as they had done; which delight was quickly determined, when they found their own interest, by the unnecessary logic of that argument, no less concluded than Mr. Hambden's.

And he hath been but an ill observer of the passages of those times we speak of, who hath not seen many sober men, who have been clearly satisfied with the conveniency, necessity, and justice of many sentences, depart notwithstanding extremely offended, and scandalized with the grounds, reasons, and expressions of those who inflicted those censures; when they found themselves, thinking to be only spectators of other men's sufferings, by some unnecessary inference or declaration, in probable danger to become the next delinquents.

They who look back upon the council-books of queen Elizabeth, and the acts of the star-chamber then, shall find as high instances of power and sovereignty upon the liberty and property of the subject, as can be since given. But the art, order, and gravity of those proceedings (where short, severe, constant rules were set, and smartly pursued, and the party only felt the weight of the judgment, not the passion of his judges) made them less taken notice of, and so less grievous to the public, though as intolerable to the person: whereas, since those excellent rules of the council-board were less observed, and debates (which ought to be in private, and in the absence of the party concerned, and thereupon the judgment of the table to be pronounced by one, without the interposition of others, or reply of the party) suffered to be public, questions to be asked, passions discovered, and opinions to be promiscuously delivered; all advice, directions, reprehensions, and censures of those places grew to be in less reverence and esteem; so that, besides the delay and interruption in despatch, the justice and prudence of the counsels did not many times weigh down the infirmity and passion of the counsellors; and both suitors and offenders returned into their country, with such exceptions and arguments against persons, as brought and prepared much prejudice to whatsoever should proceed from thence; and whatever excuses shall be made, or arguments given, that upon such extraordinary occasions there was a necessity of some pains and care to convince the understandings of men with the reasons and grounds of their proceeding, (which, if what was done had been only ad informandum conscientiam without reproach, or penalty, might have been reasonable,) it is certain the inconvenience and prejudice, that grew thereby, was greater than the benefit: and the reasons of the judges being many times not the reasons of the judgment, that might more satisfactorily and more shortly been put in the sentence itself, than spread in the discourses of the censurers.

These errors (for errors they were in view, and errors they are proved by the success) are not to be imputed to the court, but to the spirit and over-activity of the lawyers themselves; who should more carefully have preserved their profession and the professors, from being profaned by those services which have rendered both so obnoxious to reproach. There were two persons of that profession, and of that time, by whose several and distinct constitutions (the one knowing nothing of nor caring for the court; the other knowing or caring for nothing else) those mischiefs were introduced; Mr. Noy, the attorney general; and sir John Finch, first, lord chief justice of the common pleas, and then lord keeper of the great seal of England.

The first, upon the great fame of his ability and learning, (and very able and learned he was,) was, by great industry and importunity from court, persuaded to accept that place, for which all other men laboured, (being the best, for profit, that profession is capable of,) and so he suffered himself to be made the king's attorney general. The court made no impression upon his manners; upon his mind it did: and though he wore about him an affected morosity, which made him unapt to flatter other men, yet even that morosity and pride rendered him the most liable to be grossly flattered himself, that can be imagined. And by this means the great persons, who steered the public affairs, by admiring his parts, and extolling his judgment as well to his face as behind his back, wrought upon him by degrees, for the eminency of the service, to be an instrument in all their designs; thinking that he could not give a clearer testimony, that his knowledge in the law was greater than all other men's, than by making that law which all other men believed not to be so. So he moulded, framed, and pursued the odious and crying project of soap; and with his own hand drew and prepared the writ for ship-money, both which will be the lasting monuments of his fame. In a word, he was an unanswerable instance, how necessary a good education and knowledge of men is to make a wise man, at least a man fit for business.

Sir John Finch had much that the other wanted, but nothing that the other had. Having led a licentious life in a restrained fortune, and having set up upon the stock of a good wit, and natural parts, without the superstructure of much knowledge in the profession by which he was to grow; [he] was willing to use those weapons in which he had most skill, and (so being not unseen in the affections of the court, but not having reputation enough to guide or reform them) he took up ship-money where Mr. Noy left it; and, being a judge, carried it up to that pinnacle, from whence he almost broke his own neck; having, in his journey thither, too much a solicitor to induce his brethren to concur in a judgment they had all cause to repent. To which, his declaration, after he was keeper of the great seal of England, must be added, upon a demurrer put in to a bill before him, which had no other equity in it, than an order of the lords of the council; "that whilst he was keeper, no man should be so saucy to dispute those orders, but that the wisdom of that board should be always ground enough for him to make a decree in "chancery;" which was so great an aggravation of the excess of that table, that it received more prejudice from that act of unreasonable countenance and respect, than from all the contempt could possibly have been offered to it. But of this no more.

Now after all this (and I hope I cannot be accused of much flattery in this inquisition) I must be so just as to say, that, during the whole time that these pressures were exercised, and those new and extraordinary ways were run, that is, from the dissolution of the parliament in the fourth year, to the beginning of this parliament, which was above twelve years, this kingdom, and all his majesty's dominions, (of the interruption in Scotland somewhat shall be said in its due time and place,) enjoyed the greatest calm, and the fullest measure of felicity, that any people in any age, for so long time together, have been blessed with; to the wonder and envy of all the parts of Christendom.

And in this comparison I am neither unmindful of, nor ungrateful for, the happy times of queen Elizabeth, or for those more happy under king James. But for the former, the doubts, hazards, and perplexities, upon a total change and alteration of religion, and some confident attempts upon a farther alteration by those who thought not the reformation enough; the charge, trouble, and anxiety of a long continued war (how prosperous and successful soever) even during that queen's whole reign; and (besides some domestic ruptures into rebellion, frequently into treason; and besides the blemish of an unparalleled act of blood upon the life of a crowned neighbour queen and ally) the fear and apprehension of what was to come (which is one of the most unpleasant kinds of melancholy) from an unknown, at least an unacknowledged, successor to the crown, clouded much of that prosperity then, which now shines with so much splendour before our eyes in chronicle.

And for the other under king James, (which indeed were excellent times bona si sua norint;) the mingling with a stranger nation, formerly not very gracious with this, which was like to have more interest of favour: the subjection to a stranger prince, whose nature and disposition they knew not: the noise of treason, the most prodigious that had ever been attempted, upon his first entrance into the kingdom: the wants of the crown not inferior to what it hath since felt, (I mean whilst it sat right on the head of the king,) and the pressures upon the subject of the same nature, and no less complained of: the absence of the prince in Spain, and the solicitude that his highness might not be disposed in marriage to the daughter of that kingdom, rendered the calm and tranquillity of that time less equal and pleasant. To which may be added the prosperity and happiness of the neighbour kingdoms not much inferior to that of this, which, according to the pulse of states, is a great diminution of their health; at least their prosperity is much improved, and more visible, by the misery and misfortunes of their neighbours.

The happiness of the times I mentioned was enviously set off by this, that every other kingdom, every other province were engaged, some entangled, and some almost destroyed, by the rage and fury of arms; those which were ambitiously in contention with their neighbours, having the view and apprehensions of the miseries and desolation, which they saw other states suffer by a civil war; whilst the kingdoms we now lament were alone looked upon as the garden of the world; Scotland (which was but the wilderness of that garden) in a full, entire, undisturbed peace, which they had never seen; the rage and barbarism (that the blood, for of the charity we speak not) of their private feuds, being composed to the reverence, or to the awe, of public justice; in a competency, if not in an excess of plenty, which they had never hope to see, and in a temper (which was the utmost we desired and hoped to see) free from rebellion: Ireland, which had been a sponge to draw, and a gulph to swallow all that could be spared, and all that could be got from England, merely to keep the reputation of a kingdom, reduced to that good degree of husbandry and government, that it not only subsisted of itself, and gave this kingdom all that it might have expected from it; but really increased the revenue of the crown forty or fifty thousand pounds a year, besides much more to the people in the traffick and trade from thence; arts and sciences fruitfully planted there; and the whole nation beginning to be so civilized, that it was a jewel of great lustre in the royal diadem.

When these outworks were thus fortified and adorned, it was no wonder if England was generally thought secure, with the advantages of its own climate; the court in great plenty, or rather (which is the discredit of plenty) excess, and luxury; the country rich, and, which is more, fully enjoying the pleasure of its own wealth, and so the easier corrupted with the pride and wantonness of it; the church flourishing with learned and extraordinary men, and (which other good times wanted) supplied with oil to feed those lamps; and the protestant religion more advanced against the church of Rome by writing, (without prejudice to other useful and godly labours,) especially by those two books of the late lord archbishop of Canterbury his grace, and of Mr. Chillingworth, than it had been from the reformation; trade increased to that degree, that we were the exchange of Christendom, (the revenue thereof to the crown being almost double to what it had been in the best times,) and the bullion of all other kingdoms brought to receive a stamp from the mint of England; all foreign merchants looking upon nothing as their own, but what they had laid up in the warehouses of this kingdom; the royal navy, in number and equipage much above former times, very formidable at sea; and the reputation of the greatness and power of the king much more with foreign princes than any of his progenitors; for those rough courses, which made him haply less loved at home, made him more feared abroad; by how much the power of kingdoms is more revered than their justice by their neighbours: and it may be, this consideration might not be the least motive, and may not be the worst excuse for those counsels. Lastly, for a complement of all these blessings, they were enjoyed by, and under the protection of, a king, of the most harmless disposition, and the most exemplary piety, the greatest example of sobriety, chastity, and mercy, that any prince hath been endowed with, (and God forgive those that have not been sensible of, and thankful for, those endowments,) and who might have said, that which Pericles was proud of, upon his deathbed, "that no Englishman had ever worn a black gown through his occasion." In a word, many wise men thought it a time, wherein those two miserable adjuncts, which Nerva was deified for uniting, imperium et libertas, were as well reconciled as is possible.

But all these blessings could but enable, not compel us to be happy: we wanted that sense, acknowledgment, and value of our own happiness, which all but we had; and took pains to make, when we could not find, ourselves miserable. There was in truth a strange absence of understanding in most, and a strange perverseness of understanding in the rest: the court full of excess, idleness, and luxury; and the country full of pride, mutiny, and discontent; every man more troubled and perplexed at that they called the violation of one law, than delighted or pleased with the observation of all the rest of the charter: never imputing the increase of their receipts, revenue, and plenty, to the wisdom, virtue, and merit of the crown, but objecting every small imposition to the exorbitancy and tyranny of the government; the growth of knowledge and learning being disrelished, for the infirmities of some learned men, and the increase of grace and favour upon the church more repined and murmured at, than the increase of piety and devotion in the church, which was as visible, acknowledged, or taken notice of; whilst the indiscretion and folly of one sermon at Whitehall was more bruited abroad, and commented upon, than the wisdom, sobriety, and devotion of a hundred.

It cannot be denied but there was sometimes preached there matter very unfit for the place, and very scandalous for the persons, who presumed often to determine things out of the verge of their own profession, and, in ordine ad spiritualia, gave unto Cæsar what Cæsar refused to receive, as not belonging to him. But it is as true (as was once said by a man fitter to be believed in that point than I, and one not suspected for flattering of the clergy) "that if the sermons of those times preached in court were collected together, and published, the world would receive the best bulk of orthodox divinity, profound learning, convincing reason, natural powerful eloquence, and admirable devotion, that hath been communicated in any age since the apostles' time." And I cannot but say, for the honour of the king, and of those who were trusted by him in his ecclesiastical collations (who have received but sad rewards for their uprightness) in those reproached, condemned times, there was not one churchman, in any degree of favour or acceptance, (and this the inquisition, that hath been since made upon them—a stricter never was in any age—must confess,) of a scandalous insufficiency in learning, or of a more scandalous condition in life; but, on the contrary, most of them of confessed eminent parts in knowledge, and of virtuous or unblemished lives. And therefore wise men knew, that that, which looked like pride in some, and like petulance in others, would, by experience in affairs, and conversation amongst men, both of which most of them wanted, be in time wrought off, or, in a new succession, reformed, and so thought the vast advantage from their learning and integrity, an ample recompense for any inconvenience from their passion; and yet, by the prodigious impiety of those times, the latter was only looked on with malice and revenge, without any reverence or gratitude for the former.

When the king found himself possessed of all that tranquillity mentioned before, that he had no reason to apprehend any enemies from abroad, and less any insurrections at home, against which no kingdom in Christendom, in the constitution of its government, in the solidity and execution of the laws, and in the nature and disposition of the people, was more secure than England; that he might take a nearer view of those great blessings which God had poured upon him, he resolved to make a progress into the northern parts of his kingdom, and to be solemnly crowned in his kingdom of Scotland, which he had never seen from the time he first left it, when he was of the age of two years, and no more. In order to this journey, which was made with great splendour, and proportionable expense, he added to the train of his court many of the greatest nobility, who cared not to add to the pomp of the court at their own charge, which they were obliged to do, and did with all visible alacrity submit to the king's pleasure, as soon as they knew his desire; and so his attendance in all respects was proportionable to the glory of the greatest king.

This whole progress was made, from the first setting out to the end of it, with the greatest magnificence imaginable; and the highest excess of feasting was then introduced, or, at least, carried to a height it had never been before; and from whence it hardly declined afterwards, to the great damage and mischief of the nation in their estates and manners. All persons of quality and condition, who lived within distance of the northern road, received the great persons of the nobility with that hospitality which became them; in which all cost was employed to make their entertainments splendid, and their houses capable for those entertainments. And the king himself met with many treatments of that nature, at the charge of particular men, who desired the honour of his presence, which had been rarely practised till then by the persons of the best condition, though it hath since grown into a very inconvenient custom. But when he passed through Nottinghamshire, both king and court were received and entertained by the earl of Newcastle, and at his own proper expense, in such a wonderful manner, and in such an excess of feasting, as had never before been known in England; and would be still thought very prodigious, if the same noble person had not, within a year or two afterwards, made the king and queen a more stupendous entertainment; which, (God be thanked,) though possibly it might too much whet the appetite of others to excess, no man ever after imitated.

English and the Scots; the marquis of Hamilton master of the horse, and the earl of Carlisle first gentleman of the bedchamber, and almost all the second relation in that place, being of that kingdom; so that there was as it were an emulation between the two nations, which should appear in the greatest lustre, in clothes, horses, and attendance: and as there were (as is said before) many of the principal nobility of England, who attended upon the king, and who were not of the court; so the court was never without many Scots volunteers, and their number was well increased upon this occasion in nobility and gentry, who were resolved to convince all those who had believed their country to be very poor.

The king no sooner entered Scotland, but all his English servants and officers yielded up their attendance to those of the Scots nation, who were admitted into the same offices in Scotland, or had some titles to those relations by the constitution of that kingdom; as most of the great offices are held by inheritance; as the duke of Richmond and Lenox was then high steward, and high admiral of Scotland by descent, as others had the like possession of other places; so that all the tables of the house, which had been kept by the English officers, were laid down, and taken up again by the Scots, who kept them up with the same order, and equal splendour, and treated the English with all the freedom and courtesy imaginable; as all the nobility of that nation did, at their own expense, where their offices did not entitle them to tables at the charge of the crown, keep very noble houses to entertain their new guests; who had so often and so well entertained them: and it cannot be denied, the whole behaviour of that nation towards the English was as generous and obliging as could be expected; and the king appeared with no less lustre at Edinburgh, than at Whitehall; and in this pomp his coronation passed with all the solemnity and evidence of public joy that can be imagined, or could be expected; and the parliament, then held, with no less demonstration of duty, passed and presented those acts which were prepared for them to the royal sceptre; in which were some laws which restrained the extravagant power of the nobility, which, in many cases, they had long exercised, and the diminution whereof they took very heavily, though at that time they took little notice of it; the king being absolutely advised in all the affairs of that kingdom then, and long before, and after, by the sole counsel of the marquis of Hamilton, who was, or at least then believed to be, of the greatest interest of any subject in that kingdom, of whom more will be said hereafter.

The king was very well pleased with his reception, and with all the transactions there; nor indeed was there any thing to be blamed, but the luxury and vast expense, which abounded in all respects of feasting and clothes with too much license: which being imputed to the commendable zeal of the people of all conditions, to see their king amongst them, whom they were not like to see there again, and so their expense was to be but once made, and to the natural pride and vanity of that people, who will bear any inconveniences in it or from it, than confess the poverty of their country, no man had cause to suspect any mischief from it: and yet the debts contracted at that time by the nobility and gentry, and the wants and temptations they found themselves exposed to, from that unlimited expense, did very much contribute to the kindling that fire, which shortly after broke out in so terrible a combustion: nor were the sparks of murmur and sedition then so well covered, but that many discerning men discovered very pernicious designs to lurk in their breasts, who seemed to have the most cheerful countenance, and who acted great parts in the pomp and triumph. And it evidently appeared, that they of that nation, who shined most in the court of England, had the least influence in their own country, except only the marquis of Hamilton, whose affection to his master was even then suspected by the wisest men in both kingdoms; and that the immense bounties the king and his father had scattered amongst those of that nation, out of the wealth of England, besides that he had sacrificed the whole revenue and benefit of that kingdom to themselves, were not looked upon as any benefit to that people, but as obligations cast away upon particular men; many of whom had with it wasted their own patrimony in their country.

The king himself observed many of the nobility to endeavour to make themselves popular by speaking in parliament against those things which were most grateful to his majesty, and which still passed, notwithstanding their contradiction; and he thought a little discountenance upon those persons would either suppress that spirit within themselves, or make the poison of it less operative upon others. But as those acts of discountenance were too often believed to proceed from the displeasure of the marquis of Hamilton, and so rather advanced than depressed the object, so that people have naturally an admirable dexterity in sheltering themselves from any of those acts of discountenance, which they had no mind to own; (as they are equal promoters and promulgators of it, though not intended when they can make benefit by it;) when it hath been notoriously visible, and it was then notorious, that many of the persons then, as the earl of Rothes, and others, of whom the king had the worst opinion, and from whom he most purposely withheld any grace by never speaking to them, or taking notice of them in the court, when the king was abroad in the fields, or passing through villages, when the greatest crowds of people flocked to see him, those men would still be next him, and entertain him with some discourse, and pleasant relations, which the king's gentle disposition could not avoid, and which made those persons to be generally believed to be most acceptable to his majesty; upon which the lord Falkland was wont to say, "that keeping of state was like committing adultery, there must go two to it;" for let the proudest or most formal man resolve to keep what distance he will towards others, a bold and confident man instantly demolishes that whole machine, and gets within him, and even obliges him to his own laws of conversation.

The king was always the most punctual observer of all decency in his devotion, and the strictest promoter of the ceremonies of the church, as believing in his soul the church of England to be instituted the nearest to the practice of the apostles, and the best for the propagation and advancement of Christian religion, of any church in the world: and on the other side, though no man was more averse from the Romish church than he was, nor better understood the motives of their separation from us, and animosity against us, he had the highest dislike and prejudice to that part of his own subjects, who were against the government established, and did always look upon them as a very dangerous and seditious people; who would, under pretence of conscience, which kept them from submitting to the spiritual jurisdiction, take the first opportunity they could find, or make, to disturb and withdraw themselves from their temporal subjection; and therefore he had, with the utmost vigilance, caused that temper and disposition to be watched and provided against in England; and if it were then in truth there, it lurked with wonderful secrecy. In Scotland indeed it covered the whole nation, so that though there were bishops in name, the whole jurisdiction, and they themselves were, upon the matter, subject to an assembly, which was purely presbyterian; no form of religion in practice, no liturgy, nor the least appearance of any beauty of holiness: the clergy, for the most part, corrupted in their principles; at least, (for it cannot be denied but that their universities, especially Aberdeen, flourished under many excellent scholars and very learned men,) none countenanced by the great men, or favoured by the people, but such; yet, though all the cathedral churches were totally neglected with reference to those administrations over the whole kingdom, yet the king's own chapel at Holyrood-house had still been maintained with the decency and splendour of the cathedral service, and all other formalities incident to the royal chapel; and the whole nation seemed, in the time of king James, well inclined to receive the liturgy of the church of England, which the king exceedingly desired, and was so confident of, that they who were privy to the counsels of that king in that time did believe, that the bringing that work to pass was the principal end of his progress thither some years before his death; though he was not so well satisfied at his being there, two or three of the principal persons trusted by him in the government of that kingdom, dying in or about that very time: but [though] he returned without making any visible attempt in that affair, yet he retained still the purpose and resolution to his death to bring it to pass. However, his two or three last years were less pleasant to him, by the prince's voyage into Spain, the jealousies which, about that time, began in England, and the imperious proceedings in parliament there, so that he thought it necessary to suspend any prosecution of that design, until a more favourable conjuncture, and he lived not to see that conjuncture.

The king his son, who, with his kingdoms and other virtues, inherited that zeal for religion, proposed nothing more to himself, than to unite his three kingdoms in one form of God's worship, and in a uniformity in public devotions; and there being now so great a serenity in all his dominions as is mentioned before, there is great reason to believe, that in this journey into Scotland to be crowned, he carried the resolution with him to finish that important business in the church at the same time. And to that end, the then bishop of London, Dr. Laud, attended on his majesty throughout that whole journey, which, as he was dean of the chapel, he was not obliged to do, and no doubt would have been excused from, if that design had not been in view; to accomplish which he was not less solicitous than the king himself, nor the king the less solicitous for his advice. He preached in the royal chapel, (which scarce any Englishman had ever done before in the king's presence,) and principally upon the benefit of conformity, and the reverent ceremonies of the church, with all the marks of approbation and applause imaginable; the great civility of that people being so notorious and universal, that they would not appear unconformable to his majesty's wish in any particular. And many wise men were then and still are of opinion, that if the king had then proposed the liturgy of the church of England to have been received and practised by that nation, it would have been submitted to against all opposition: but, upon mature consideration, the king concluded that it was not a good season to promote that business.

He had passed two or three acts of parliament, which had much lessened the authority and dependence of the nobility and great men, and incensed and disposed them proportionably to cross and oppose any proposition, which would be most grateful; and that tharteous humour was enough discovered to rule in the breasts of many, who made the greatest professions. Yet this was not the obstruction which diverted the king: the party that was averse from the thing, and abhorred any thought of conformity, could not have been powerful enough to have stopped the progress of it; the mischief was, that they who most desired it, and were most concerned to promote it, were the men who used all their credit to divert the present attempting it; and the bishops themselves, whose interest was to be most advanced thereby, applied all their counsels secretly to have the matter more maturely considered; and the whole design was never consulted but privately, and only some few of the great men of that nation, and some of the bishops, advised with by the king, and the bishop of London; it being manifest enough, that as the finishing that great affair must be very grateful to England, so the English must not appear to have a hand in the contriving and promoting it.

The same, who did not only pretend, but really and heartily wish, that they might have a liturgy to order and regulate the worship of God in their churches, and did very well approve the ceremonies established in the church of England, and desired to submit and practise the same there, had no mind that the very liturgy of the church of England should be proposed to, or accepted by them; for which they offered two prudential reasons, as their observations upon the nature and humour of the nation, and upon the conferences they had often had with the best men upon that subject, which was often agitated in discourse, upon what had been formerly projected by king James, and upon what frequently occurred to wise men in discourses upon the thing itself, and the desirableness of it.

The first was, that the English liturgy, how piously and wisely soever framed and instituted, had found great opposition: and though the matter of the ceremonies had wrought for the most part only upon light-headed, weak men, whose satisfaction was not to be laboured; yet there were many grave and learned men, who excepted against some particulars, which would not be so easily answered; "That the reading Psalms being of the old translation were in many particulars so different from the new and better translation, that many instances might be given of importance to the sense and truth of scripture." They said somewhat of the same nature concerning the translation of the Epistles and Gospels, and some other exceptions against reading the Apocrypha, and some other particulars of less moment; and desired, "that, in forming a liturgy for their church, they might, by reforming those several instances, give satisfaction to good men, who would thereupon be easily induced to submit to it."

The other, which no doubt but took this in the way to give it the better introduction, was, "that the kingdom of Scotland generally had been long jealous, that, by the king's continued absence from them, [it] should by degrees be reduced to be but as a province to England, and subject to their laws and government, which it would never submit to; nor would any man of honour, who loved the king best, and respected England most, ever consent to bring that dishonour upon his country. If the very liturgy, in the terms it is constituted and practised in England, should be offered to them, it would kindle and inflame that jealousy, as the prologue and introduction to that design, and as the first rung of the ladder, which should serve to mount over all their customs and privileges, and be opposed and detested accordingly: whereas, if his majesty would give order for the preparing a liturgy, with those few desirable alterations, it would easily be done; and in the mean time they would so dispose the minds of the people for the reception of it, that they should even desire it." And this expedient was so passionately and vehemently urged even by the bishops, that, however they referred to the minds and humours of other men, it was manifest enough, that the exception and advice proceeded from the pride of their own hearts.

The bishop of London, who was always present with the king at these debates, was exceedingly troubled at this interjection, and to find those men the instruments in it, who had seemed to him as solicitous for the expedition, as zealous for the thing itself, and who could not but suffer by the delay. He knew well how far any enemies to conformity would be from being satisfied with those small alterations, which being consented to, they would with more confidence, though less reason, frame other exceptions, and insist upon them with more obstinacy. He foresaw the difficulties which would arise in rejecting, or altering, or adding to the liturgy, which had so great authority, and had, by the practice of near fourscore years, obtained great veneration from all protestants; and how much easier it would be to make objections against any thing that should be new, than against the old; and would therefore have been very glad that the former resolution might be pursued; there having never been any thought in the time of king James, or the present king, but of the English liturgy; besides that any variation from it, in how small matters soever, would make the uniformity the less, the manifestation whereof was that which was most aimed at and desired.

The king had exceedingly set his heart upon the matter, and was as much scandalized as any man at the disorder and indecency in the exercise of religion in that church: yet he was affected with what was offered for a little delay in the execution, and knew more of the ill humour and practices amongst the greatest men of the kingdom at that season, than the bishop did, and believed he could better compose and reduce them in a little time, and at a distance, than at the present, and whilst he was amongst them. Besides he was in his nature too much inclined to the Scots nation, having been born amongst them, and as jealous as any one of them could be that their liberties and privileges might not be invaded by the English, who, he knew, had no reverence for them: and therefore the objection, "that it would look like an imposition from England, if a form, settled in parliament at Westminster, should without any alteration be tendered (though by himself) to be submitted to, and observed in Scotland," made a deep impression in his majesty.

In a word, he committed the framing and composing such a liturgy as would most probably be acceptable to that people, to a select number of the bishops there, who were very able and willing to undertake it: and so his majesty returned into England, at the time proposed to himself, without having ever proposed, or made the least approach in public towards any alteration in the church.

It had been very happy, if there had been then nothing done indeed, that had any reference to that affair, and that, since it was not ready to promote it, nothing had been transacted, which accidentally alienated the affections of the people from it; and this was imputed to the bishop of London, who was like enough to be guilty of it, since he did naturally believe, that nothing more contributed to the benefit and advancement of the church, than the promotion of churchmen to places of the greatest honour, and offices of the highest trust: and this opinion and the prosecution of it (though his integrity was unquestionable, and his zeal as great for the good and honour of the state, as for the advancement and security of the church) was the unhappy foundation of his own ruin, and of the prejudice towards, and malice against, and almost destruction of the church.

During the king's stay in Scotland, when he found the conjuncture not yet ripe for perfecting that good order which he intended in the church, he resolved to leave a monument behind him of his own affection and esteem of it. Edinburgh, though the metropolis of the kingdom, and the chief seat of the king's own residence, and the place where the council of state and the courts of justice still remained, was but a borough town within the diocese of the archbishop of saint Andrew's, and governed in all church affairs by the preachers of the town; who, being chosen by the citizens from the time of Mr. Knox, (who had a principal hand in the suppression of popery, with circumstances not very commendable to this day,) had been the most turbulent and seditious ministers of confusion that could be found in the kingdom; of which king James had so sad experience, after he came to age, as well as in his minority, that he would often say, "that his access to the crown of England was the more valuable to him, as it redeemed him from the subjection to their ill manners and insolent practices, which he could never shake off before." The king, before his return from thence, with the full consent and approbation of the archbishop of saint Andrew's, erected Edinburgh into a bishopric, assigned it a good and convenient jurisdiction out of the nearest limits of the diocese of saint Andrew's, appointed the fairest church in the town to be the cathedral, settled a competent revenue upon the bishop out of lands purchased by his majesty himself from the duke of Lenox, who sold it much the cheaper, that it might be consecrated to so pious an end; and placed a very eminent scholar of a good family in the kingdom, who had been educated in the university of Cambridge, to be the first bishop in that his new city; and made another person, of good fame and learning, his first dean of his new cathedral, upon whom likewise he settled a proper maintenance; hoping by this means the better to prepare the people of the place, who were the most numerous and richest of the kingdom, to have a due reverence to order and government, and at least to discountenance, if not suppress, the factious spirit of presbytery, which had so long ruled there. But this application little contributed thereunto: and the people generally thought, that they had too many bishops before, and so the increasing the number was not like to be very grateful to them.

The bishops had indeed very little interest in the affection of that nation, and less authority over it; they had not power to reform or regulate their own cathedrals, and very rarely shewed themselves in the habit and robes of bishops; and durst not contest with the general assembly in matters of jurisdiction: so that there was little more than the name of episcopacy preserved in that church. To redeem them from that contempt, and to shew that they should be considerable in the state, how little authority soever they were permitted to have in the church, the king made the archbishop of saint Andrew's, a learned, wise, and pious man, and of long experience, chancellor of the kingdom, (the greatest office, and which had never been in the hands of a churchman since the reformation of religion, and suppressing the pope's authority,) and four or five other bishops of the privy-council, or lords of the session; which his majesty presumed, by their power in the civil government, and in the judicatories of the kingdom, would render them so much the more revered, and the better enable them to settle the affairs of the church: which fell out otherwise too; and it had been better that envious promotion had been suspended, till by their grave and pious deportment they had wrought upon their clergy to be better disposed to obey them, and upon the people to like order and discipline; and till by these means the liturgy had been settled, and received amongst them; and then the advancing some of them to greater honour might have done well.

But this unseasonable accumulation of so many honours upon them, to which their functions did not entitle them, (no bishop having been so much as a privy-councillor in very many years,) exposed them to the universal envy of the whole nobility, many whereof wished them well, as to all their ecclesiastical qualifications, but could not endure to see them possessed of those offices and employments, which they looked upon as naturally belonging to them; and then the number of them was thought too great, so that they overbalanced many debates; and some of them, by want of temper, or want of breeding, did not behave themselves with that decency in their debates, towards the greatest men of the kingdom, as in discretion they ought to have done, and as the others reasonably expected from them: so that, instead of bringing any advantage to the church, or facilitating the good intentions of the king in settling order and government, it produced a more general prejudice to it; though for the present there appeared no sign of discontent, or ill-will to them; and the king left Scotland, as he believed, full of affection and duty to him, and well inclined to receive a liturgy, when he should think it seasonable to commend it to them.

It was about the end of August in the year 1633, when the king returned from Scotland to Greenwich, where the queen kept her court; and the first accident of moment, that happened after his coming thither, was the death of Abbot, archbishop of Canterbury; who had sat too many years in that see, and had too great a jurisdiction over the church, though he was without any credit in the court from the death of king James, and had not much in many years before. He had been head or master of one of the poorest colleges in Oxford, and had learning sufficient for that province. He was a man of very morose manners, and a very sour aspect, which, in that time, was called gravity; and under the opinion of that virtue, and by the recommendation of the earl of Dunbar, the king's first Scotch favourite, he was preferred by king James to the bishopric of Coventry and Litchfield, and presently after to London, before he had been parson, vicar, or curate of any parish-church in England, or dean or prebend of any cathedral church; and was in truth, totally ignorant of the true constitution of the church of England, and the state and interest of the clergy; as sufficiently appeared throughout the whole course of his life afterward.

He had scarce performed any part of the office of a bishop in the diocese of London, when he was snatched from thence, and promoted to Canterbury, upon the never enough lamented death of Dr. Bancroft, that metropolitan, who understood the church excellently, and had almost rescued it out of the hands of the Calvinian party, and very much subdued the unruly spirit of the nonconformists, by and after the conference at Hampton-court; countenanced men of the greatest parts in learning, and disposed the clergy to a more solid course of study, than they had been accustomed to; and, if he had lived, would quickly have extinguished all that fire in England, which had been kindled at Geneva; or if he had been succeeded by bishop Andrews, bishop Overal, or any man who understood and loved the church, that infection would easily have been kept out, which could not afterwards be so easily expelled.

But Abbot brought none of this antidote with him, and considered Christian religion no otherwise, than as it abhorred and reviled popery, and valued those men most, who did that most furiously. For the strict observation of the discipline of the church or the conformity to the articles or canons established, he made little inquiry, and took less care; and having himself made a very little progress in the ancient and solid study of divinity, he adhered wholly to the doctrine of Calvin, and, for his sake, did not think so ill of the discipline as he ought to have done. But if men prudently forbore a public reviling and railing at the hierarchy and ecclesiastical government, let their opinions and private practice be what it would, they were not only secure from any inquisition of his, but acceptable to him, and at least equally preferred by him. And though many other bishops plainly discerned the mischiefs, which daily broke in to the prejudice of religion, by his defects and remissness, and prevented it in their own dioceses as much as they could, and gave all their countenance to men of other parts and other principles; and though the bishop of London, Dr. Laud, from the time of his authority and credit with the king, had applied all the remedies he could to those defections, and, from the time of his being chancellor of Oxford, had much discountenanced and almost suppressed that spirit, by encouraging another kind of learning and practice in that university, which was indeed according to the doctrine of the church of England; yet that temper in the archbishop, whose house was a sanctuary to the most eminent of that factious party, and who licensed their most pernicious writings, left his successor a very difficult work to do, to reform and reduce a church into order, that had been so long neglected, and that was so ill inhabited by many weak, and more wilful churchmen.

It was within one week after the king's return from Scotland, that Abbot died at his house at Lambeth. And the king took very little time to consider who should be his successor, but the very next time the bishop of London (who was longer upon his way home than the king had been) came to him, his majesty entertained him very cheerfully with this compellation, My lord's grace of Canterbury, you are very welcome; and gave order the same day for the dispatch of all the necessary forms for the translation: so that within a month or thereabouts after the death of the other archbishop, he was completely invested in that high dignity, and settled in his palace at Lambeth. This great prelate had been before in great favour with the duke of Buckingham, whose great confidant he was, and by him recommended to the king, as fittest to be trusted in the conferring all ecclesiastical preferments, when he was but bishop of St. David's, or newly preferred to Bath and Wells; and from that time he entirely governed that province without a rival: so that his promotion to Canterbury was long foreseen and expected; nor was it attended with any increase of envy or dislike.

He was a man of great parts, and very exemplary virtues, allayed and discredited by some unpopular natural infirmities; the greatest of which was, (besides a hasty, sharp way of expressing himself,) that he believed innocence of heart, and integrity of manners, was a guard strong enough to secure any man in his voyage through this world, in what company soever he travelled, and through what ways soever he was to pass: and sure never any man was better supplied with that provision. He was born of honest parents, who were well able to provide for his education in the schools of learning, from whence they sent him to St. John's college in Oxford, the worst endowed at that time of any in that famous university. From a scholar he became a fellow, and then the president of that college, after he had received all the graces and degrees (the proctorship and the doctorship) could be obtained there. He was always maligned and persecuted by those who were of the Calvinian faction, which was then very powerful, and who, according to their useful maxim and practice, call every man they do not love, papist; and under this senseless appellation they created him many troubles and vexations; and so far suppressed him, that though he was the king's chaplain, and taken notice of for an excellent preacher, and a scholar of the most sublime parts, he had not any preferment to invite him to leave his poor college, which only gave him bread, till the vigour of his age was past: and when he was promoted by king James, it was but to a poor bishopric in Wales, which was not so good a support for a bishop, as his college was for a private scholar, though a doctor.

Parliaments in that time were frequent, and grew very busy; and the party under which he had suffered a continual persecution, appeared very powerful, and full of design, and they who had the courage to oppose them, began to be taken notice of with approbation and countenance: and under this style he came to be first cherished by the duke of Buckingham, after he had made some experiments of the temper and spirit of the other people, nothing to his satisfaction. From this time he prospered at the rate of his own wishes, and being transplanted out of his cold barren diocese of St. David's, into a warmer climate, he was left, as was said before, by that omnipotent favourite in that great trust with the king, who was sufficiently indisposed towards the persons or the principles of Mr. Calvin's disciples.

When he came into great authority, it may be, he retained too keen a memory of those who had so unjustly and uncharitably persecuted him before; and, I doubt, was so far transported with the same passions he had reason to complain of in his adversaries, that, as they accused him of popery, because he had some doctrinal opinions which they liked not, though they were nothing allied to popery; so he entertained too much prejudice to some persons, as if they were enemies to the discipline of the church, because they concurred with Calvin in some doctrinal points; when they abhorred his discipline, and revered the government of the church, and prayed for the peace of it with as much zeal and fervency as any in the kingdom; as they made manifest in their lives, and in their sufferings with it, and for it. He had, from his first entrance into the world, without any disguise or dissimulation, declared his own opinion of that classis of men; and, as soon as it was in his power, he did all he could to hinder the growth and increase of that faction, and to restrain those who were inclined to it, from doing the mischief they desired to do. But his power at court could not enough qualify him to go through with that difficult reformation, whilst he had a superior in the church, who, having the reins in his hand, could slacken them according to his own humour and indiscretion; and was thought to be the more remiss, to irritate his cholerick disposition. But when he had now the primacy in his own hand, the king being inspired with the same zeal, he thought he should be to blame, and have much to answer, if he did not make haste to apply remedies to those diseases, which he saw would grow apace.

In the end of September of the year 1633, he was invested in the title, power, and jurisdiction of archbishop of Canterbury, and entirely in possession of the revenue thereof, without a rival in church or state; that is, no man professed to oppose his greatness; and he had never interposed or appeared in matter of state to this time. His first care was, that the place he was removed from might be supplied with a man who would be vigilant to pull up those weeds, which the London soil was too apt to nourish, and so drew his old friend and companion Dr. Juxon as near to him as he could. They had been fellows together in one college in Oxford,<sup>1</sup> and, when he was first made bishop of saint David's, he made him president of that college: when he could no longer keep the deanery of the chapel royal, he made him his successor in that 'near attendance,' upon the king: and now he was raised to be archbishop, he easily prevailed with the king to make the other, bishop of London, before, or very soon after, he had been consecrated bishop of Hereford, if he were more than elect of that church.

It was now a time of great ease and tranquillity; the king (as hath been said before) had made himself superior to all those difficulties and straits he had to contend with the four first years he came to the crown at home; and was now revered by all his neighbours, who all needed his friendship, and desired to have it; the wealth of the kingdom notorious to all the world, and the general temper and humour of it little inclined to the papists, and less to the puritan. There were some late taxes and impositions introduced, which rather angered than grieved the people, who were more than repaired by the quiet, peace, and prosperity they enjoyed; and the murmur and discontent that was, appeared to be against the excess of power exercised by the crown, and supported by the judges in Westminster-hall. The church was not repined at, nor the least inclination to alter the government and discipline thereof, or to change the doctrine. Nor was there at that time any considerable number of persons of any valuable condition throughout the kingdom, who did wish either; and the cause of so prodigious a change in so few years after was too visible from the effects. The archbishop's heart was set upon the advancement of the church, in which he well knew he had the king's full concurrence, which he thought would be too powerful for any opposition; and that he should need no other assistance.

Though the nation generally, as was said before, was without any ill talent to the church, either in the point of the doctrine, or the discipline, yet they were not without a jealousy that popery was not enough discountenanced, and were very averse from admitting any thing they had not been used to, which they called innovation, and were easily persuaded, that any thing of that kind was but to please the papists. Some doctrinal points in controversy had been, in the late years, agitated in the pulpits with more warmth and reflections, than had used to be; and thence the heat and animosity increased in books pro and con upon the same arguments: most of the popular preachers, who had not looked into the ancient learning, took Calvin's word for it, and did all they could to propagate his opinions in those points: they who had studied more, and were better versed in the antiquities of the church, the fathers, the council, and the ecclesiastical histories, with the same heat and passion in preaching and writing defended the contrary.

But because, in the late dispute in the Dutch churches, those opinions were supported by Jacobus Arminius, the divinity professor in the university of Leyden in Holland, the latter men, we mentioned, were called Arminians; though many of them had never read a word written by Arminius. Either side defended and maintained their different opinions as the doctrine of the church of England, as the two great orders in the church of Rome, the Dominicans and Franciscans, did at the same time, and had many hundred years before, with more vehemence and uncharitableness, maintained the same opinions one against the other; either party professing to adhere to the doctrine of the catholic church, which had been ever wiser than to determine the controversy. And yet that party here, which could least support themselves with reason, were very solicitous, according to the ingenuity they always practise to advance any of their pretences, to have the people believe, that they who held with Arminius did intend to introduce popery; and truly the other side was no less willing to have it thought, that all, who adhered to Calvin in those controversies, did in their hearts likewise adhere to him with reference to the discipline, and desired to change the government of the church, destroy the bishops, and so set up the discipline that he had established at Geneva; and so both sides found such reception generally with the people, as they were inclined to the persons; whereas, in truth, none of the one side were at all inclined to popery, and very many of the other were most affectionate to the peace and prosperity of the church, and very pious and learned men.

The archbishop had, all his life, eminently opposed Calvin's doctrine in those controversies, before the name of Arminius was taken notice of, or his opinions heard of; and thereupon, for want of another name, they had called him a papist, which nobody believed him to be, and he had more manifested the contrary in his disputations and writings, than most men had done; and it may be the other found the more severe and rigorous usage from him, for their propagating that calumny against him. He was a man of great courage and resolution, and being most assured within himself, that he proposed no end in all his actions or designs, than what was pious and just, (as sure no man had ever a heart more entire to the king, the church, or his country,) he never studied the best ways to those ends; he thought, it may be, that any art or industry that way would discredit, at least make the integrity of the end suspected, let the cause be what it will. He did court persons too little; nor cared to make his designs and purposes appear as candid as they were, by shewing them in any other dress than their own natural beauty and roughness; and did not consider enough what men said, or were like to say of him. If the faults and vices were fit to be looked into, and discovered, let the persons be who they would that were guilty of them, they were sure to find no connivance or favour from him. He intended the discipline of the church should be felt, as well as spoken of, and that it should be applied to the greatest and most splendid transgressors, as well as to the punishment of smaller offences, and meaner offenders; and thereupon called for or cherished the discovery of those who were not careful to cover their own iniquities, thinking they were above the reach of other men's, or their power or will to chastise. Persons of honour and great quality, of the court, and of the country, were every day cited into the high-commission court, upon the fame of their incontinence, or other scandal in their lives, and were there prosecuted to their shame and punishment: and as the shame (which they called an insolent triumph upon their degree and quality, and levelling them with the common people) was never forgotten, but watched for revenge; so the fines imposed there were the more questioned, and repined against, because they were assigned to the rebuilding and repairing St. Paul's church; and thought therefore to be the more severely imposed, and the less compassionately reduced and excused; which likewise made the jurisdiction and rigour of the star-chamber more felt, and murmured against, which sharpened many men's humours against the bishops, before they had any ill intention towards the church.

There were three persons most notorious for their declared malice against the government of the church by bishops, in their several books and writings, which they had published to corrupt the people, with circumstances very scandalous, and in language very scurrilous, and impudent; which all men thought deserved very exemplary punishment: they were of three several professions which had the most influence upon the people, a divine, a common lawyer, and a doctor of physic; none of them of interest, or any esteem with the worthy part of their several professions, having been formerly all looked upon under characters of reproach: yet when they were all sentenced, and for the execution of that sentence brought out to be punished as common and signal rogues, exposed upon scaffolds to have their ears cut off, and their faces and foreheads branded with hot irons, (as the poorest and most mechanic malefactors used to be, when they were not able to redeem themselves by any fine for their trespasses, or to satisfy any damages for the scandals they had raised against the good name and reputation of others,) men began no more to consider their manners, but the men; and every profession, with anger and indignation enough, thought their education, and degrees, and quality, would have secured them from such infamous judgments, and treasured up wrath for the time to come.

The remissness of Abbot, and of other bishops by his example, had introduced, or at least connived at, a negligence, that gave great scandal to the church, and no doubt offended very many pious men. The people took so little care of the churches, and the parsons as little of the chancels, that, instead of beautifying or adorning them in any degree, they rarely provided for their stability and against the very falling of very many of their churches; and suffered them at least to be kept so indecently and slovenly, that they would not have endured it in the ordinary offices of their own houses; the rain and the wind to infest them, and the sacraments themselves to be administered where the people had most mind to receive them. [This profane liberty and uncleanness the archbishop resolved to reform with all expedition, requiring the other bishops to concur with him in so pious a work; and the work sure was very grateful to all men of devotion: yet, I know not how, the prosecution of it with too much affectation of expense, it may be, or with too much passion between the ministers and the parishioners, raised an evil spirit towards the church, which the enemies of it took much advantage of, as soon as they had opportunity to make the worst use of it.]

The removing the communion table out of the body of the church, where it had used to stand, and used to be applied to all uses, and fixing it to one place in the upper end of the chancel, which frequently made the buying a new table to be necessary; the inclosing it with a rail of joiner's work, and thereby fencing it from the approach of dogs, and all servile uses; the obliging all persons to come up to those rails to receive the sacrament, how acceptable soever to grave and intelligent persons, who loved order and decency, (for acceptable it was to such,) yet introduced first murmurings amongst the people, upon the very charge and expense of it; and if the minister were not a man of discretion and reputation to compose and reconcile those indispositions, (as too frequently he was not, and rather inflamed and increased the distemper,) it begat suits and appeals at law. The opinion that there was no necessity of doing any thing, and the complaint that there was too much done, brought the power and jurisdiction to impose the doing of it, to be called in question, contradicted, and opposed. Then the manner, and gesture, and posture, in the celebration of it, brought in new disputes, and administered new subjects of offence, according to the custom of the place, and humour of the people; and those disputes brought in new words and terms (altar, and adoration, and genuflexion, and other expressions) for the more perspicuous carrying on those disputations. New books were written for and against this new practice, with the same earnestness and contention for victory, as if the life of Christianity had been at stake. There was not an equal concurrence, in the prosecution of this matter, amongst the bishops themselves; some of them proceeding more remissly in it, and some not only neglecting to direct any thing to be done towards it, but restraining those who had a mind to it, from meddling in it. And this again produced as inconvenient disputes, when the subordinate clergy would take upon them, not only without the direction of, but expressly against the diocesan's injunctions, to make those alterations and reformati<sup>o</sup>ns themselves, and by their own authority.

The archbishop, guided purely by his zeal, and reverence for the place of God's service, and by the canons and injunctions of the church, with the custom observed in the king's chapel, and in most cathedral churches, without considering the long intermission and discontinuance in many other places, prosecuted this affair more passionately than was fit for the season; and had prejudice against those, who, out of fear or foresight, or not understanding the thing, had not the same warmth to promote it. The bishops who had been preferred by his favour, or hoped to be so, were at least as solicitous to bring it to pass in their several dioceses; and some of them with more passion and less circumspection, than they had his example for, or than he approved; prosecuting those who opposed them very fiercely, and sometimes unwarrantably, which was kept in remembrance. Whilst other bishops, not so many in number, or so valuable in weight, who had not been beholding to him, nor had hope of being so, were enough contented to give perfunctory orders for the doing it, and to see the execution of those orders not intended; and not the less pleased to find, that the prejudice of that whole transaction reflected solely upon the archbishop.

The bishop of Lincoln (Williams) who had been heretofore lord keeper of the great seal of England, and the most generally abominated whilst he had been so, was, since his disgrace at court, and prosecution from thence, become very popular; and having faults enough to be ashamed of, the punishment whereof threatened him every day, he was very willing to change the scene, and to be brought upon the stage for opposing these innovations (as he called them) in religion. It was an unlucky word, and cozened very many honest men into apprehensions very prejudicial to the king and to the church. He published a discourse and treatise against the matter and manner of the prosecution of that matter; a book so full of good learning, and that learning so close and solidly applied, (though it abounded with too many light expressions,) that it gained him reputation enough to be able to do hurt; and shewed that, in his retirement, he had spent his time with his books very profitably. He used all the wit and all the malice he could, to awaken the people to a jealousy of these agitations and innovations in the exercise of religion; not without insinuations that it aimed at greater alterations, for which he knew the people would quickly find a name; and he was ambitious to have it believed that the archbishop was his greatest enemy, for his having constantly opposed his rising to any government in the church, as a man whose hot and hasty spirit he had long known.

Though there were other books written with good learning, and which sufficiently answered the bishop's book, and to men of equal and dispassionate inclinations fully vindicated the proceedings which had been, and were still, very fervently carried on; yet it was done by men whose names were not much revered by many men, and who were taken notice of, with great insolence and asperity to undertake the defence of all things which the people generally were displeased with, and who did not affect to be much cared for by those of their own order. So that from this unhappy subject, not in itself of that important value to be either entered upon with that resolution, or to be carried on with that passion, proceeded upon the matter a schism amongst the bishops themselves, and a world of uncharitableness in the learned and moderate clergy, towards one another: which, though it could not increase the malice, added very much to the ability and power of the enemies of the church to do it hurt, and added to the number of them. For without doubt, many who loved the established government of the church, and the exercise of religion as it was used, and desired not a change in either, nor did dislike the order and decency, which they saw mended, yet they liked not any novelties, and so were liable to entertain jealousies that more was intended than was hitherto proposed; especially when those infusions proceeded from men unsuspected to have any inclinations to change, and from known assertors of the government both in church and state. They did observe the inferior clergy took more upon them than they had used to do, and did not live towards their neighbours of quality, or their patrons themselves, with that civility and condescension they had used to do; which disposed them likewise to a withdrawing their good countenance and good neighbourhood from them.

The archbishop had not been long at Canterbury, when there was another great alteration in the court by the death of the earl of Portland, high treasurer of England; a man so jealous of the archbishop's credit with the king, that he always endeavoured to lessen it by all the arts and ways he could; which he was so far from effecting, that, as it usually falls out, when passion and malice make accusation, by suggesting many particulars which the king knew to be untrue, or believed to be no faults, he rather confirmed his majesty's judgment of him, and prejudiced his own reputation. His death caused no grief in the archbishop; who was upon it made one of the commissioners of the treasury and revenue, which he had reason to be sorry for, because it engaged him in civil business and matters of state, in which he had little experience, and which he had hitherto avoided. But being obliged to it now by his trust, he entered upon it with his natural earnestness and warmth, making it his principal care to advance and improve the king's revenue by all the ways which were offered, and so hearkened to all informations and propositions of that kind; and having not had experience of that tribe of people who deal in that traffick; (a confident, senseless, and for the most part a naughty people,) he was sometimes misled by them to think better of some projects than they deserved: but when he was so entirely devoted to what would be beneficial to the king, that all propositions and designs, which were for the profit (only or principally) of particular persons how great soever, were opposed and crossed, and very often totally suppressed and stifled in their birth, by his power and authority; which created him enemies enough in the court, and many of ability to do mischief, who knew well how to recompense discourtesies, which they always called injuries.

And the revenue of too many of the court consisted principally in enclosures, and improvements of that nature, which he still opposed passionately, except they were founded upon law; and then, if it would bring profit to the king, how old and obsolete soever the law was, he thought he might justly advise the prosecution. And so he did a little too much countenance the commission for depopulation, which brought much charge and trouble upon the people, which was likewise cast upon his account.

He had observed, and knew it must be so, that the principal officers of the revenue, who governed the affairs of money, had always access to the king, and spent more time with him in private than any of his servants or counsellors, and had thereby frequent opportunities to do good or ill offices to many men; of which he had had experience, when the earl of Portland was treasurer, and the lord Cottington chancellor of the exchequer; neither of them being his friends; and the latter still enjoying that place, and having his former access, and so continuing a joint commissioner of the treasury with him, and understanding that province much better, he still opposed, and commonly carried every thing against him: so that he was weary of the toil and vexation of that business; as all other men were, and still are of the delays which are in all dispatches, whilst that office is executed by commission.

The treasurer's is the greatest office of benefit in the kingdom, and the chief in precedence next the archbishop's, and the great seal: so that the eyes of all men were at gaze who should have this great office; and the greatest of the nobility, who were in the chiefest employments, looked upon it as the prize of one of them; such offices commonly making way for more removes and preferments: when on a sudden the staff was put into the hands of the bishop of London, a man so unknown, that his name was scarce heard of in the kingdom, who had been within two years before but a private chaplain to the king, and the president of a poor college in Oxford. This inflamed more men than were angry before, and no doubt did not only sharpen the edge of envy and malice against the archbishop, (who was the known architect of this new fabric,) but most unjustly indisposed many towards the church itself; which they looked upon as the gulph ready to swallow all the great offices, there being others in view, of that robe, who were ambitious enough to expect the rest.

In the mean time the archbishop himself was infinitely pleased with what was done, and unhappily believed he had provided a stronger support for the church; and never abated any thing of his severity and rigour towards men of all conditions, or in the sharpness of his language and expressions, which was so natural to him, that he could not debate any thing without some commotion, when the argument was not of moment, nor bear contradiction in debate, even in the council, where all men are equally free, with that patience and temper that was necessary; of which they who wished him not well took many advantages, and would therefore contradict him, that he might be transported with some indecent passion; which, upon a short recollection, he was always sorry for, and most readily and heartily would make acknowledgment. No man so willingly made unkind use of all those occasions, as the lord Cottington, who being a master of temper, and of the most profound dissimulation, knew too well how to lead him into a mistake, and then drive him into choler, and then expose him upon the matter, and the manner, to the judgment of the company; and he chose to do this most when the king was present; and then he would dine with him the next day.

The king, who was excessively affected to hunting and the sports of the field, had a great desire to make a great park for red as well as fallow deer, between Richmond and Hampton court, where he had large wastes of his own, and great parcels of wood, which made it very fit for the use he designed it to: but as some parishes had common in those wastes, so many gentlemen and farmers had good houses and good farms intermingled with those wastes of their own inheritance, or for their lives, or years; and without taking in of them into the park, it would not be of the largeness or for the use proposed. His majesty desired to purchase those lands, and was very willing to buy them upon higher terms than the people could sell them at to any body else, if they had occasion to part with them; and thought it no unreasonable thing, upon those terms, to expect from his subjects; and so he employed his own surveyor, and other of his officers, to treat with the owners, many whereof were his own tenants, whose terms would at last expire.

The major part of the people were in a short time prevailed with, but many very obstinately refused; and a gentleman, who had the best estate, with a convenient house and gardens, would by no means part with it; and the king being as earnest to compass it, it made a great noise, as if the king would take away men's estates at his own pleasure. The bishop of London, who was treasurer, and the lord Cottington, chancellor of the exchequer, were, from the first entering upon it, very averse from the design, not only for the murmur of the people, but because the purchase of the land, and the making a brick-wall about so large a parcel of ground, (for it is not less than ten or twelve miles about,) would cost a greater sum of money than they could easily provide, or than they thought ought to be sacrificed to such an occasion; and the lord Cottington (who was more solicited by the country people, and heard most of their murmurs) took the business most to heart, and endeavoured by all the ways he could, and by frequent importunities, to divert his majesty from pursuing it, and put all delays he could well do in the bargains which were to be made; till the king grew very angry with him, and told him, "he was resolved to go through with it, and had already caused brick to be burned, and much of the wall to be built upon his own land;" upon which Cottington thought fit to acquiesce.

The building the wall before people consented to part with their land, or their common, looked to them as if by degrees they should be shut out from both, and increased the murmur and noise of the people who were not concerned, as well as of them who were: and it was too near London not to be the common discourse; and the archbishop (who desired exceedingly that the king should be possessed as much of the hearts of the people as was possible, at least that they should have no just cause to complain) meeting with it, resolved to speak with the king of it; which he did, and received such an answer from him, that he thought his majesty rather not informed enough of the inconveniences and mischiefs of the thing, than positively resolved not to desist from it. Whereupon one day he took the lord Cottington aside, being informed that he disliked it, and, according to his natural custom, spake with great warmth against it,) and told him, "he should do very well to give the king good counsel, and to withdraw him from a resolution, in which his honour and his justice was so much called in question." Cottington answered him very gravely, "that the thing designed was very lawful, and he thought the king resolved very well, and since the place lay so conveniently for his winter exercise, and that he should by it not be compelled to make so long journeys as he used to do, in that season of the year, for his sport, and that nobody ought to dissuade him from it."

The archbishop, instead of finding a concurrence from him, as he expected, seeing himself reproached upon the matter for his opinion, grew into much passion, telling him, "such men as he would ruin the king, and make him lose the affections of his subjects; that for his own part, as he had begun, so he would go on to dissuade the king from proceeding in so ill a counsel, and that he hoped it would appear who had been his counsellor." Cottington, glad to see him so soon hot, and resolved to inflame him more, very calmly replied to him, "that he thought a man could not with a good conscience, hinder the king from pursuing his resolutions, and that it could not but proceed from want of affection to his person, and he was not sure that it might not be high treason." The other, upon the wildness of his discourse, in great anger asked him, "Why? from whence he had received that doctrine?" He said, with the same temper, "They, who did not wish the king's health, could not love him; and they, who went about to hinder his taking recreation, which preserved his health, might be thought, for aught he knew, guilty of the highest crimes." Upon which the archbishop in great rage, and with many reproaches, left him, and either presently, or upon the next opportunity, told the king, "that he now knew who was his great counsellor for making his park, and that he did not wonder that men durst not represent any arguments to the contrary, or let his majesty know how much he suffered in it, when such principles in divinity and law were laid down to terrify them;" and so recounted to him the conference he had with the lord Cottington, bitterly inveighing against him and his doctrine, mentioning him with all the sharp reproaches imaginable, and beseeching his majesty, "that his counsel might not prevail with him," taking some pains to make his conclusions appear very false and ridiculous.

The king said no more, but, "My lord, you are deceived; Cottington is too hard for you: upon my word, he hath not only dissuaded me more, and given more reasons against this business, than all the men in England have done, but hath really obstructed the work by not doing his duty, as I commanded him, for which I have been very much displeased with him: you see how unjustly your passion hath transported you." By which reprehension he found how much he had been abused, and resented it accordingly.

Whatsoever was the cause of it, this excellent man, who stood not upon the advantage ground before, from the time of his promotion to the archbishopric, or rather from that of his being commissioner of the treasury, exceedingly provoked, or underwent the envy, and reproach, and malice of men of all qualities and conditions; who agreed in nothing else: all which, though well enough known to him, were not enough considered by him, who believed, the government to be so firmly settled, that it could neither be shaken from within nor without, as most men did, and that less than a general confusion of law and gospel could not hurt him; which was true too: but he did not foresee how easily that confusion might be brought to pass, as it proved shortly to be. And with this general observation, of the outward visible prosperity, and the inward reserved disposition of the people to murmur and unquietness, we conclude this first book.

BOOK II.

IT was towards the end of the year 1633, when the king returned from Scotland, having left it to the care of some of the bishops there to provide such a liturgy, and such a book of canons, as might best suit the nature and humour of the better sort of that people; to which the rest would easily submit: and that, as fast as they made them ready, they should transmit them to the archbishop of Canterbury, to whose assistance the king joined the bishop of London, and doctor Wren, who, by that time, was become bishop of Norwich; a man of a severe, sour nature, but very learned, and particularly versed in the old liturgies of the Greek and Latin churches. And after his majesty should be this way certified of what was so sent, he would recommend and enjoin the practice and use of both to that his native kingdom. The bishops there had somewhat to do, before they went about the preparing the canons and the liturgy; what had passed at the king's being there in parliament had left bitter inclinations and unruly spirits in many of the most popular nobility; who watched only for an opportunity to inflame the people, and were well enough contented to see combustible matter every day gathered together to contribute to that fire.

The promoting so many bishops to be of the privy-council, and to sit in the courts of justice, seemed at first wonderfully to facilitate all that was in design, and to create an affection and reverence towards the church, at least an application to and dependence upon the greatest churchmen. So that there seemed to be not only a good preparation made with the people, but a general expectation, and even a desire that they might have a liturgy, and more decency observed in the church. And this temper was believed to be the more universal, because neither from any of the nobility, nor of the clergy, who were thought most averse from it, there appeared any sign of contradiction, nor that license of language against it, as was natural to that nation; but an entire acquiescence in all the bishops thought fit to do; which was interpreted to proceed from a conversion in their judgment, at least to a submission to the authority: whereas in truth, it appeared afterwards to be from the observation they made from the temper and indiscretion of those bishops in the greatest authority, that they were like to have more advantages administered to them by their ill managery, than they could raise by any contrivance of their own.

It was full two years, or very near so much, before the bishops in Scotland had prepared any thing to offer to the king towards their intended reformation; and then they inverted the proper method, and first presented a body of canons to precede the liturgy, which was not yet ready, they choosing to finish the shorter work first. The king referred the consideration of the canons, as he had before resolved to do, to the archbishop, and the other two bishops formerly named, the bishop of London, and the bishop of Norwich; who, after their perusal of them, and some alterations made with the consent of those bishops who brought them from Scotland, returned them to the king; and his majesty, impatient to see the good work entered upon without any other ceremony, (after having given his royal approbation,) issued out his proclamation for the due observation of them within his kingdom of Scotland.

It was a fatal inadvertency, that neither before nor after these canons were sent to the king they were never seen by the assembly, or any convocation of the clergy, which was so strictly obliged to the observation of them; nor so much as communicated to the lords of the council of that kingdom; it being almost impossible that any new discipline could be introduced into the church, which would not much concern the government of the state, and even trench upon or refer to the municipal laws of the kingdom. And, in this consideration, the archbishop of Canterbury had always declared to the bishops of Scotland, "that it was their part to be sure, that nothing they should propose to the king in the business of the church, should be contrary to the laws of the land, which he could not be thought to understand; and that they should never put any thing in execution, without the consent and approbation of the privy-council." But it was the unhappy craft of those bishops to get it believed by the king, that the work would be grateful to the most considerable of the nobility, the clergy, and the people, (which they could hardly believe,) in order to the obtaining his majesty's approbation and authority for the execution of that, which they did really believe would not find opposition from the nobility, clergy, or people, against his majesty's express power and will, which without doubt was then in great veneration in that kingdom; and so they did not in truth dare to submit those canons to any other examination, than what the king should direct in England.

It was, in the next place, as strange, that those canons should be published before the liturgy was prepared, (which was not ready in a year after, or thereabouts,) when three or four of the canons were principally for the observation and punctual compliance with the liturgy; which all the clergy were to be sworn to submit to, and to pay all obedience to what was enjoined by it, before they knew what it contained. Whereas, if the liturgy had been first published with all due circumstances, it is possible that it might have found a better reception, and the canons less examined.

The Scotch nation, how capable soever it was of being led by some great men, and misled by the clergy, would have been corrupted by neither into a barefaced rebellion against their king, whose person they loved, and revered his government; nor could they have been wrought upon towards the lessening the one, or the other, by any other suggestions or infusions, than such as should make them jealous or apprehensive of a design to introduce popery; their whole religion consisting in an entire detestation of popery, in believing the pope to be Antichrist, and hating perfectly the persons of all papists; and I doubt all others, who did not hate them.

The canons now published, besides (as hath been touched before) that they had passed no approbation of the clergy, or been communicated to the council, appeared to be so many new laws imposed upon the whole kingdom by the king's sole authority, and contrived by a few private men, of whom they had no good opinion, and who were strangers to the nation; so that it was no other than a subjection to England, by receiving laws from thence, of which they were most jealous, and which they most passionately abhorred. Then they were so far from being confined to the church, and the matters of religion, that they believed there was no part of their civil government uninvaded by them, and no persons of what quality soever unconcerned, and, as they thought, unhurt in them. And there were some things in some particular canons, how rational soever in themselves, and how distant soever in the words and expressions from inclining to popery, which yet gave too much advantage to those who maliciously watched the occasion to persuade weak men, that it was an approach and introduction to that religion, the very imagination whereof intoxicated all men, and deprived them of all faculties to examine and judge.

The first canon defined and determined such an unlimited "power and prerogative to be in the king, according to the pattern" (in express terms) "of the kings of Israel, and such a full supremacy in all causes ecclesiastical, as hath never been pretended to by their former kings, or submitted to by the clergy and laity of that nation;" and which made impression upon men of all tempers, humours, and inclinations. "That no ecclesiastical person should become surety, or bound for any man; that national or general assemblies should be called only by the king's authority; that all bishops, and other ecclesiastical persons, who die without children, should be obliged to give a good part of their estates to the church, and, though they should have children, yet to leave somewhat to the church, and for advancement of learning;" which seemed rather to be matter of state, and policy, than of religion; thwarted their laws and customs, which had been observed by them; lessened, if not took away the credit of churchmen; and prohibited them from that liberty of commerce in civil affairs, which the laws permitted to them; and reflected upon the interests of those who had, or might have, a right to inherit from clergymen. "That none should receive the sacrament but upon their knees; that the clergy should have no private meetings for expounding scripture, or for consulting upon matters ecclesiastical; that no man should cover his head in the time of divine service; and that no clergyman should conceive prayers ex tempore, but be bound to pray only by the form prescribed in the liturgy," (which, by the way, was not seen nor framed,) "and that no man should teach a public school, or in a private house, without a license first obtained from the archbishop of the province, or the bishop of the diocese."

All these were new, and things with which they had not been acquainted; and though they were all to be commended to a regular and orderly people, piously disposed, yet it was too strong meat for infants in discipline, and too much nourishment to be administered at once to weak and queasy stomachs, too much inclined to nauseate what was most wholesome. But then, to apply the old terms of the church, to mention "the quatuor tempora, and restrain all ordinations to those four seasons of the year; to enjoin a font to be prepared in every church for baptism, and a decent table for the communion; and to direct and appoint the places where both font and table should stand, and decent ornaments for either; to restrain any excommunication from being pronounced, or absolution from being given, without the approbation of the bishop; to mention any practice of confession," (which they looked upon as the strongest and most inseparable limb of Antichrist,) and to enjoin, "that no presbyter should reveal any thing he should receive in confession, except in such cases, where, by the law of the land, his own life should be forfeited;" were all such matters of innovation, and in their nature so suspicious, that they thought they had reason to be jealous of the worst that could follow; and the last canon of all provided, "that no person should be received in holy orders, or suffered to preach or administer the sacraments, without first subscribing to these canons."

It was now easy for them who had those inclinations, to suggest to men of all conditions, that here was an entire new model of government in church and state; the king might do what he would upon them all, and the church was nothing but what the bishops would have it be: which they every day infused into the minds of the people, with all the art and artifices which administer jealousies of all kinds to those who were liable to be disquieted with them: yet they would not suffer (which shewed wonderful power and wonderful dexterity) any disorder to break out upon all this occasion, but all was quiet, except spreading of libels against the bishops, and propagating that spirit as much as they could, by their correspondence in England; where they found too many every day transported by the same infusions, in expectation that these seeds of jealousy from the canons would grow apace, and produce a proper reception for the liturgy.

It was about the month of July, in the year 1637, that the liturgy (after it had been sent out of Scotland, and perused by the three bishops in England, and then approved and confirmed by the king) was published, and appointed to be read in all the churches. And in this particular there was the same affected and premeditated omission, as had been in the preparation and publication of the canons; the clergy not at all consulted in it, and, which was more strange, not all the bishops acquainted with it; which was less censured afterwards, when some of them renounced their function, and became ordinary presbyters, as soon as they saw the current of the time. The privy-council had no other notice of it, than all the kingdom had, the Sunday before, when it was declared, "that the next Sunday the liturgy should be read;" by which they were the less concerned to foresee or prevent any obstructions which might happen.

The proclamation had appointed it to be read the Easter before; but the earl of Traquair, high treasurer of Scotland, (who was the only counsellor or layman relied upon by the archbishop of Canterbury in that business,) persuaded the king to defer it till July, that some good preparation might be made for the more cheerful reception of it. And as this pause gave the discontented party more heart, and more time for their seditious negotiations, so the ill consequences of it, or the actions which were subsequent to it, made him suspected to be privy to all the conspiracy, and in truth to be an enemy to the church; though, in truth, there neither appeared then, nor in all the very unfortunate part of his life afterwards, any just ground for that accusation and suspicion: but as he was exceedingly obliged to the archbishop, so he was a man of great parts, and well affected to the work in hand in his own judgment; and if he had been as much depended upon, to have advised the bishops in the prosecution and for the conduct of it, as he was to assist them in the carrying on whatsoever they proposed, it is very probable, that either so much would not have been undertaken together, or that it would have succeeded better; for he was without doubt not inferior to any of that nation in wisdom and dexterity. And though he was often provoked, by the insolence and petulance of some of the bishops, to a dislike of their overmuch fervour, and too little discretion, his integrity to the king was without blemish, and his affection to the church so notorious, that he never deserted it, till both it and he were overrun, and trod under foot; and they who were the most notorious persecutors of it never left persecuting him to the death.

Nor was any thing done which he had proposed, for the better adjusting things in that time of that suspension, but every thing left in the same state of unconcernedness as it had been before; not so much as the council being better informed of it; as if they had been sure that all men would have submitted to it for conscience sake.

On the Sunday morning appointed for the work, the chancellor of Scotland and others of the council being present in the cathedral church, the dean began to read the liturgy, which he had no sooner entered upon, but a noise and clamour was raised throughout the church, that no voice could be heard distinctly, and then a shower of stones, and sticks, and cudgels were thrown at the dean's head. The bishop went up into the pulpit, and from thence put them in mind of the sacredness of the place, of their duty to God and the king; but he found no more reverence, nor was the clamour or disorder less than before. The chancellor, from his seat, commanded the provost and magistrates of the city to descend from the gallery in which they sat, and by their authority to suppress the riot; which at last with great difficulty they did, by driving the rudest of those who made the disturbance out of the church, and shutting the doors, which gave the dean occasion to proceed in the reading of the liturgy, which was not at all attended or hearkened to by those who remained within the church; and if it had, they who were turned out continued their barbarous noise, broke the windows, and endeavoured to break down the doors; so that it was not possible for any to follow their devotions.

When all was done that at that time could be done there, and the council and magistrates went out of the church to their houses, the rabble followed the bishops with all the opprobrious language they could invent, of bringing in superstition and popery into the kingdom, and making the people slaves; and were not content to use their tongues, but employed their hands too in throwing dirt and stones at them; and treated the bishop of Edinburgh, whom they looked upon as most active that day, so rudely, that with difficulty he got into a house, after they had torn his habit, and was from thence removed to his own, with great hazard of his life. As this was the reception it had in the cathedral, so it fared not better in the other churches of the city, but was entertained with the same hollowing and outcries, and threatening the men, whose office it was to read it, with the same bitter execrations against bishops and popery.

Hitherto no person of condition or name appeared, or seemed to countenance this seditious confusion; it was the rabble, of which nobody was named, and, which is more strange, not one apprehended: and it seems the bishops thought it not of moment enough to desire or require any help or protection from the council; but without conferring with them, or applying themselves to them, they dispatched away an express to the king, with a full and particular information of all that had passed, and a desire that he would take that course he thought best for the carrying on his service.

Until this advertisement arrived from Scotland, there were very few in England who had heard of any disorders there, or of any thing done there, which might produce any. The king himself had been always so jealous of the privileges of that his native kingdom, (as hath been touched before,) and that it might not be dishonoured by a suspicion of having any dependence upon England, that he never suffered any thing relating to that to be debated, or so much as communicated to his privy-council in this, (though many of that nation were, without distinction, counsellors of England,) but handled all those affairs himself with two or three Scotsmen, who always attended in the court for the business of that kingdom, which was upon the matter still dispatched by the sole advice and direction of the marquis of Hamilton.

And the truth is, there was so little curiosity either in the court, or the country, to know any thing of Scotland, or what was done there, that when the whole nation was solicitous to know what passed weekly in Germany and Poland, and all other parts of Europe, no man ever inquired what was doing in Scotland, nor had that kingdom a place or mention in one page of any gazette, so little the world heard or thought of that people; and even after the advertisement of this preamble to rebellion, no mention was made of it at the council-board, but such a dispatch made into Scotland upon it, as expressed the king's dislike and displeasure, and obliged the lords of the council there to appear more vigorously in the vindication of his authority, and suppression of those tumults. But all was too little. That people, after they had once begun, pursued the business vigorously, and with all imaginable contempt of the government; and though in the hubbub of the first day there appeared nobody of name or reckoning, but the actors were really of the dregs of the people; yet they discovered by the countenance of that day, that few men of rank were forward to engage themselves in the quarrel on the behalf of the bishops; whereupon more considerable persons every day appeared against them, and (as heretofore in the case of St. Paul, Acts xiii. 50, the Jews stirred up the devout and honourable women) the women and ladies of the best quality declared themselves of the party, and, with all the reproaches imaginable, made war upon the bishops, as introducers of popery and superstition, against which they avowed themselves to be irreconcilable enemies: and their husbands did not long defer the owning the same spirit; inasmuch as within few days the bishops durst not appear in the streets, nor in any courts or houses, but were in danger of their lives; and such of the lords as durst be in their company, or seemed to desire to rescue them from violence, had their coaches torn in pieces, and their persons assaulted, inasmuch as they were glad to send for some of those great men, who did indeed govern the rabble, though they appeared not in it, who readily came and redeemed them out of their hands: so that by the time new orders came from England, there was scarce a bishop left in Edinburgh, and not a minister who durst read the liturgy in any church.

All the kingdom flocked to Edinburgh, as in a general cause that concerned their salvation, and resolved themselves into a method of government, erected several tables, in which deputies sat for the nobility, the gentlemen, the clergy, and the burghesses; out of either of which tables a council was elected to conduct their affairs, and a petition drawn up in the names of the nobility, lairds, clergy, and burghesses, to the king, complaining of the introduction of popery, and many other grievances. And if the lords of the council issued out any order against them, or if the king himself sent a proclamation for their repair to their houses, and for the preservation of the peace, presently some nobleman deputed by the tables published a protestation against those orders and proclamations, with the same confidence, and with as much formality, as if the government were regularly in their hands.

They called a general assembly, whither they summoned the bishops to appear before them, and for not appearing, excommunicated them; and then they united themselves by subscribing a covenant, which they pretended, with their usual confidence, to be no other than had been subscribed in the reign of king James, and that his majesty himself had subscribed it; by which imposition people of all degrees, supposing it might be a means to extinguish the present fire, with all alacrity engaged themselves in it; whereas in truth, they had inserted a clause never heard of, and quite contrary to the end of that covenant, whereby they obliged themselves to pursue the extirpation of bishops, and had the impudence to demand the same in express terms of the king, in answer to a very gracious message the king had sent to them. They published bitter invectives against the bishops and the whole government of the church, which they were not contented to send only into England to kindle the same fire there, but, with their letters, sent them to all the reformed churches, by which they raised so great a prejudice to the king, that too many of them believed, that the king had a real design to change religion, and to introduce popery.

It is very true, there were very many of the nobility, and persons of principal quality of that nation, and in Edinburgh at that time, who did not appear yet, and concur in this seditious behaviour, or own their being yet of their party; but on the contrary seemed very much to dislike their proceedings: but it is as true, that very few had the courage to do any thing in opposition to them, or to concur in the prosecution of any regal act against them; and did in some respects more advance their designs, than if they had manifestly joined with them. For these men, many of whom were of the council, by all their letters into England, exceedingly undervalued the disorder, as being "very easy to be suppressed in a short time, when the people's eyes should be opened; and that the removing the courts to some other place, and a gracious condescension in the king in offering pardon for what was past, would suddenly subdue them, and every body would return to his duty:" and the city of Edinburgh itself writ an humble letter to the archbishop of Canterbury, excusing the disorders which had been raised by the ignorance and rudeness of the meanest of the people, besought him "to intercede with his majesty for the suspension of his prejudice to them, till they should manifest their duty to him, by inflicting exemplary punishment upon the chief offenders, and causing the liturgy to be received and submitted to in all their churches;" which they professed they would in a short time bring to pass. So that by this means, and the interposition of all those of that nation who attended upon his majesty in his bedchamber, and in several offices at court, who all undertook to know by their intelligences that all was quiet, or would speedily be so; his majesty (who well knew that they who appeared most active in this confederacy were much inferior to those who did not appear, and who professed great zeal for his service) hardly prevailed with himself to believe that he could receive any disturbance from thence, till he found all his condescensions had raised their insolence, all his offers rejected, and his proclamation of pardon slighted and contemned; and that they were listing men towards the raising an army, under the obligation of their covenant, and had already chosen colonel Lesley, a soldier of that nation of long experience and eminent command under the king of Sweden in Germany, to be their general; who being lately disobliged (as they called it) by the king, that is, denied somewhat he had a mind to have, which to that people was always the highest injury, had accepted of the command. Then at last the king thought it time to resort to other counsels, and to provide force to chastise them, who had so much despised all the gentler remedies.

He could now no longer defer the acquainting his council-board, and the whole kingdom of England, with the indignities he had sustained in Scotland; which he did by proclamations and declarations at large, setting out the whole proceedings which had been; and in the end of the year 1638 declared his resolution to raise an army to suppress their rebellion, for which he gave present order.

And this was the first alarm England received towards any trouble, after it had enjoyed for so many years the most uninterrupted prosperity, in a full and plentiful peace, that any nation could be blessed with: and as there was no apprehension of trouble from within, so it was secured from without by a stronger fleet at sea than the nation had ever been acquainted with, which drew reverence from all the neighbour princes. The revenue had been so well improved, and so warily managed, that there was money in the exchequer proportionable for the undertaking any noble enterprise: nor did this first noise of war and approach towards action seem to make any impression upon the minds of men, the Scots being in no degree either loved or feared by the people; and most men hoped, that this would free the court from being henceforth troubled with those vermin; and so seemed to embrace the occasion with notable alacrity: and there is no doubt, but if that whole nation had been entirely united in the rebellion, and all who stayed in the court had marched in their army, and publicly owned the covenant, which in their hearts they adored, neither king nor kingdom could have sustained any damage by them; but the monument of their presumption and their shame would have been raised together, and no other memory preserved of their rebellion but in their memorable and infamous defeat.

God Almighty would not suffer this discerning spirit of wisdom to govern at this time: the king thought it unjust to condemn a nation for the transgression of a part of it, and still hoped to redeem it from the infamy of a general defection, by the exemplary fidelity of a superior party, and therefore withdrew not his confidence from any of those who attended his person, and who, in truth, lay leiger for the covenant, and kept up the spirits of their countrymen by their intelligence.

The king hastened the raising an army, which was not long in doing. He chose to make the earl of Arundel his general, a man who had nothing martial about him but his presence and his looks, and therefore was thought to be made choice of for his negative qualities: he did not love the Scots; he did not love the puritans; which good qualifications were allayed by another negative, he did love nobody else: but he was fit to keep the state of it; and his rank was such, that no man would decline the serving under him.

The earl of Essex was made lieutenant-general of the army, the most popular man of the kingdom, and the darling of the sword-men; who, between a hatred and a contempt of the Scots, had nothing like an affection for any one man of the nation; and therefore was so well pleased with his promotion, that he begun to love the king the better for conferring it upon him, and entered upon the province with great fidelity and alacrity, and was capable from that hour of any impression the king would have fixed upon him.

The earl of Holland was general of the horse; who, besides the obligations he had to the queen, (who vouchsafed to own a particular trust in him,) was not liable to the least suspicion of want of affection and zeal for the king's service.

In the beginning of the spring, which was in the year 1639, an army was drawn together of near six thousand horse, and about that number in foot, all very well disciplined men, under as good and experienced officers, as were to be found in any army in Christendom. And with this army, abundantly supplied with a train of artillery, and all other provisions necessary, the king advanced in the beginning of the summer towards the borders of Scotland.

This was not all the strength that was provided for the suppressing that rebellion, but the king had likewise provided a good fleet for the sea, and had caused a body of three thousand foot to be embarked on those ships; all which were put under the command of the marquis of Hamilton, who was to infect his country by sea to hinder their trade, and to make a descent upon the land, and join with such forces as the loyal party of that nation should draw together to assist the king's, which his own interest (as was believed) would give great life to, his family being numerous in the nobility, and united in an entire dependence upon him.

Upon the first march of the army northwards, the earl of Essex was sent with a party of horse and foot, to use all possible expedition to possess himself of Berwick, which the king had been advertised the Scots would speedily be masters of. The earl lost no time, but marched day and night with great order and diligence; and every day met several Scotsmen of quality well known to him, and sent expressly to the king, all who severally made him very particular relations of the strength of the Scots army, the excellent discipline that was observed in it, the goodness of the men, and that they were by that time possessed of Berwick; and when he was within one day's march of it, a person of principal condition, of very near relation to the king's service, (who pretended to be sent upon matter of high importance to his majesty from those who most intended his service there,) met him, and advised him very earnestly "not to advance farther with his party, which was so much inferior in number to those of the enemy, that it would infallibly be cut off: that himself overtook the day before a strong party of the army, consisting of three thousand horse and foot, with a train of artillery, all which he left at such a place," (which he named,) "within three hours' march of Berwick, where they resolved to be the night before, so that his proceeding farther must be fruitless, and expose him to inevitable ruin." These advertisements wrought no otherwise upon the earl, than to hasten his marches, inasmuch that he came to Berwick sooner than he proposed to have done, entered the place without the least opposition, and by all the inquiry he could make by sending out parties, and other advertisements, he could not discover that any of the enemies' forces had been drawn that way, nor indeed that they had any considerable forces together nearer than Edinburgh.

The earl being thus possessed of his post, lost no time in advertising the king of it, and sent him a very particular account of the informations he had received from so many ear and eyewitnesses, who were all at that time in the court, and very fit to be suspected after the publishing of so many falsehoods; and the men had been constant in the same reports, and as confident in reporting the defeat of the earl of Essex, and cutting off his party, as they had been to himself of the Scots' march, and their being masters of Berwick. The joy was not concealed with which his majesty received the news of the earl's being in Berwick, the contrary whereof these men made him apprehend with much perplexity; but they underwent no other reproach for their intelligence, than that their fears had multiplied their sight, and that they had been frightened with other men's relations; which remissness, to call it no worse, was an ill omen of the discipline that was like to be observed.

If the war had been now vigorously pursued, it had been as soon ended as begun; for at this time they had not drawn three thousand men together in the whole kingdom of Scotland, nor had in truth arms complete for such a number, though they had the possession of all the king's forts and magazines, nor had they ammunition to supply their few fire-arms; horses they had, and officers they had, which made all their show. But it was the fatal misfortune of the king, which proceeded from the excellency of his nature, and his tenderness of blood, that he deferred so long his resolution of using his arms; and after he had taken that resolution, that it was not prosecuted with more vigour.

He more intended the pomp of his preparations than the strength of them, and did still believe, that the one would save the labour of the other. At the same time that he resolved to raise an army, he caused inquiry to be made, what obligations lay upon his subjects to assist him, both as he went himself in person, and as it was an expedition against the Scots; which, in the ancient enmity between the two nations, had been provided for by some laws, and in the tenure which many men held their estates by. He found that the kings had usually, when they went to make war in their own persons, called as many of the nobility to attend upon them, as they thought fit.

And thereupon he summoned most of the nobility of the kingdom, without any consideration of their affections how they stood disposed to that service, to attend upon him by a day appointed, and throughout that expedition; presuming, that the glory of such a visible appearance of the whole nobility would look like such an union in the quarrel, as would at once terrify and reduce the Scots; not considering, that such kind of unitings do naturally produce the greatest confusions, when more and greater men are called together than can be united in affections or interests; and in the necessary differences which arise from thence, they quickly come to know each other so well, as they easily unite in several divisions, though never in any one public interest; and from hence the most dangerous factions have always arose, which have threatened and ruined the peace of nations: and it fell out no better here. If there had been none in the march but soldiers, it is most probable that a noble peace would have quickly ensued, even without fighting: but the progress was more illustrious than the march, and the soldiers were the least part of the army, and least consulted with.

In this pomp the king continued his journey to York, where he had a full court, those noblemen of the northern parts, and many others who overtook not the king till then, joining all in that city; where his majesty found it necessary to stay some days; and there the fruit, that was to be gathered from such a conflux, quickly budded out. Some rules were to be set down for the government of the army; and the court was too numerous to be wholly left to its own license; and the multitude of the Scots in it administered matter of offence and jealousy to people of all conditions, who had too much cause to fear that the king was every day betrayed; the common discourse by all the Scots being either magnifying the good intentions of their countrymen, and that they had all duty for the king, or undervaluing the power and interest of those who discovered themselves against the church.

It was therefore thought fit by the whole body of the council, that a short protestation should be drawn, in which all men should "profess their loyalty and obedience to his majesty, and disclaim and renounce the having any intelligence, or holding any correspondence with the rebels." No man imagined it possible that any of the English would refuse to make that protestation; and they who thought worst of the Scots did not think they would make any scruple of doing the same, and consequently that there would be no fruit or discovery from that test; but they were deceived. The Scots indeed took it to a man, without grieving their conscience, or reforming their manners. But amongst the English nobility the lord Say, and the lord Brook, (two popular men, and most undevoted to the church, and, in truth, to the whole government,) positively refused, in the king's own presence, to make any such protestation. They said, "If the king suspected their loyalty, he might proceed against them as he thought fit; but that it was against the law to impose any oath or protestation upon them which were not enjoined by the law; and, in that respect, that they might not betray the common liberty, they would not submit to it." This administered matter of new dispute in a very unseasonable time; and though there did not then appear more of the same mind, and they two were committed, at least restrained of their liberty; yet this discovered too much the humour and spirit of the court in their daily discourses upon that subject; so that the king thought it best to dismiss those two lords, and require them to return to their houses: and if all the rest who were not officers of the army, or of absolute necessity about the king's person, had been likewise dismissed and sent home, the business had been better prosecuted.

Indeed, if the king himself had stayed at London, or, which had been the next best, kept his court and resided at York, and sent the army on their proper errand, and left the matter of the war wholly to them, in all human reason, his enemies had been speedily subdued, and that kingdom reduced to their obedience, which it would not have been easy for them to have shaken off.

Before the king left York, letters and addresses were sent from the Scots, "lamenting their ill fortune, that their enemies had so great credit with the king, as to persuade him to believe, that they were or could be disobedient to him, a thing that could never enter into their loyal hearts; that they desired nothing but to be admitted into the presence of their gracious sovereign, to lay their grievances at his royal feet, and leave the determination of them entirely to his own wisdom and pleasure." And though the humility of the style gained them many friends, who thought it great pity that any blood should be spilt in a contention which his majesty might put an end to by his own word, as soon as he would hear their complaints; yet hitherto the king preserved himself from being wrought upon, and marched with convenient expedition to the very borders of Scotland, and encamped with his army in an open field, called the Berkes, on the further side of Berwick, and lodged in his tent with the army, though every day's march wrought very much upon the constitution if not the courage of the court, and too many wished aloud, "that the business were brought to a fair treaty."

Upon advertisement that a party of the Scots army was upon their march, the earl of Holland was sent with a body of three thousand horse, and two thousand foot, with a fit train of artillery, to meet it, and engage with it; who marched accordingly into Scotland early in a morning as far as a place called Dunce, ten or twelve miles into that kingdom. It was in the beginning of August, when the nights are very short, and, as soon as the sun rises, the days for the most part hotter than is reasonably expected from the climate, and by the testimony of all men that day was the hottest that had been known. When the earl came with his horse to Dunce, he found the Scots drawn up on the side of a hill, where the front could only be in view, and where, he was informed, the general Lesley and the whole army was; and it was very true, they where all there indeed; but it was as true, that all did not exceed the number of three thousand men, very ill armed, and most country fellows, who were on the sudden got together to make that show: and Lesley had placed them by the advantage of that hill so speciously, that they had the appearance of a good body of men, there being all the semblance of great bodies behind on the other side of the hill; the falsehood of which would have been manifest as soon as they should move from the place where they were, and from whence they were therefore not to stir.

The horse had outmarched the foot, which, by reason of the excessive heat, was not able to use great expedition: besides, there was some error in the orders, and some accidents of the night that had retarded them; so that when the enemy appeared first in view, the foot and the artillery was three or four miles behind.

Nothing can be said in the excuse of the counsel of that day, which might have made the king a glorious king indeed. The earl of Holland was a man of courage, and at that time not at all suspected to be corrupted in his affections; and though himself had not seen more of the war than two or three campaigns in Holland before his coming to the court, he had with him many as good officers as the war of that age, which was very active, had made, and men of unquestionable courage and military knowledge. As he might very safely have made a halt at Dunce, till his foot and artillery came up to him, so he might securely enough have engaged his body of horse against their whole pitiful army, there being neither tree nor bush to interrupt his charge; but it was thought otherwise; and no question it was generally believed, by the placing and drawing out their front in so conspicuous a place, by the appearance of other troops behind them, and by the shewing great herds of cattle at a distance upon the hills on either side, that their army was very much superior in number. And therefore, as soon as the earl came in view, he dispatched messengers one after another to the king, with an account of what he heard and saw, or believed he saw, and yet thought not fit to stay for an answer; but with the joint consent of all his superior officers (for it was never after pretended that any one officer of name dissuaded it, though they were still ashamed of it) retired towards his foot, to whom he had likewise sent orders not to advance; and so wearied and tired by the length of the march, and more by the heat of the weather, which was intolerable, they returned to the camp where the king was; and the Scots drew a little back to a more convenient post for their residence.

The covenanters, who very well understood the weakness of the court, as well as their own want of strength, were very reasonably exalted with this success, and scattered their letters abroad amongst the noblemen at court, according to the humours of the men to whom they writ; there being upon the matter an unrestrained intercourse between the king's camp and Edinburgh.

They writ three several letters to the three generals, the earl of Arundel, the earl of Essex, and the earl of Holland. That to the earl of Essex was in a dialect more submiss than to the others; they said much to him of "his own fame and reputation, which added to their affliction that he should be in arms against them; that they had not the least imagination of entering into a war against England; their only thought and hope was to defend their own rights and liberties, which were due to them by the laws of the land, until they might have access to his majesty, to expose their complaints to him, from which they were hindered by the power and greatness of some of their own countrymen;" being desirous the earl should understand that their principal grievance was the interest of the marquis of Hamilton, who, they knew, was not in any degree acceptable to the earl; and therefore desired him "to be ready to do them good offices to the king, that they might be admitted to his presence." The earl of Essex, who was a punctual man in point of honour, received this address superciliously enough, sent it to the king without returning any answer, or holding any conference, or performing the least ceremony, with or towards the messengers.

The earls of Arundel and Holland gave another kind of reception to the letters they received. To the former, after many professions of high esteem of his person, they enlarged upon "their great affection to the English nation, and how they abhorred the thought of a war between the two nations;" they besought him "to present their supplication" (which they enclosed) "to the king, and to procure their deputies admission to his majesty." The earl used them with more respect than was suitable to the office of a general, and made many professions of "his desire to interpose," "and mediate a good peace between the nations:" and it was confidently reported and believed, that he had frequently made those professions by several messages he had sent before into Scotland; and he had given passes to many obscure persons, to go into and return out of that kingdom.

Their letter to the earl of Holland was in a more confident style, as to a man from whom they expected all good offices. They sent him likewise a copy of their supplication to the king, and desired him "to use his credit that a treaty might be entered into, and that his majesty would appoint men of religion and of public hearts to manage the treaty." And from this time that earl was found at least enough inclined to that interest; and the king's readiness to hear discourses of a pacification, and that messengers would be shortly sent to him with propositions worthy of his acceptance, abated those animosities, and appetite to war, which had made all the noise in the march.

Indeed the marquis of Hamilton's neighbourly residence with his fleet and foot soldiers before Leith, without any show of hostility, or any care taken to draw his friends and followers together for the king's service; on the other side, the visits his mother made him on board his ship, who was a lady of great authority amongst the covenanters, and most addicted to it and them, her daughters being likewise married to those noblemen who most furiously persecuted the church, and presided in those councils; the king's refusing to give leave to some officers of horse, who had offered to make inroads into the country, and destroy the stock thereof, whereby they would be presently obliged to make submission, and to ask pardon; and lastly, the reception of the earl of Holland after his shameful retreat, with so much satisfaction and joy as his majesty had manifested upon his return, (having after the first messenger's arrival from Dunc, when the enemy was in view, sent him orders not to engage,) made it then suspected, as it was afterwards believed by those who stood nearest, that his majesty had in truth never any purpose to make the war in blood, but believed that by shewing an army to them, that was able to force them to any conditions, they would have begged pardon for the contests they had made, and so he should have settled the church, and all things else, according to his pleasure: and sure he might have done so, if he had but sat still, and been constant to his own honour, and positive in denying their insolent demands. But the Scots in the court had made impression upon so many of the English lords, that though at that time there were very few of them who had entered into an unlawful combination against the king, yet there was almost a general dislike of the war, both by the lords of the court and of the country; and they took this opportunity to communicate their murmurs to each other; none of the persons who were most maligned for their power and interest with the king being upon the place; and all men believing, that nothing could be asked of the king, but what must be satisfied at their charge, whose damage they considered, though it was to be procured at the expense of the king's honour. When the covenanters understood by their intelligence, that the season was ripe, they sent their supplication (of which they had scattered so many copies) to the king, and found themselves so welcome to all persons, that their modesty was not like to suffer any violence in offering the conditions.

The Scots had from the beginning practised a new sturdy style of address, in which, under the license of accusing the counsel and carriage of others, whom yet they never named, they bitterly and insolently reproached the most immediate actions and directions of his majesty himself; and then made the greatest professions of duty to his majesty's person that could be invented. The king had not, at that time, one person about him of his council, who had the least consideration of his honour, or friendship for those who sat at the helm of affairs; the duke of Lenox only excepted; who was a young man of small experience in affairs, though a man of great honour, and very good parts, and under the disadvantage of being looked upon as a Scotsman; which he was not in his affections at all, being born in England, of an English mother, and having had his education there; and had indeed the manners and nature and heart of an Englishman, and a duty and reverence and affection for the king and church accordingly; and would never trust himself in those intrigues, as too mysterious for him.

The rest who were about the king in any offices of attendance, were the earl of Holland, whom we have had occasion to mention before in the first entrance upon this discourse, and whom we shall have often occasion hereafter to speak of; and therefore shall say no more of him now, than that he neither loved the marquis of Hamilton, whom he believed the Scots intended to revenge themselves upon; nor Wentworth the deputy of Ireland; nor the archbishop of Canterbury; nor almost any thing that was then done in church or state. Secretary Coke, who had all the dispatches upon his hand, was near eighty years of age; a man of gravity, who never had quickness from his cradle; who loved the church well enough as it was twenty years before; and understood nothing that had been done in Scotland, and thought that nothing that was or could be done there worth such a journey as the king had put himself to. Sir Harry Vane was comptroller of the house, and a busy and a bustling man; who had credit enough to do his business in all places, and cared for no man otherwise than as he found it very convenient for himself. There was no other of his council of name but the general, the earl of Arundel; who was always true to the character under which he was heretofore delivered, and thought he had been general long enough. All the lustre of the court was in that part of the nobility which attended upon command, and at their own charge; and therefore the more weary of it. The earl of Pembroke hath been forgotten, who abhorred the war as obstinately as he loved hunting and hawking, and so was like to promote all overtures towards accommodation with great importunity: so the Scots found persons to treat with them according to their own wish. The earl of Essex still preserving his grandeur and punctuality, positively refused to meddle in the treaty, or to be communicated with, or so much as to be present, or receive any visits from the Scottish commissioners till after the pacification was concluded.

The covenanters were firm, and adhered still to their old natural principle, even in this their address; justified all they had done to be "according to their native rights, and for the better advancement of his majesty's service, which they had always before their eyes;" and desired "to have those receive exemplary punishment, who had done them ill offices, and misrepresented their carriage to the king; and that some noble lords might be appointed to treat upon all particulars." And upon no other submission than this a treaty was presently entered upon, and concluded.

Whosoever will take upon him to relate all that passed in that treaty, must be beholding to his own invention; the most material matters having passed in discourse, and very little committed to writing. Nor did any two who were present agree in the same relation of what was said and done; and which was worse, not in the same interpretation of the meaning of what was comprehended in writing. An agreement was made, if that can be called an agreement, in which nobody meant what others believed he did: "The armies were to be disbanded; an act of oblivion passed; the king's forts and castles to be restored; and an assembly and parliament to be called for a full settlement; no persons reserved for justice, because no fault had been committed." The king's army, by the very words of the agreement, was not to be disbanded until all should be executed on their part; and the king himself, at that time, resolved to be present in the assembly at least, if not in the parliament: but the impatience of all was such for peace, that the king's army was presently disbanded; his majesty making all possible haste himself to London, and sending the earl of Traquair to Edinburgh, to prepare all things for the assembly; whilst the Scots made all the caresses to many of the English, and breathed out in mutual confidence their resentments to each other.

The marquis of Hamilton (whether upon the fame of the treaty, or sent for by the king, few knew) left his fleet before Leith in a very peaceable posture, and came to the Berkes some hours after the treaty was signed; which was very convenient to him, for thereby he was free from the reproach that attended it, and at liberty to find fault with it; which he did freely to the king, and to some others, whereby he preserved himself in credit to do more mischief. Many were then of opinion, and still are, that the marquis at that time was very odious to his countrymen; and it is certain that the chief managers at the treaty did persuade the English in whom they most confided, that their principal aim was to remove him from the court; which was a design willingly heard, and universally grateful. But whatever state of grace he stood in when he came thither, he did himself so good offices before he parted, that he was no more in their disfavour. The king's army was presently disbanded, and the Scots returned to Edinburgh with all they desired; having gotten many more friends in England than they had before; kept all their officers, and as many of their men as they thought fit, in pay; and prosecuted all those who had not shewed the same zeal in their covenant as themselves with great rigour, as men whose affections they doubted; and, instead of remitting any thing of their rage against their bishops, they entered a public protestation, "That they did not intend, by any thing contained in "the treaty, to vacate any of the proceedings which had been in the late general assembly at Glasgow," (by which all the bishops stood excommunicated,) and renewed all their menaces against them by proclamation; and imposed grievous penalties upon all who should presume to harbour any of them in their houses: so that by the time the king came to London, it appeared plainly, that the army was disbanded without any peace made, and the Scots in more reputation, and equal inclination, to affront his majesty than ever. Upon which a paper published by them, and avowed to contain the matter of the treaty, was burned by the common hangman; everybody disavowing the contents of it, but nobody taking upon him to publish a copy that they owned to be true.

The mischief that befell the king from this wonderful atonement cannot be expressed, nor was it ever discovered what prevailed over his majesty to bring it so wofully to pass: all men were ashamed who had contributed to it; nor had he dismissed his army with so obliging circumstances as was like to incline them to come so willingly together, if there were occasion to use their service. The earl of Essex, who had merited very well throughout the whole affair, and had never made a false step in action or in council, was discharged in the crowd, without ordinary ceremony; and an accident happening at the same time, or very soon after, by the death of the lord Aston, whereby the command of the forest of Needwood fell into the king's disposal, which lay at the very door of his estate, and would infinitely have gratified him, was denied to him, and bestowed upon another: all which wrought very much upon his rough proud nature, and made him susceptible of some impressions afterwards, which otherwise would not have found such easy admission.

The factions and animosities at court were either greater, or more visible, than they had been before. The earl of Newcastle (who was governor to the prince, and one of the most valuable men in the kingdom, in his fortune, in his dependences, and in his qualifications) had, at his own charge, drawn together a goodly troop of horse of two hundred; which for the most part consisted of the best gentlemen of the north, who were either allied to the earl, or of immediate dependence upon him, and came together purely upon his account; and called this troop the prince of Wales's troop; whereof the earl himself was captain. When the earl of Holland marched with that party into Scotland, the earl of Newcastle accompanied him with that troop, and upon occasion of some orders, desired that troop, since it belonged to the prince of Wales, might have some precedence; which the general of the horse refused to grant him, but required him to march in the rank he had prescribed; and the other obeyed it accordingly, but with resentment, imputing it to the little kindness that was between them. But as soon as the army was disbanded, he sent a challenge to the earl of Holland, by a gentleman very punctual, and well acquainted with those errands; who took a proper season to mention it to him, without a possibility of suspicion. The earl of Holland was never suspected to want courage, yet in this occasion he shewed not that alacrity, but that the delay exposed it to notice; and so, by the king's authority, the matter was composed; though discoursed of with liberty enough to give the whole court occasion to express their affections to either party.

The king himself was very melancholic, and quickly discerned that he had lost reputation at home and abroad; and those counsellors who had been most faulty, either through want of courage, or wisdom, (for at that time few of them wanted fidelity,) never afterwards recovered spirit enough to do their duty, but gave themselves up to those who had so much overwitted them; every man shifting the fault from himself, and finding some friend to excuse him: and it being yet necessary, that so infamous a matter should not be covered with absolute oblivion, it fell to secretary Coke's turn, (for whom nobody cared,) who was then near fourscore years of age, to be made the sacrifice; and, upon pretence that he had omitted the writing what he ought to have done, and inserted somewhat he ought not to have done, he was put out of his office; and within a short time after, sir Henry Vane (who was treasurer of the house) by the dark contrivance of the marquis of Hamilton, and by the open and visible power of the queen, made secretary of State; which was the only thing that could make the removal of the other old man censured and murmured at: and this was attended again with a declared and unseasonable dislike and displeasure in the queen against the lieutenant of Ireland, newly made Earl of Strafford; who out of some kindness to the old man, who had been much trusted by him and of use to him, and out of contempt and detestation of Vane, but principally out of a desire to have had that miscarriage expiated by a greater sacrifice, opposed the removal of secretary Coke with all the interest he could, got it suspended for some time, and put the queen to the exercise of her full power to perfect her work; which afterwards produced many sad disasters. So that this unhappy pacification kindled many fires of contention in court and country, though the flame broke out first again in Scotland.

On the other side, the Scots got so much benefit and advantage by it, that they brought all their other mischievous devices to pass with ease, and a prosperous gale in all they went about. They had before no credit abroad in any foreign parts, and so could procure neither arms nor ammunition; and though they could lead the people at home, out of the hatred and jealousy of popery, into unruly tumults, yet they had not authority enough over them to engage them in a firm resolution of rebellion: the opinion of their unquestionable duty and loyalty to the king was that which had given them reputation to affront him: nor durst they yet attempt to lay any tax or imposition upon the people, or to put them to any charge. But, after this pacification, they appeared much more considerable abroad and at home; abroad, where they were without a name, and considered by nobody, now that they had brought an army into the field against the king, gained all they pretended to desire, without reproach or blemish; France, their old ally, looked upon them as good instruments to disturb their neighbours; and cardinal Richelieu (who had never looked upon the defeat and overthrow at the isle of Rhé as any reparation for the attempt and dishonour of the invasion) was very glad of the opportunity of disturbing a rest and quiet, which had not been favourable to his designs; and sent an agent privately to Edinburgh, to cherish and foment their unpeaceable inclinations; and received another from thence, who solicited supplies, and communicated counsels: he sent them arms and ammunition, and promised them encouragement and assistance proportionable to any enterprize they should frankly engage themselves in. Holland entered into a closer correspondence with them; and they found credit there for a great stock of arms and ammunition, upon security of payment within a year; which security they easily found a way to give. And thus countenanced and supplied, they quickly got credit and power over the people at home; and as soon as they had formed some troops of those who had been listed by them under good officers, (whereof store resorted to them of that nation out of Germany and Sweden,) and assigned pay to them, they made no longer scruple to impose what money they thought fit upon the people, and to levy it with all rigour upon them who refused, or expressed any unwillingness to submit to the imposition; and made the residence of any amongst them very uneasy, and very insecure, who were but suspected by them not to wish well to their proceedings: and so they renewed all those forms for the administration of the government, which they had begun in the beginning of the disorders, and which they disclaimed upon making the pacification; and refused to suffer the king's governor of the castle of Edinburgh (which was put into his hands about the same time) either to repair some works which were newly fallen down, or so much as to buy provision in the town for the food of the garrison.

But that which was the greatest benefit and advantage that accrued unto them from the agreement, and which was worth all the rest, was the conversation they had with the English with so much reputation, that they had persuaded very many to believe, that they had all manner of fidelity to the king, and had too much cause to complain of the hard proceedings against them by the power of some of their own countrymen; and the acquaintance they made with some particular lords, to that degree, that they did upon the matter agree what was to be done for the future, and how to obstruct any opposition or proceedings by those who were looked upon as enemies by both sides: for none in Scotland more disliked all that was done in court, and the chief actors there, than those lords of England did; though they were not so well prepared for an expedient for the cure.

The people of Scotland being now reduced to a more implicit obedience, and nobody daring to oppose the most violent proceedings of the most violent persons in authority, they lost no time, as hath been said, to make all preparations for a war they meant to pursue. Most of the king's privy council and great ministers, who (though they had not vigorously performed their duty in support of the regal power) till now had been so reserved, that they seemed not to approve the disorderly proceedings, but now as frankly wedded that interest as any of the leaders, and quickly became the chief of the leaders.

[Of these was] the earl of Argyle: who had been preserved by the king's immediate kindness and full power, and rescued from the anger and fury of his incensed father; who, being provoked by the disobedience and insolence of his son, resolved so to have disposed of his fortune, that little should have accompanied the honour after his death. But by the king's interposition, and indeed imposition, the earl, in strictness of the law in Scotland, having need of the king's grace and protection, in regard of his being become Roman Catholic, and his majesty granting all to the son which he could exact from the father, the old man was in the end compelled to make over all his estate to his son; reserving only such a provision for himself, as supported him according to his quality during his life, which he spent in the parts beyond the seas. The king had too much occasion afterwards to remember, that in the close, after his majesty had determined what should be done on either part, the old man declared, "He would submit to the king's pleasure, though he believed he was hardly dealt with;" and then with some bitterness put his son in mind of his undutiful carriage towards him; and charged him "to carry in his mind how bountiful the king had been to him;" which yet, he told him, he was sure he would forget: and thereupon said to his majesty, "Sir, I must know this young man better than you can do: you have brought me low, that you may raise him; which I doubt you will live to repent; for he is a man of craft, subtilty, and falsehood, and can love no man; and if ever he finds it in his power to do you mischief, he will be sure to do it." The king considered it only as the effect of his passion, and took no other care to prevent it, but by heaping every day new obligations upon him; making him a privy councillor, and giving him other offices and power to do hurt, thereby to restrain him from doing it; which would have wrought upon any generous nature the effect it ought to have done. This earl (for his father was now dead) came not to Edinburgh during the first troubles; and though he did not dissemble his displeasure against the bishops, because one of them had affronted him, in truth, very rudely, yet he renewed all imaginable professions of duty to the king, and a readiness to engage in his service, if those disorders should continue: but after the pacification and the disbanding of the king's army, and the covenanters declaring that they would adhere to the acts of the Assembly at Glasgow, he made haste to Edinburgh with a great train of his family and followers; and immediately signed the covenant, engaged for the provision of arms, and raising forces; and in all things behaved himself like a man that might very safely be confided in.

There wanted not persons still who persuaded the king, "that all might yet be ended without blood; that there were great divisions amongst the chief leaders, through emulation and ambition of command; and that the access of the earl of Argyll to that party would drive others as considerable from it, who never did, nor ever would, unite with him in any design;" and therefore advised, "that his majesty would require them to send some persons intrusted by their body to attend him, and give an account of the reasons of their proceedings." They demanded a safe conduct for the security of the persons they should employ; which was sent accordingly: and thereupon some persons, of the nobility, and others, were commissioned to wait on the king; amongst which the lord Lowden was principally relied on for his parts and abilities; a man who was better known afterwards, and whom there will hereafter be so often occasion to mention, as it will not be necessary in this place further to enlarge upon him. They behaved themselves, in all respects, with the confidence of men employed by a foreign state; refused to give any account but to the king himself; and even to himself gave no other reason for what was done, but the authority of the doers, and the necessity that required it; that is, that they thought it necessary: but then they polished this sturdy behaviour with all the professions of submission and duty, which their language could comprehend.

At this time the king happened to intercept a letter, which had been signed by the chief of the covenanters, and particularly by the lord Lowden, written to the French king, in which they complained "of the hardness and injustice of the government that was exercised over them; put him in mind of the dependence this kingdom formerly had upon that crown; and desired him now to take them into his protection, and give them assistance; and that his majesty would give entire credit to one Colvil, who was the bearer of that letter, and well instructed in all particulars;" and the letter itself was sealed and directed Au Roy: a style only used from subjects to their natural king. This letter being seen and perused by the lords of the council, and the lord Lowden being examined, and refusing to give any other answer, than "That it was writ before the agreement, and thereupon reserved and never sent; that, if he had committed any offence, he ought to be questioned for it in Scotland, and not in England; and insisting upon his safe conduct, demanded liberty to return." All men were of opinion, that so foul a conspiracy and treason ought not to be so slightly excused; and that both the lord Lowden and Colvil (who was likewise found in London, and apprehended) should be committed to the Tower: which was done accordingly; all men expecting that they would be brought to a speedy trial.

This discovery made a very deep impression upon the king; and persuaded him, that such a foul application could never have been thought of, if there had not been more poison in the heart, than could be expelled by easy antidotes; and that the strongest remedies must be provided to root out this mischief: thereupon he first advised with that committee of the council, which used to be consulted in secret affairs, what was to be done. That summer's action had wasted all the money that had been carefully laid up; and, to carry on that vast expense, the revenue of the crown had been anticipated; so that, though the raising an army was visibly necessary, there appeared no means how to raise that army. No expedient occurred to them so proper as a parliament, and which had been now intermitted near twelve years. And though those meetings had of late been attended by some disorders, the effects of mutinous spirits; and the last had been dissolved (as hath been said before) with some circumstances of passion and undutifulness, which so far incensed the king, that he was less inclined to those assemblies; yet this long intermission, and the general composure of men's minds in a happy peace, and universal plenty over the whole nation, (superior sure to what any other nation ever enjoyed,) made

THOMAS, FIRST LORD COVENTRY

OR 1610

FROM THE ORIGINAL MANUSCRIPT IN THE COLLECTION OF

it reasonably believed, notwithstanding the murmurs of the people against some exorbitancies of the court, that sober men, and such as loved the peace and plenty they were possessed of, would be made choice of to serve in the house of commons; and then the temper of the house of peers was not to be apprehended: but especially the opinion of the prejudice and general aversion over the whole kingdom to the Scots, and the indignation they had at their presumption in their thought of invading England, made it believed, that a parliament would express a very sharp sense of their insolence and carriage towards the king, and provide remedies proportionable.

Upon these motives and reasons, with the unanimous consent and advice of the whole committee, the king resolved to call a parliament; which he communicated the same day, or rather took the resolution that day, in his full council of state, which expressed great joy upon it; and directed the lord keeper to issue out writs for the meeting of a parliament upon the 13th day of April then next ensuing; it being now in the month of December; and all expedition was accordingly used in sending out the said writs, the notice of it being most welcome to the whole kingdom.

That it might appear that the court was not at all apprehensive of what the parliament would or could do; and that it was convened by his majesty's grace and inclination, not by any motive of necessity; it proceeded in all respects in the same unpopular ways it had done: ship-money was levied with the same severity; and the same rigour used in ecclesiastical courts, without the least compliance with the humour of any man; which was great steadiness; and, if it were then well pursued, it degenerated too soon afterwards.

In this interval, between the sealing the writs and the convention of the parliament, the lord keeper Coventry died; to the king's great detriment, rather than to his own. So much hath been said already of this great man, that there shall be no further enlargement in this place, than to say, that he was a very wise and excellent person, and had a rare felicity, in being looked upon generally throughout the kingdom with great affection, and a singular esteem, when very few other men in any high trust were so; and it is very probable, if he had lived to the sitting of that parliament, when, whatever lurked in the hearts of any, there was not the least approach of any irreverence to the crown, that he might have had great authority in the forming those counsels, which might have preserved it from so unhappy a dissolution. His loss was the more manifest and visible in his successor; the seal being within a day or two given to sir John Finch, chief justice of the court of common pleas; a man exceedingly obnoxious to the people upon the business of ship-money; and not of reputation and authority enough to countenance and advance the king's service.

These digressions have taken up too much time, and may seem foreign to the proper subject of this discourse; yet they may have given some light to the obscure and dark passages of that time, which were understood by very few. But for the future, very short mention shall be made of any thing but what immediately relates to the person, whose life is to be herein contained, or what is necessary to explain and illustrate those actions or counsels, in which he was interested or concerned.

The parliament met according to summons upon the 13th of April in the year 1640, with the usual ceremony and formality; and after the king had shortly mentioned "his desire to be again acquainted with parliaments, after so long an intermission; and to receive the advice and assistance of his subjects there;" he referred the cause of the present convention to be enlarged upon by the lord keeper: who related the whole proceedings of Scotland; "his majesty's condescensions the year before, in disbanding his army upon their promises and professions; their insolencies since; and their address to the king of France, "by the letter mentioned before;" which the king had touched upon, and having forgot to make the observation upon the superscription himself, he required the keeper to do it; who told them, after the whole relation, "That his majesty did not expect advice from them, much less that they should interpose in any office of mediation, which would not be grateful to him; but that they should, as soon as might be, give his majesty such a supply, as he might provide for the vindication of his honour, by raising an army, which the season of the year, and the progress the rebels had already made, called upon without delay; and his majesty assured them, if they would gratify him with this expedition, that he would give them time enough afterwards to represent any grievances to him, and a favourable answer to them;" and so dismissed the commons to choose their speaker; to which sergeant Glanville was designed, and chosen the same day: a man very equal to the work, very well acquainted with the proceedings in parliament; of a quick conception, and of a ready and voluble expression, dexterous in disposing the house, and very acceptable to them. The earl of Arundel, earl marshal of England, was made lord steward of the king's house; an office necessary in the beginning of a parliament; being to swear all the members of the house of commons before they could sit there. Two days after, the commons presented their speaker to the king, who, in the accustomed manner, approved their choice; upon which they returned to their house, being now formed and qualified to enter upon any debates.

The house met always at eight of the clock, and rose at twelve; which were the old parliament hours; that the committees, upon whom the greatest burden of business lay, might have the afternoons for their preparation and despatch. It was not the custom to enter upon any important business in the first fortnight; both because many members used to be absent so long; and that time was usually thought necessary for the appointment and nomination of committees, and for other ceremonies and preparations that were usual; but there was no regard now to that custom; and the appearance of the members was very great, there having been a large time between the issuing out of the writs and the meeting of the parliament, so that all elections were made and returned, and every body was willing to fall to the work.

Whilst men gazed upon each other, looking who should begin, (much the greatest part having never before sat in parliament,) Mr. Pym, a man of good reputation, but much better known afterwards, who had been as long in those assemblies as any man then living, brake the ice, and in a set discourse of above two hours, after mention of the king with the most profound reverence, and commendation of his wisdom and justice, he observed, "That by the long intermission of parliaments many unwarrantable things had been practised, notwithstanding the great virtue of his majesty:" and then enumerated all the projects which had been set on foot; all the illegal proclamations which had been published, and the proceedings which had been upon those proclamations; the judgment upon ship-money; and many grievances which related to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction; summing up shortly, and sharply, all that most reflected upon the prudence and the justice of the government; concluding, "That he had only laid that scheme before them, that they might see how much work they had to do to satisfy their country; the method and manner of the doing whereof he left to their wisdoms." Mr. Grimston insisted only on the business of ship-money; the irregular and preposterous engaging the judges to deliver their opinion to the king, and their being afterwards divided in their judgment; and said, "He was persuaded, that they, who gave their opinions for the legality of it, did it against the dictamen of their own conscience." Peard, a bold lawyer, of little note, inveighed more passionately against it, calling it an abomination: upon which, Herbert, the king's solicitor, with all imaginable address, in which he then excelled, put them in mind "with what candour his majesty had proceeded in that, and all other things which related to the administration of justice to all his people; that, how persuaded soever he was within himself of the justice as well as necessity of levying ship-money, he would not send out a writ for the doing thereof, till he received the affirmative advice of all the judges of England; and when the payment was opposed by a gentleman," and then he took occasion to stroke and commend Mr. Hamden, who sat under him, for his great temper and modesty in the prosecution of that suit, "the king was very well contented that all the judges of England should determine the right; that never any cause had been debated and argued more solemnly before the judges; who, after long deliberation between themselves, and being attended with the records, which had been cited on both sides, delivered each man his opinion and judgment publicly in the court, and so largely, that but two judges argued in a day; and after all this, and a judgment with that solemnity pronounced for the king, by which the king was as legally possessed of that right, as of any thing else he had; that any particular man should presume to speak against it with that bitterness, and to call it an abomination, was very offensive, and unwarrantable; and desired that that gentleman, who had used that expression, might explain himself, and then withdraw." Very many called him to the bar; and the solicitor's discourse was thought to have so much weight in it, that Mr. Peard very hardly escaped a severe reprehension; which is mentioned only that the temper and sobriety of that house may be taken notice of, and their dissolution, which shortly after fell out, the more lamented.

Though the parliament had not sat above six or seven days, and had managed all their debates, and their whole behaviour, with wonderful order and sobriety, the court was impatient that no advance was yet made towards a supply; which was foreseen would take up much time, whensoever they went about it, though never so cordially; and therefore they prevailed with the house of peers, which was more entirely at the king's disposal, that it would demand a conference with the house of commons, and then propose to them, by way of advice, "That they would begin with giving the king a supply, in regard of the urgency and even necessity of his affairs, and afterwards proceed upon their grievances, or any thing else as they thought fit:" and the house of peers accordingly did give their advice to this purpose at a conference. This conference was no sooner reported in the house of commons, than their whole temper seemed to be shaken. It was the undoubted fundamental privilege of the commons in parliament, that all supplies should have their rise and beginning from them; this had never been infringed, or violated, or so much as questioned in the worst times; and that now after so long intermission of parliaments, that all privileges might be forgotten, the house of peers should begin with an action their ancestors never attempted, administered too much cause of jealousy of somewhat else that was intended; and so with an unanimous consent they declared it to be "so high a breach of privilege, that they could not proceed upon any other matter until they first received satisfaction and reparation from the house of peers;" and which the next day they demanded at a conference. The lords were sensible of their error; which had been foreseen, and dissuaded by many of them; they acknowledged the privilege of the commons as fully as they demanded it, and hoped they had not broken it by offering their advice to them without mentioning the nature of the supply, the proportion, or manner of raising it, which they confessed belonged entirely to them: in fine, they desired them, "that this might be no occasion of wasting their time, but that they would proceed their own way, and in their own method, upon the affairs of the kingdom." This gave no satisfaction; was no reparation; and served their turn who had no mind to give any supply without discovering any such dissatisfaction, which would have got them no credit, the house being generally exceedingly disposed to please the king, and to do him service. But this breach of privilege, which was craftily enlarged upon, as if it swallowed up all their other privileges, and made them wholly subservient to the peers, was universally resented. A committee was appointed to examine precedents of former times, in case of violation of their privileges by the lords, though not of that magnitude, and thereupon to prepare a protestation to be sent up to the house of peers, and to be entered in their own Journal; and in the mean time no proceedings to be in the house upon any public business, except upon some report from a committee.

After some days had been passed in this manner, and it not being in view when this debate would be at an end, the king thought of another expedient, and sent a message in writing to the commons by sir Henry Vane, who was now both secretary of state and treasurer of the household, and at that time of good credit there; wherein his majesty took notice, "that there was some difference between the two houses, which retarded the trans-

"action of the great affairs of the kingdom, at a time when a foreign army was ready to invade it: that he heard the payment of ship-money, notwithstanding that it was adjudged his right, was not willingly submitted to by the people; to manifest therefore his good affection to his subjects in general, he made this proposition: that if the parliament would grant him twelve subsidies to be paid in three years, in the manner proposed, (that was, five subsidies to be paid the first year, four the second, and three to be paid in the last year,) his majesty would then release all his title or pretence to ship-money for the future, in such a manner as his parliament should advise."

Though exceptions might have been taken again in point of privilege, because his majesty took notice of the difference between the two houses; yet that spirit had not then taken so deep root: so that they resolved to enter, the next day after the delivery of it, upon a full debate of his majesty's message; they who desired to obstruct the giving any supply, believing they should easily prevail to reject this proposition upon the greatness of the sum demanded, without appearing not to favour the cause in which it was to be employed, which they could not have done with any advantage to themselves, the number of that class of men being then not considerable in the house. It was about the first day of May that the message was delivered, and the next day it was resumed about nine of the clock in the morning, and the debate continued till four of the clock in the afternoon; which had been seldom used before, but afterwards grew into custom. Many observed, "that they were to purchase a release of an imposition very unjustly laid upon the kingdom, and by purchasing it, they should upon the matter confess it had been just;" which no man in his heart acknowledged; and therefore wished, "that the judgment might be first examined, and being once declared void, what they should present the king with would appear a gift, and not a recompense:" but this was rather modestly insinuated than insisted upon; and the greater number reflected more of the proportion demanded, which some of those who were thought very well to understand the state of the kingdom, confidently affirmed to be more than the whole stock in money of the kingdom amounted to; which appeared shortly after to be a very gross miscomputation. There were very few, except those of the court, (who were ready to give all that the king would ask, and indeed had little to give of their own,) who did not believe the sum demanded to be too great, and wished that a less might be accepted, and therefore were willing, when the day was so far spent, that the debate might be adjourned till the next morning; which was willingly consented to by all, and so the house rose. All this agitation had been in a committee of the whole house, the speaker having left the chair, to which Mr. Lenthall, a lawyer of no eminent account, was called. But there was not, in the whole day, in all the variety of contradictions, an offensive or angry word spoken: except only that one private country gentleman, little known, said, "He observed that the supply was to be employed in the supporting bellum episcopale, which he thought the bishops were fittest to do themselves:" but as there was no reply, or notice taken of it, so there was nobody who seconded that envious reflection, nor any other expression of that kind.

The next day as soon as the house met, and prayers were read, it resolved again into a grand committee, the same person being again called to the chair: it was expected, and hoped, that there would have been some new message from the king, that might have facilitated the debate; but nothing appearing of that kind, the proposition was again read, and men of all sides discoursed much of what had been said before, and many spoke with more reflection upon the judgment of ship-money than they had done the day past, and seemed to wish, "that whatsoever we should give the king should be a free testimony of our affection and duty, without any release of ship-money, which deserved no consideration, but in a short time would appear void and null." And this seemed to agree with the sense of so great a part of the house, that Mr. Hambden, the most popular man in the house, (and the same who had defended the suit against the king in his own name, upon the illegality of ship-money,) thought the matter ripe for the question, and desired that the question might be put, "Whether the house would consent to the proposition made by the king, as it was contained in the message?" which would have been sure to have found a negative from all who thought the sum too great, or were not pleased that it should be given in recompense of ship-money.

When many called to have this question, sergeant Glanville, the speaker, (who sat by amongst the other members whilst the house was in a committee, and hath rarely used to speak in such seasons,) rose up, and in a most pathetic speech, in which he excelled, endeavoured to persuade the house "to comply with the king's desire, for the good of the nation, and to reconcile him to parliament for ever, which this seasonable testimony of their affections would infallibly do." He made it manifest to them how very inconsiderable a sum twelve subsidies amounted to, by telling them, "that he had computed what he was to pay for those twelve subsidies;" and when he named the sum, and he being known to be possessed of a great estate, it seemed not worth any further deliberation. And in the warmth of his discourse, which he plainly discerned made a wonderful impression upon the house, he let fall some sharp expressions against the imposition of ship-money, and the judgment in the point, which he said plainly "was against the law, if he understood what law was," (who was known to be very learned,) which expression, how necessary and artificial soever to reconcile the affections of the house to the matter in question, very much irreconciled him at court, and to those upon whom he had the greatest dependence.

There was scarce ever a speech that more gathered up and united the inclinations of a popular council to the speaker: and if the question had been presently put, it was believed the number of the dissenters would not have appeared great. But after a short silence, some men, who wished well to the main, expressed a dislike of the way, so that other men recovered new courage, and called again with some earnestness, "That the question formerly proposed by Mr. Hambden should be put;" which seemed to meet with a concurrence. Mr. Hyde then stood up, and desired, "that question might not be put; said, it was a captious question, to which only one sort of men could clearly give their vote, which were they who "were for a rejection of the king's proposition, and no more resuming the debate upon that subject: but that they who desired to give the king a supply, as he believed most did, though not in such a proportion, nor, it may be, in that manner, could receive no satisfaction by that question; and therefore he proposed, to the end that every man might frankly give his yea, or his no, that the question might be put only, upon the giving the king a supply: which being carried in the affirmative, another question might be upon the proportion, and the manner; and if the first were carried in the negative, it would produce the same effect, as the other question proposed by Mr. Hambden would do."

This method was received with great approbation, but opposed by others with more than ordinary passion, and diverted by other propositions, which being seconded took much time, without pointing to any conclusion. In the end sergeant Glanville said, "That there had been a question proposed by his countryman, that agreed very well with his sense, and moved that the gentleman might be called upon to propose it again." Whereupon Mr. Hyde stated the case again as he had done, answered somewhat that had been said against it, and moved, "that question might be put." Whereupon for a long time there was nothing said, but a confused clamour, and call, "Mr. Hambden's question," "Mr. Hyde's question;" the call appearing much stronger for the last, than the former: and it was generally believed, that the question had been put, and carried in the affirmative, though it was positively opposed by Herbert the solicitor general, for what reason no man could imagine, if sir Henry Vane the secretary had not stood up, and said, "That, as it had been always his custom to deal plainly and clearly with that house in all things, so he could not but now assure them, that the putting and carrying that question could be of no use; for that he was most sure, and had authority to tell them so, that if they should pass a vote for the giving the king a supply, if it were not in the proportion and manner proposed in his majesty's message, it would not be accepted by him; and therefore desired that question might be laid aside;" which being again urged by the solicitor general upon the authority of what the other had declared, and the other privy-counsellors saying nothing, though they were much displeased with the secretary's averment, the business was no more pressed; but it being near five of the clock in the afternoon, and every body weary, it was willingly consented to that the house should be adjourned till the next morning.

Both sir Henry Vane, and the solicitor general Herbert, (whose opinion was of more weight with the king than the others,) had made a worse representation of the humour and affection of the house than it deserved, and undertook to know, that if they came together again, they would pass such a vote against ship-money, as would blast that revenue and other branches of the receipt; which others believed they would not have had the confidence to have attempted; and very few, that they would have had the credit to have compassed. What followed in the next parliament, within less than a year, made it believed, that sir Henry Vane acted that part maliciously, and to bring all into confusion; he being known to have an implacable hatred against the earl of Strafford, lieutenant of Ireland, whose destruction was then upon the anvil. But what transported the solicitor, who had none of the ends of the other, could not be imagined, except it was his pride and peevishness, when he found that he was like to be of less authority there, than he looked to be; and yet he was heard with great attention, though his parts were most prevalent in puzzling and perplexing that discourse he meant to cross. Let their motives be what they would, they two, and they only, wrought so far with the king, that, without so much deliberation as the affair was worthy of, his majesty the next morning, which was on the fourth or fifth of May, not three weeks from their first meeting, sent for the speaker to attend him, and took care that he should go directly to the house of peers, upon some apprehension that if he had gone to the house of commons, that house would have entered upon some ingrateful discourse; which they were not inclined to do; and then sending for that house to attend him, the keeper, by his majesty's command, dissolved the parliament.

There could not a greater damp have seized upon the spirits of the whole nation, than this dissolution caused; and men had much of the misery in view, which shortly after fell out. It could never be hoped, that more sober and dispassionate men would ever meet together in that place, or fewer who brought ill purposes with them; nor could any man imagine what offence they had given, which put the king to that resolution. But it was observed, that in the countenances of those who had most opposed all that was desired by his majesty, there was a marvellous serenity; nor could they conceal the joy of their hearts: for they knew enough of what was to come, to conclude that the king would be shortly compelled to call another parliament; and they were as sure, that so many grave and unbiassed men would never be elected again.

Within an hour after the dissolving, Mr. Hyde met Mr. Saint-John, who had naturally a great cloud in his face, and very seldom was known to smile, but then had a most cheerful aspect, and seeing the other melancholic, as in truth he was from his heart, asked him, "What troubled him?" who answered, "That the same that troubled him, he believed, troubled most good men; that in such a time of confusion, so wise a parliament, which could only have found remedy for it, was so unseasonably dismissed: the other answered with a little warmth, "That all was well: and that it must be worse, before it could be better; and that this parliament would never have done what was necessary to be done;" as indeed it would not, what he and his friends thought necessary.

The king, when he had better reflected upon what was like to fall out, and was better informed of the temper and duty of the house of commons, and that they had voted a supply, if sir Henry Vane had not hindered it by so positive a declaration that his majesty would refuse it, was heartily sorry for what he had done; declared with great anger, "That he had never given him such authority; and that he knew well that the giving him any supply would have been welcome to him, because the reputation of his subjects assisting him in that conjuncture was all that he looked for and considered." He consulted the same day, or the next, whether he might by his proclamation recall them to meet together again : but finding that impossible, he fell roundly to find out all expedients for the raising of money, in which he had so wonderful success, that, in less than three weeks, by the voluntary loan of the particular lords of the council, and of other private gentlemen about the city, some relating to the court, and others strangers to it, there was no less than three hundred thousand pounds paid into the exchequer to be issued out as his majesty should direct : a sum that sufficiently manifests the plenty of that time, and greater than any prince in Europe could have commanded in so short a time ; and was an unanswerable evidence, that the hearts of his subjects were not then alienated from their duty to the king, or a just jealousy for his honour.

All diligence was used in making levies, in which few of the general officers which had been employed the year before were made use of ; though it was great pity that the earl of Essex was not again taken in ; which had infallibly preserved him from swerving from his duty, and he would have discharged his trust with courage and fidelity, and therefore probably with success : but he was of a rough, proud nature, and did not think his last summer's service so well requited that he was earnestly to solicit for another office ; though there was no doubt but he would have accepted it, if it had been offered.

A general was appointed, the earl of Northumberland ; and the lord Conway general of the horse : which made the great officers of the former year, the earl of Arundel, the earl of Essex, and the earl of Holland, (who thought themselves free from any oversights that had been committed,) more capable of infusions by those who were ready to work according to the occurrences upon their several constitutions, and I am persuaded if this war had been left to the managery of the same officers, or rather if the earl of Essex had been made general, (who, notwithstanding the trivial disobligation he had received in being denied the command of Beedon-forest, might easily have been caressed,) it would have been more prosperously carried on. But the reputation of the earl of Northumberland, who had indeed arrived at a wonderful general estimation, was believed to be most instrumental : and the lord Conway by as gentle and as general a concurrence was thought an able soldier, and of great parts. Besides, the earls of Essex and Holland (for, for the earl of Arundel, there was neither reason why he was general in the first expedition, and why he was not in this ;) were thought less governable by those councils to which the main was then to be intrusted, the earl of Strafford bearing a part in them ; to whom the first was very averse, and the latter irreconcilable.

Despatches were sent into Ireland to quicken the preparations there, which the earl had left in a great forwardness, under the care of the earl of Ormond, his lieutenant-general : monies issued out for the levies of horse and foot there, and for the making a train : all which were as well advanced as, considering the general discomposure, could be reasonably expected.

And the king, the earl of Northumberland, and the earl of Strafford, thought they had well provided for the worst in making choice of the lord Conway to be general of the horse : a man very

dear to the two earls ; and indeed, by a very extraordinary fate, [he had] got a very particular interest and esteem in many worthy men of very different qualifications. He had been born a soldier in his father's garrison of the Brill, when he was governor there ; and bred up, in several commands, under the particular care of the lord Vere, whose nephew he was ; and though he was married young, when his father was secretary of state, there was no action of the English either at sea or land, in which he had not a considerable command ; and always preserved a more than ordinary reputation, in spite of some great infirmities, which use to be a great allay to the credit of active men ; for he was a voluptuous man in eating and drinking, and of great license in all other excesses, and yet was very acceptable to the strictest and the gravest men of all conditions. And which was stranger than all this, he had always (from his pleasure, to which his nature excessively inclined him, and from his profession, in which he was diligent enough) reserved so much time for his books and study, that he was well versed in all parts of learning, at least appeared like such a one in all occasions, and in the best companies. He was of a very pleasant and inoffensive conversation, which made him generally very acceptable : so that the court being at that time full of faction, very few loving one another, or those who resorted to any who were not loved by them, he alone was even domestic with all, and not suspected by either of the lords' or the ladies' factions.

The war was generally thought to be as well provided for, as, after the last year's miscarriage, it could be, by his being made general of the horse ; and no man was more pleased with it than the archbishop of Canterbury, who had contracted an extraordinary opinion of this man, and took great delight in his company, he being well able to speak in the affairs of the church, and taking care to be thought by him a very zealous defender of it ; when they who knew him better, knew he had no kind of sense of religion, and thought all was alike. He was sent down with the first troops of horse and foot which were levied, to the borders of Scotland, to attend the motion of the enemy, and had a strength sufficient to stop them, if they should attempt to pass the river, which was not fordable in above one or two places, there being good garrisons in Berwick and Carlisle. And in this posture he lay near Newburn in the outskirts of Northumberland.

Whilst these things were thus publicly acted, private agitations were not less vigorously intended. The treaty and pacification of the former year had given an opportunity of forming correspondences, and contriving designs, which before had been more clandestine ; and the late meeting in parliament had brought many together, who could not otherwise have met, and discovered humours and affections, which could not else have been so easily communicated. The court was full of faction and animosity, each man more intending the ruin of his adversary, and satisfying his private malice, than advancing his master's service, or complying with his public duty, and to that purpose directing all their endeavours, and forming all their intercourse ; whilst every man sottishly thought him whom he found an enemy to his enemies, a friend to all his other affections : or rather by the narrowness of his understanding, and extent of his passion, having contracted all his other affections to that one of revenge.

And by this means those emissaries and agents for the confusion which was to follow were furnished with opportunity and art to entangle all those (and God knows they were a great people) who were transported with those vulgar and vile considerations : cheap, senseless libels were scattered about the city, and fixed upon gates and public remarkable places, traducing some, and proscribing others of those who were in highest trust and employment : tumults were raised, and all license both in actions and words taken ; inso-much as a rabble of mean, unknown, dissolute persons, to the number of some thousands, attempted the house of the lord archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth, with open profession and protestation, "that they would tear him in pieces;" which (though one of that rabble, a sailor, was apprehended and executed in Southwark, upon an indictment of high treason) was so just a cause of terror, that the archbishop, by the king's command, lodged for some days and nights in Whitehall; which place likewise was not unthreatened in their seditious meetings and discourses. This infamous, scandalous, headless insurrection, quashed by the deserved death of that one varlet, was not then thought to be contrived or fomented by any persons of quality : yet it was discoursed after in the house of commons by Mr. Strode (one of those ephori who most avowed the curbing and suppressing of majesty) with much pleasure and content ; and it was mentioned in the first draught of the first remonstrance (when the same was brought in by Mr. Pym) not without a touch of approbation, which was for that reason somewhat altered, though it still carried nothing of judgment upon it in that piece.

Things standing thus both in the court and city, and the Scots preparing amain for an invasion, and we, at least, for a defence, on a sudden the lord Lowden, (who before was said to be committed for desiring protection and aid from the French king, by a letter under his hand) was discharged from his imprisonment ; without imparting that resolution to the council ; and after a few days admittance and kind reception at Whitehall, was dismissed into Scotland ; his authority and power with that people being as considerable as any man's, and his conduct as necessary for the enterprises they had in hand. This stratagem was never understood, and was then variously spoken of ; many believing he had undertaken great matters for the king in Scotland, and to quiet that distemper : others, that it was an act entirely compassed by the marquis of Hamilton, who was like to stand in need of great supporters, by that extraordinary obligation to endear himself with that nation ; or to communicate somewhat to that nation, if his condition before were so good that it needed no endearment. They who published their thoughts least, made no scruple of saying, "that if the policy were good and necessary of his first commitment, it seemed as just and prudent to have continued him in that restraint."

The progress in the king's advance for Scotland was exceedingly hindered by the great and dangerous sickness of the earl of Northumberland the general, whose recovery was either totally despaired of by the physician, or pronounced to be expected very slowly ; so that there would be no possibility for him to perform the service of the north : whereupon he sent to the king, that he would make choice of another general. And though the lord Conway in all his letters sent advertisement, "that the Scots had not advanced their preparations to that degree, that they would be able to march that year," yet the king had much better intelligence that they were in readiness to move ; and so concluded, that it was necessary to send another general ; and designed the earl of Strafford for that command, and to leave the forces in Ireland, which were raised to make a diversion in Scotland, to be governed by the earl of Ormond. The earl of Strafford was scarce recovered from a great sickness, yet was willing to undertake the charge, out of pure indignation to see how few men were forward to serve the king with that vigour of mind they ought to do, and knowing well the malicious designs which were contrived against himself, but he would rather serve as lieutenant-general under the earl of Northumberland, than that he should resign his commission : and so, with and under that qualification, he made all possible haste towards the north, before he had strength enough for the journey.

And before he could arrive with the army, that infamous irreparable rout at Newburn was fallen out ; where the enemy marched at a time and place, when and where they were expected, through a river deep though fordable, and up a hill, where our army was ranged to receive them : through those difficulties and disadvantages, without giving or taking any blows, (for the five or six men of ours who were killed, fell by their cannon, before the passing of the river,) they put our whole army to the most shameful and confounding flight that was ever heard of ; our foot making no less haste from Newcastle, than our horse from Newburn ; both leaving the honour, and the coal, to those who had not confidence enough (notwithstanding the evidence they had seen of our fear) to possess that town in two days after ; not believing it possible that such a place, which was able to have waged war with their nation, could be so kindly quit to them : the lord Conway never after turning his face towards the enemy, or doing any thing like a commander, though his troops were quickly brought together again, without the loss of a dozen men, and were so ashamed of their flight, that they were very willing as well as able to have taken what revenge they would upon the enemy, who were possessed with all the fears imaginable, and could hardly believe their own success, till they were [assured that the lord Conway with all his army rested quietly in Durham, and then they presumed to enter into Newcastle.]

But it seemed afterwards to be a full vindication to the honour of the nation, that, from this infamous defeat at Newburn, to the last entire conquest of Scotland by Cromwell, the Scots' army never performed one signal action against the English, but were always beaten by great inequality of numbers as oft as they approached to any encounter, if they were not supported by English troops.

In this posture the earl of Strafford found the army about Durham, bringing with him a body much broken with his late sickness, which was not clearly shaken off, and a mind and temper confessing the dregs of it, which being marvellously provoked and inflamed with indignation at the late dishonour, rendered him less gracious, that is, less inclined to make himself so, to the officers, upon his first entrance into his first charge; it may be, in that mass of disorder and unsoldierliness, not quickly discerning to whom kindness and respect was justly due. But those who by this time no doubt were retained for that purpose, took that opportunity to incense the army against him; and so far prevailed in it, that in a short time it was more inflamed against him than against the enemy; and was willing to have their want of courage imputed to excess of conscience, and that their being not satisfied in the grounds of the quarrel was the only cause that they fought no better. And in this disposition in all parts, the earl found it necessary to retire with the army to the skirts of Yorkshire, and himself to York, (whither the king was come,) leaving Northumberland and the bishopric of Durham to be possessed by the victors; who being abundantly satisfied with what they never hoped to possess, made no haste to advance their new conquests.

It was then and is now very much wondered at, that the earl of Strafford, upon his first arrival at the army, called no persons to a council of war for that shameful business of Newburn, or the more shameful quitting of Newcastle, (where were not ten barrels of musquet bullets, nor moulds to make any; the enemy having been long expected there, and our army not less than a month in that town; time enough, if nothing had been done before, to have made that place tenable for a longer time than it could have been distressed.) Whether the earl saw that it would not have been in his power to have proceeded finally and exemplarily upon that inquisition, and therefore chose rather not to enter upon it; or whether he found the guilt to be so involved, that though some were more obnoxious, few were faulty; or whether he plainly discerned whither the whole tended, and so would not trouble himself further in discovering of that, which, instead of a reproach, might prove a benefit to the persons concerned; I know not: but any public examination it never had.

The Scots needed not now advance their progress; their game was in the hands (no prejudice to their skill) of better gamblers. Besides, they were not to make the least inroad, or do the least trespass to their neighbours of Yorkshire; who were as solicitous, that, by any access or concurrence of the strength of that large county, they should not be driven further back; and therefore, instead of drawing their trained bands together (which of themselves would have been a greater or a better army than was to contend with them) to defend their county, or the person of the king then with them, they prepared petitions of advice and good counsel to him to call a parliament, and to remove all other grievances but the Scots. At the same time some lords from London (of known and since published affections to that invasion) attended his majesty at York with a petition, signed by others, eight or ten in the whole, who were craftily persuaded by the liegers there, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hambden, and Mr. Saint-John, to concur in it, being full of duty and modesty enough; without considering, that nothing else at that time could have done mischief; and so suffered themselves to be made instruments towards those ends, which in truth they abhorred.

In these distractions and discomposures, between an enemy proud and insolent in success, an army corrupted, or at best disheartened, a country mutinous and inclined to the rebels, at least not inclined to reduce them, and a court infected with all three, the king could not but find himself in great straits; besides that his treasure, which had hitherto kept that which was best from being worse, was quite spent. The raising and disbanding the first army so unfortunately and wretchedly, had cost full three hundred thousand pounds, which the good husbandry of the ministers of the revenue had treasured up for an emergent occasion; and the borrowing so much money for the raising and supplying this latter army had drawn assignments and anticipations upon the revenue to that degree, that there was not left wherewithal to defray the constant necessary expense of the king's household. A parliament would not be easily thought of for many other considerations than that it could not come together speedily enough to prevent that mischief, to which it should be chiefly applied: for if we were not then in a condition to defend ourselves, in forty days (the soonest a parliament could meet) an army elate with victory, when no town was fortified, or pass secured, would run over the kingdom; especially the people being every where so like to bid them welcome.

A new convention (not before heard of, that is, so old, that it had not been practised in some hundreds of years) was thought of, to call a great council of all the peers of England to meet and attend his majesty at York, that by their advice that great affair might be the more prosperously managed. Whether it was then conceived, that the honour of the king and kingdom being so visibly upon the stage, those branches of honour, which could not outlive the root, would undoubtedly rescue and preserve it; or whether it was believed, that upon so extraordinary an occasion the peers would suffice to raise money; as it was in that meeting proposed by one of them, "that they might give subsidies:" whether the advice was given by those who had not the confidence in plain terms to propose a parliament, but were confident that would produce one; or whether a parliament was then resolved on, and they called to be obliged by it, and so to be obliged to some sober undertaking in it; or what other ground or intention there was of that council, was never known: or whether indeed it was resolved out of the trouble and agony of afflicted thoughts, because no other way occurred: but such a resolution was taken, and writs immediately issued under the great seal of England to all the peers to attend his majesty at York within twenty days; and preparations were made in all places accordingly.

Whilst the lords are on their way thither, it will not be amiss to consider the general state of affairs in that time, and the persons to whom the managing the public business was principally then, and for some time had been, intrusted; that so, upon view of the materials, we may be the better enabled to guess how those dexterous workmen were like to employ themselves. It is told you before, that, upon the dissolution of the parliament but four months before, the lords of the council bestirred themselves in levying the ship-money, and in lending great sums of money for the war.

The convocation house (the regular and legal assembling of the clergy) customarily beginning and ending with parliaments, was, after the determination of the last, by a new writ continued, and sat for the space of above a month under the proper title of a synod; made canons, which was thought that it might do; and gave subsidies, and enjoined oaths, that it might not do: in a word, did many things, which in the best times might have been questioned, and therefore were sure to be condemned in the worst; (what fuel it was to the fire that ensued, shall be mentioned in its place;) and drew the same prejudice upon the whole body of the clergy, to which before only some few clergymen were exposed.

The papists had for many years enjoyed a great calm, being upon the matter absolved from the severest parts of the law, and dispensed with for the gentlest; and were grown only a part of the revenue, without any probable danger of being made a sacrifice to the law. They were looked upon as good subjects at court, and as good neighbours in the country; all the restraints and reproaches of former times being forgotten. But they were not prudent managers of this prosperity, being too elate and transported with the protection and connivance they received: though I am persuaded their numbers increased not, their pomp and boldness did to that degree, that, as if they had affected to be thought dangerous to the state, they appeared more publicly, entertained and urged conferences more avowedly, than had been before known: they resorted at common hours to mass to Somerset house, and returned thence in great multitudes, with the same barefacedness as others came from the Savoy or the neighbour churches: they attempted and sometimes obtained proselytes of weak uninformed ladies, with such circumstances as provoked the rage and destroyed the charity of great and powerful families, which longed for their suppression: they grew not only secret contrivers, but public professed promoters of, and ministers in, the most odious and the most grievous projects: as in that of soap, formed, framed, and executed, by almost a corporation of that religion; which, under that license and notion, might be, and were suspected to be, qualified for other agitations. The priests, and such as were in orders, (orders that in themselves were punishable by death,) were departed from their former modesty and fear, and were as willing to be known as to be hearkened to; insomuch as a Jesuit at Paris, who was coming for England, had the boldness to visit the ambassador there, who knew him to be such, and, offering his service, acquainted him with his journey, as if there had been no laws here for his reception. And for the most envious protection and countenance of that whole party, a public agent from Rome (first Mr. Con, a Scottishman; and after him the count of Rozetti, an Italian) resided at London in a great port; publicly visited the court; and was avowedly resorted to by the catholics of all conditions, over whom they assumed a particular jurisdiction; and was caressed and presented magnificently by the ladies of honour, who inclined to that profession. They had likewise, with more noise and vanity than prudence would have admitted, made public collections of money to a considerable sum, upon some recommendations from the queen, and to be by her majesty presented as a free-will offering from his catholic subjects to the king, for the carrying on the war against the Scots; which drew upon them the rage of that nation, with little devotion and reverence to the queen herself; as if she desired to suppress the protestant religion in one kingdom as well as the other, by the arms of the Roman catholics. To conclude, they carried themselves so, as if they had been suborned by the Scots to root out their own religion.

The bulk and burden of the state affairs, whereby the envy attended them likewise, lay principally upon the shoulders of the lord archbishop of Canterbury, the earl of Strafford, and the lord Cottington; some others being joined to them, as the earl of Northumberland for ornament, the lord bishop of London for his place, being lord high treasurer of England, the two secretaries, sir Henry Vane and sir Francis Windebank, for service, and communication of intelligence; only the marquis of Hamilton indeed, by his skill and interest, bore as great a part as he had a mind to do, and had the skill to meddle no further than he had a mind. These persons made up the committee of state, (which was reproachfully after called the juncto, and enviously then in the court the cabinet council,) who were upon all occasions, when the secretaries received any extraordinary intelligence, or were to make any extraordinary despatch, or as often otherwise as was thought fit, to meet: whereas the body of the council observed set days and hours for their meeting, and came not else together except specially summoned.

But, as I said before, the weight and the envy of all great matters rested upon the three first. The archbishop, besides the sole disposal of whatsoever concerned the church, which was an envious province, having been from the death of the earl of Portland (at which time he was made commissioner of the treasury) more engaged in the civil business, than I am persuaded he desired to be; and throughout the whole business passionately concerned for the church of Scotland, and so, conversant in those transactions: by all which means, besides that he had usually about him an uncourtly quickness, if not sharpness, and did not sufficiently value what men said or thought of him; a more than ordinary prejudice and uncharitableness was contracted against him; to which the new canons, and the circumstances in making them, made no small addition.

The earl of Strafford had for the space of almost six years entirely governed Ireland, where he had been compelled, upon reason of state, to exercise many acts of power; and had indulged some to his own appetite and passion, as in the cases of the lord chancellor, and the lord Mount-Norris; the first of which was satis pro imperio; but the latter, if it had not concerned a person notoriously unloved, and so the more unpitied, would have been thought the most extravagant piece of sovereignty, that in a time of peace had been ever executed by any subject. When and why he was called out of Ireland to assist in council here, I have touched before. He was a man of too high and severe a deportment, and too great a contemner of ceremony, to have many friends at court, and therefore could not but have enemies enough: he had two that professed it, the earl of Holland, and sir Henry Vane: the first could never forget or forgive a sharp sudden saying of his, (for I cannot call it counsel or advice,) when there had been some difference a few years before between his lordship and the lord

Weston, in the managing whereof the earl of Holland was confined to his house, "that the king should do well to cut off his head:" which had been aggravated, (if such an injury were capable of aggravation) by a succession of discountenances mutually performed between them to that time. Sir Henry Vane had not far to look back to the time that the earl had with great earnestness opposed his being made secretary, and prevailed for above a month's delay; which, though it was done with great reason and justice by the earl, on the behalf of an old fellow-servant, and his very [good] friend sir John Coke, (who was to be, and afterwards was, removed to let him in,) yet the justice to the one lessened not the sense of unkindness to the other: after which, or about the same time, (which it may be made the other to be the more virulently remembered,) being to be made earl of Strafford, he would needs in that patent have a new creation of a barony, and was made baron of Raby, a house belonging to sir Henry Vane, and an honour he made account should belong to him too; which was an act of the most unnecessary provocation (though he contemned the man with marvellous scorn) that I have known, and I believe was the loss of his head. To these a third adversary (like to be more pernicious than the other two) was added, the earl of Essex, naturally enough disinclined to his person, his power, and his parts, upon some rough carriage of the earl of Strafford's towards the late earl of saint Alban's, to whom he had some piety, [and therefore] openly professed to be revenged. Lastly, he had an enemy more terrible than all the other, and like to be more fatal, the whole Scottish nation, provoked by the declaration he had procured of Ireland, and some high carriage and expressions of his against them in that kingdom. So that he had reason to expect as hard measure from such popular councils as he saw were like to be in request, as all those disadvantages could create towards him. And yet no doubt his confidence was so great in himself, and in the form of justice, (which he could not suspect would be so totally confounded,) that he never apprehended a greater censure than a sequestration from all public employments, in which it is probable he had abundant satiety: and this confidence could not have proceeded (considering the full knowledge he had of his judges) but from a proportionable stock [of], and satisfaction in, his own innocence.

The lord Cottington, though he was a very wise man, yet having spent the greatest part of his life in Spain, and so having been always subject to the unpopular imputation of being of the Spanish faction, indeed was better skilled to make his master great abroad, than gracious at home; and being chancellor of the exchequer from the time of the dissolution of the parliament in the fourth year, had his hand in many hard shifts for money; and had the disadvantage of being suspected at least a favourer of the papists, (though that religion thought itself nothing beholding to him,) by which he was in great umbrage with the people: and then though he were much less hated than either of the other two, and the less, because there was nothing of kindness between the archbishop and him; and indeed very few particulars of moment could be proved against him: yet there were two objections against him, which rendered him as odious as any to the great reformers; the one, that he was not to be reconciled to, or made use of in, any of their designs; the other, that he had two good offices, without the having of which their reformation could not be perfect: for besides being chancellor of the exchequer, he was likewise master of the wards, and had raised the revenue of that court to the king to be much greater than it had ever been before his administration; and by which husbandry, all the rich families of England, of noblemen and gentlemen, were exceedingly incensed, and even ind devoted to the crown, looking upon what the law had intended for their protection and preservation, to be now applied to their destruction; and therefore resolved to take the first opportunity to ravish that jewel out of the royal diadem, though it were fastened there by the known law, upon as unquestionable a right, as the subject enjoyed any thing that was most his own.

The marquis of Hamilton, if he had been then weighed in the scales of the people's hatred, was at that time thought to be in greater danger than any one of the other; for he had more enemies, and fewer friends, in court or country, than either of the other. His interest in the king's affections was equal, and thought to be superior to any man's; and he had received as envious instances, and marks of those affections. He had more out faced the law in bold projects and pressures upon the people, than any other man durst have presumed to do, as especially in the projects of wine and iron; about the last of which, and the most gross, he had a sharp contest with the lord Coventry, (who was a good wrestler too,) and at last compelled him to let it pass the seal: the entire profit of which always reverted to himself, and to such as were his pensioners. He had been the sole manager of the business of Scotland till the pacification; the readiest man, though then absent, to advise that pacification, and the most visible author of the breach of it. Lastly, the discoveries between the lord Mackay and David Ramsey, wherein the marquis was accused of designing to make himself king of Scotland, were fresh in many men's memories, and the late passages in that kingdom had revived it in others; so that he might reasonably have expected as ill a presage for himself from those fortunetellers, as the most melancholic of the other: but as he had been always most careful and solicitous for himself, so he was most likely to be apprehensive on his own behalf, and to provide accordingly.

And here I cannot omit a story, which I received from a very good hand, by which his great subtilty and industry for himself may appear, and was indeed as great a piece of art (if it were art) as I believe will be found amongst the modern politicians. After the calling the council of the peers at York was resolved upon, and a little before the time of their appearance, the marquis came to the king, and with some cloudiness (which was not unnatural) and trouble in his countenance, he desired his majesty to give him leave to travel: the king, surprised, was equally troubled at it, and demanded his reason: he told him, "he well foresaw a storm, in which his shipwreck was most probable amongst others; and that he, never having any thing before his eyes but his majesty's service, or in his vows, but an entire simple obedience to his commands, might haply, by his own unskilfulness in what was fit by any other rule, be more obnoxious than other men;

"and therefore, that, with his majesty's leave, he would withdraw himself from the hazard at least of that tempest." The king, most graciously inclined to him, bad him "be most confident, that though he might (which he was resolved to do) gratify his people with any reasonable indulgence, he would never fail his good servants in that protection which they had equal reason to expect from him." The marquis with some quickness replied, "that the knowledge of that gracious disposition in his majesty was the principal cause that he besought leave to be absent; and that otherwise he would not so far desert his own innocence, which he was sure could be only sullied and discredited with infirmities and indiscretions, not tainted or defaced with design and malice. But (said he) I know your majesty's goodness will interpose for me to your own prejudice: and I will rather run any fortune, from whence I may again return to serve you, than be (as I foresee I should be) so immediate a cause of damage and mischief to so royal a master." He told him, "that he knew there were no less fatal arrows aimed at the archbishop of Canterbury and the earl of Strafford than at himself; and that he had advertised the first, and advised the last, to take the same course he meant to secure himself by withdrawing: but (he said) the earl was too great-hearted to fear, and he doubted the other was too bold to fly."

The king was much disturbed with the probability and reason of what was said; which the other as soon observing, "There is (said he) one way by which I might secure myself without leaving the kingdom, and by which your majesty, as these times are like to go, might receive some advantage: but it is so contrary to my nature, and will be so scandalous to my honour in the opinion of men, that, for my own part, I had rather run my fortune." His majesty, glad that such an expedient might be found, (as being unwilling to hazard his safety against so much reason as had been spoken, by compelling him to stay; and as unwilling, by suffering him to go, to confess an apprehension that he might be imposed upon,) impatiently asked, "What that way was?" The marquis replied, "That he might endear himself to the other party by promising his service to them, and seeming to concur with them in opinions and designs; the which he had reason to believe the principal persons would not be averse to, in hope that his supposed interest in his majesty's opinion might be looked upon as of moment to them for their particular recommendations. But (he said) this he knew would be immediately looked upon with so much jealousy by other men, and shortly with that reproach, that he might by degrees be lessened even in his majesty's own trust; and therefore it was a province he had no mind to undertake:" and so renewed his suit again very earnestly for leave to travel.

The king, for the reasons aforesaid, much delighted with this expedient, and believing likewise, that in truth he might by this means frequently receive animadversions of great use, and having a singular esteem of the fidelity and affection of the marquis, told him positively, "That he should not leave him; that he was not only contented, but commanded him to ingratiate himself by any means with the other people;" and assured him, "that it should not be in any body's power to

"infuse the least jealousy of him into his royal breast." The which resolution his majesty observed so constantly, that the other enjoyed the liberty of doing whatsoever he found necessary for his own behoof; and with wonderful craft and low condescensions to the ends and the appetites of very inferior people, and by seasonable insinuations to several leading persons (of how different inclinations soever) of such particulars as were grateful to them, and seemed to advance their distinct and even contrary interests and pretences, he grew to have no less credit in the parliament, than in the Scottish commissioners; and was with great vigilance, industry, and dexterity, preserved from any public reproach in those charges which served to ruin other men, and which with more reason and justice might have been applied to him than against any other; and yet for a long time he did not incur the jealousy of the king; to whom he likewise gave many advertisements, which, if there had been persons enough who would have concurred in prevention, might have proved of great use.

In this state and condition were things and persons when the lords came to York to the great council in September; and the first day of their meeting (that the counsel might not seem to arise from them who were resolved to give it, and that the queen might receive the honour of it; who, the king said, had by a letter advised him to it; as his majesty exceedingly desired to endear her to the people) the king declared to them, "that he was resolved to call a parliament to assemble at Westminster the third day of November following;" which was as soon as was possible. So the first work was done to their hands, and they had now nothing to do but to dispose matters in order against that time, which could not well be done without a more overt conversation with the Scots. For though there was an intercourse made, yet it passed for the most part through hands whom the chief had no mind to trust: as the lord Savile; whom his bitter hatred to the earl of Strafford, and as passionate hope of the presidentship of the north, which the earl had, made applicable to any end; but otherwise a person of so ill a fame, that many desired not to mingle with him. For, besides his no reputation, they begun now to know that he had long held correspondence with the Scots before their coming in, and invited them to enter the kingdom with an army; in order to which, and to raise his own credit, he had counterfeited the hands of some other lords, and put their names to some undertakings of joining with the Scots; and therefore they were resolved to take that negotiation out of his hands, (without drawing any prejudice upon him for his presumption,) which they had quickly an opportunity to do. For the first day of the lords' meeting, a petition is presented to his majesty full of dutiful and humble expressions from the Scots, who well knew their time, and had always (how rough and undutiful soever their actions were) given the king as good and as 'submissive words as can be imagined. This petition, full of as much submission as a victory itself could produce, (as was urged by some lords,) could not but beget a treaty, and a treaty was resolved on speedily to be at Rippon, a place in the king's quarters: but then, special care was taken, by cautions given to his majesty, that no such ungracious person might be intrusted by him in this treaty as might beget jealousies in the Scots, and so render it fruitless : and therefore the earls of Hertford, Bedford, Pembroke, Salisbury, Essex, Holland, Bristol, and Berkshire, the lords Mandevile, Wharton, Dunsmore, Brook, Savile, Paulet, Howard of Escrick (the lord Say being sick, and so not present at York) were chosen by the king ; all popular men, and not one of them of much interest in the court, but only the earl of Holland, who was known to be fit for any counsel that should be taken against the earl of Strafford, who had not amongst them one friend or person civilly inclined towards him.

When these commissioners from the king arrived at Rippon, there came others from the Scots' army of a quality much inferior, there being not above two noblemen, whereof the lord Lowden was the chief, two or three gentlemen and citizens, and Alexander Henderson their metropolitan, and two or three other clergymen. The Scots applied themselves most particularly to the earls of Bedford, Essex, Holland, and the lord Mandevile, though in public they seemed equally to caress them all ; and besides the duty they professed to the king in the most submissive expressions of reverence that could be used, they made great and voluminous expressions " of their affection to the kingdom and people of England ; and remembered the infinite obligations they had from time to time received from this nation ; especially the assistance they had from it in their reformation of religion, and their attaining the light of the gospel ; and therefore as it could never fall into their hearts to be ungrateful to it, so they hoped that the good people of England would not entertain any ill opinion of the manner of their coming into this kingdom at this time in a hostile manner, as if they had the least purpose of doing wrong to any particular persons, much less to alter any thing in the government of the kingdom ; protesting, that they had the same tenderness of their laws and liberties, and privileges, as of their own ; and that they did hope, as the oppressions upon their native country, both in their civil and spiritual rights, had obliged them to this manner of address to the king, to whom all access had been denied them by the power of their enemies ; so, that this very manner of their coming in might be for the good of this kingdom, and the benefit of the subjects thereof, in the giving them opportunity to vindicate their own liberties and laws ; which, though not yet so much invaded as those of Scotland had been, were enough infringed by those very men who had brought so great misery and confusion upon that kingdom ; and who intended, when they had finished their work there, and in Ireland, to establish the same slavery in England as they had brought upon the other two kingdoms. All which would be prevented by the remove of three or four persons from about the king ; whose own gracious disposition and inclinations would bountifully provide for the happiness of all his dominions, if those ill men had no influence upon his counsels."

There was not a man of all the English commissioners to whom this kind of discourse was not grateful enough, and who did not promise to himself some convenience that the alterations which were like to happen might produce. And with those lords with whom they desired to enter into greater confidence, they conferred more openly and particularly, of the three persons towards whom their greatest prejudice was, the archbishop, the earl of Strafford, and the marquis of Hamilton, (for in their whole discourses they seemed equally at least incensed against him, as against either of the other two,) whom they resolved should be removed from the king. They spake in confidence " of the excess of the queen's power, which in respect of her religion, and of the persons who had most interest in her, ought not to prevail so much upon the king as it did in all affairs. That the king could never be happy, nor his kingdom flourish, till he had such persons about him in all places of trust, as were of honour and experience in affairs, and of good fortunes and interests in the affections of the people ; who would always inform his majesty that his own greatness and happiness consisted in the execution of justice, and the happiness of his subjects ; and who are known to be zealous for the preservation and advancement of the protestant religion, which every honest man thought at present to be in great danger, by the exorbitant power of the archbishop of Canterbury, and some other bishops who were governed by him." It was no hard matter to insinuate into the persons with whom they held this discourse, that they were the persons to whom they wished all trust should be communicated, and that they were the very men who they wished should be in most credit about the king ; and they concluded that their affections were so great to this kingdom, and that all grievances might be reduced here, that if they might receive present satisfaction in all that concerned themselves, they would not yet return, till provision might likewise be made for the just interest of England, and the reformation of what was amiss there with reference to church and state.

This appeared so hopeful a model to most of the king's commissioners, that having no method prescribed to them to treat in, (and were indeed sent only to hear what the Scots would propose, the king himself then intending to determine what should be granted to them,) they never considered the truth of any of their allegations, nor desired to be informed of the ground of their proceedings ; but patiently hearkened to all they said in public, of which they intended to give an account to the king ; and willingly heard all they said in private, and made such use of it as they thought most conduced to their own ends. The Scottish commissioners proposed, " that, for the avoiding the effusion of Christian blood, there might be some way found to prevent all acts of hostility on either side ; which could not possibly be done, except some order was given for the payment of their army, which was yet restrained to close and narrow quarters." And the truth is, they were in daily fear that those quarters would have been beaten up, and so the ill courage of their men too easily discovered, who were more taught to sing psalms, and to pray, than to use their arms ; their hopes of prevailing being, from the beginning, founded upon an assurance that they should not be put to fight.

There had been in that infamous rout at Newburn two or three officers of quality taken prisoners, who endeavouring to charge the enemy with the courage they ought to do, being deserted by their troops could not avoid falling into the Scots' hands ; two of which were Wilnot, who was commissary-general of the horse, and O'Neile, who was major of a regiment; both who were officers of name and reputation, and of good esteem in the court with all those who were incensed against the earl of Strafford, towards whom they were both very devoted. Those gentlemen were well known to several of the principal commanders in the Scots' army, (who had served together with them in Holland under the prince of Orange,) and were treated with great civility in their camp; and when the commissioners came to Rippon, they brought them with them, and presented them to the king by his commissioners, to whom they were very acceptable; and did those who delivered them more service by the reports they made of them in the army when they returned to their charges, and in the court, than they could have done by remaining prisoners with them; and contributed very much to the irreconciling the army to the earl of Strafford, who was to command it.

After few days the commissioners returned to the king at York, and gave him an account of what had passed, and of the extraordinary affection of the Scots to his majesty's service; and Wilmot and O'Neile magnified the good discipline and order observed in the army, and made their numbers to be believed much superior to what in truth they were.

Three of the commissioners, and no more, were of the king's council, the earls of Pembroke, Salisbury, and Holland, who were all inspired by the Scots, and liked well all that they pretended to desire. Besides those, the king had nobody to consult with but the lord keeper Finch, the duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hamilton, the earl of Strafford, and sir Harry Vane, principal secretary of state. The first of which, the lord keeper, was obnoxious to so many reproaches, that, though his affection and fidelity was very entire to the king, all his care was to provoke no more enemies, and to ingratiate himself to as many of those who he perceived were like to be able to protect him, which he knew the king would not be able to do; and towards this he laboured with all industry and dexterity. The duke of Richmond was young, and used to discourse with his majesty in his bed-chamber rather than at the council-board, and a man of honour and fidelity in all places; and in no degree of confidence with his countrymen, because he would not admit himself into any of their intrigues. The marquis had leave to be wary, and would give his enemies no new advantages.

Nor indeed was there any man's advice of much credit with the king, but that of the earl of Strafford; who had no reason to declare his opinion upon so nice a subject in the presence of the earl of Holland and sir Harry Vane; and thought there was only one way to be pursued, (which was not to be communicated at the council,) and that was to drive the Scots out of the kingdom by the army: and without considering what was done at the treaty, (which had not yet agreed upon any cessation,) he sent a good party of horse, commanded by major Smith, to fall upon a Scottish quarter in the bishopric of Durham, who, defeated two or three of their troops, and took all the officers prisoners, and made it manifest enough that the kingdom might be rid of the rest, if it were vigorously pursued; which the earl of Strafford heartily intended. But Lesley, the Scottish general, complained "that he himself had forborne to make "any such attempt out of respect to the treaty;" and the English commissioners thought themselves neglected and affronted by it. And when it was found that the officer who conducted that enterprise was a Roman catholic, it made more noise; and they prevailed with the king to restrain his general from giving out any more such orders.

And the king began so far to dislike the temper of his commissioners, that he thought the parliament itself would be more jealous of his honour, and more sensible of the indignities he suffered by the Scots, than the commissioners appeared to be; and therefore he sent them back to Rippon again to renew the treaty, and to conclude a cessation of arms upon as good terms as they could; so that the Scots' army might not advance into Yorkshire, nor enlarge their quarters any way beyond what they were already possessed of: and this concession being agreed to, they should not enter upon any other particulars, but adjourn the treaty to London; which was the only thing the Scots desired, and without this they could never have brought their designs to pass. When the other lords returned to Rippon, the earl of Pembroke (as a man of a great fortune, and at that time very popular) was sent with two or three other lords to London, with a letter from the king, and a subscription from the lords commissioners of the treaty (which was then more powerful) to borrow two hundred thousand pounds from the city, for the payment of both armies whilst the cessation and treaty should continue; "which they hoped would quickly be at an end, and the Scots return into their own country." The city was easily persuaded to furnish the money, to be repaid out of the first that should be raised by the parliament; which was very shortly to meet.

And the commissioners at Rippon quickly agreed upon the cessation; and undertook to pay fifty thousand pound the month for the support of the Scots' army, when they did assign but thirty thousand pound the month for the king's; taking the Scots' commissioners' word for their musters, which made their numbers so much superior to the other; which two sums amounting to four-score thousand pound, a sum too great for the kingdom to pay long, as was then generally believed. It was pretended that two months would put an end to the treaty; so that the two hundred thousand pounds, which the city had supplied, would discharge all to the disbanding: and in this hope the king confirmed the cessation, and sent a safe conduct for such commissioners as the Scots should think fit to send to London for the carrying on the treaty.

All which being done, the king and the lords left York, that they might be at London before the beginning of the parliament; the earl of Strafford staying still in the north to put the army into as good a posture as he could, and to suppress the mutinous spirit it was inclined to; and, if it were possible, to dispose that great county (of which he had the entire command) to a better temper towards the king's service, and to a greater indignation towards the Scots; of whom they did not use to have too charitable an opinion. But in both these applications he underwent great mortification; the officers of the army every day asking his leave to repair to London, being chosen to serve in parliament; and when he denied to give them passes, they went away without them: and the gentlemen of the country who had most depended upon him, and been obliged by him, withdrawing their application and attendance, and entering into combination with his greatest enemies against him.

It is not to be denied, the king was in very great straits, and had it not in his power absolutely to choose which way he would go; and well foresaw, that a parliament in that conjuncture of affairs would not apply natural and proper remedies to the disease; for though it was not imaginable it would have run the courses it afterwards did, yet it was visible enough he must resign very much to their affections and appetite, (which were not like to be contained within any modest bounds,) and therefore no question his majesty did not think of calling a parliament at first, but was wrought to it by degrees: yet the great council could not but produce the other; where the unskilfulness and passion of some for want of discerning consequences, and a general sharpness and animosity against persons, did more mischief than the power or malice of those who had a formed design of confusion; for without doubt that fire at that time (which did shortly after burn the whole kingdom) might have been covered under a bushel. So as in truth there was no counsel so necessary then, as for the king to have continued in his army, and to have drawn none thither, but such as were more afraid of dishonour than danger; and to have trusted the justice and power of the law with suppressing of tumults, and quieting disorders in his rear.

It is strange, and had somewhat of a judgment from Heaven in it, that all the industry and learning of the late years had been bestowed in finding out and evincing, that in case of necessity any extraordinary way for supply was lawful; and upon that ground had proceeded when there was no necessity; and now, when the necessity was apparent, money must be levied in the ordinary course of parliament, which was then more unnatural and extraordinary than the other had been; as York must be defended from an enemy within twenty-five miles of it, by money to be given at London six weeks after, and to be gathered in six months. It had been only the season and evidence of necessity that had been questioned; and the view of it in a perspective of state at a distance that no eyes could reach, denied to be ground enough for an imposition: as no man could pull down his neighbour's house because it stood next furze, or thatch, or some combustible matter which might take fire; though he might do it when that combustible matter was really a-fire. But it was never denied that flagrante bello, when an enemy had actually invaded the kingdom, and so the necessity both seen and felt, that all men's goods are the goods of the public, to be applied to the public safety, and as carefully to be repaired by the public stock. And it is very probable, (since the factions within, and the correspondence abroad was so apparent, that a parliament then called would do the business of the Scots, and of those who invited them hither,) that if the king had positively declared, that he would have no parliament as long as that army stayed in England, but as soon as they were retired into their own country he would summon one, and refer all matters to their advice, and even be advised by them in the composing the distractions of Scotland: I say, it is probable, that they would either willingly have left the kingdom, or speedily have been compelled; there being at that time an army in Ireland (as was said before) ready to have visited their own country.

Neither would the indisposition of the king's army (which was begot only by those infusions, that there must of necessity be a parliament, which would prevent farther fighting) have lasted, when they had found those authors confuted; for the army was constituted of good officers, which were more capable of being deceived by their friends, than imposed upon by their enemies; and they had their soldiers in good devotion, and the business of Newburn would rather have been a spur than a bit to all. And it had been much the best course that could have been taken, if, after the fright at Newburn, the king, as well as the earl of Strafford, had made haste to Durham, and kept that post, without staying at York; and after some exemplary justice and disgrace upon the chief officers who were faulty, till the army had recovered their spirits, (which in a very short time it did with shame and indignation enough,) had marched directly against the Scots; by which they would have speedily dispossessed them of their new conquest, and forced them to have run distracted into their own country; as may be reasonably concluded from their behaviour whenever they were assaulted afterwards by the English.

And it is as strange, that the experience of the last summer, when the attendance of so great a number of the nobility (who had no mind to the war, and as little devotion to the court) was the true ground and cause of that ridiculous pacification, did not prevail with the king never to convene the same company to him; which could do him very little good, if they had desired it; and could not but do him more harm than even the worst of them at that time intended to do: for it might very easily have been foreseen, that the calling so many discontented, or disobliged, or disaffected men together, with a liberty to consult and advise, very few whereof had that affection and reverence for the person of the king as they ought to have had, though scarce any of them had at that time that mischief in their hearts which they afterwards discovered against him, or indeed had the least purpose to rebel: I say, the calling such men together could not but make every man much worse than they came, and put worse thoughts into their heads than they brought with them, when the miscarriage as well as the misfortune of the court would be the common argument and discourse; and when they would quickly discern, that it was like to be in every one of their powers to contribute to the destruction, at least to the disgrace, of men they had no kindness for, and most of them great animosity against.

But the king was without the presence and attendance of any man in whose judgment and wisdom he had a full confidence; for the earl of Strafford was at the army; and they who first proposed the calling the peers knew well enough that the king knew parliaments too well to be inclined to call one, if they should propose it; and therefore they proposed another expedient, which he knew not; and so was surprised with the advice, (which he thought could do no harm,) and so gave direction for the issuing out of the writs, before he enough considered whether it might not in truth produce some mischief he had not well thought of; as he quickly found it. Nor did the Scots themselves resolve to give him more disquiet in the ensuing parliament, than the major part of his great council, that he brought together, resolved to concur with them therein : and with that disposition, which they could never have contracted if they had remained by themselves, they all hastened to the place where they might do the mischief they intended.

The next error to this was, that at the meeting of the great council at York, and before any consent to the treaty at Rippon, there was not a state made, and information given of the whole proceedings in Scotland, and thereupon some debate and judgment by the whole council before the sixteen departed, for their information and instruction : and this had been strangely omitted before at the pacification, inasmuch as many who had been employed in that first at the Berkes, and in the last at Rippon, confessed that neither of them (and they were of the prime quality) then did, or ever after, know any thing of the laws and customs of that kingdom (by which they might have judged whether the king had exceeded his just power, or any thing of the matter of fact in the several transactions) but what they had received at those meetings from the persons who were naturally to make their own defence, and so by accusing others to make their own case the more plausible ; in which it could not be expected they would mention any thing for their own disadvantage.

By them they were told "of a liturgy imposed upon them by their bishops, contrary [to] or without act of parliament, with strange circumstances of severity and rigour : of some clauses in that liturgy, different from that of the church of England ;" with pretty smart comments of advice, and animadversion upon those alterations : "of a book of canons, in which an extraordinary and extravagant power was asserted to the bishops : of a high commission court, which exceeded all limits, and censured all degrees of men : of the insolent speeches of this bishop to that nobleman, and of the ill life of another : of their great humility and duty to their sacred sovereign, without whose favour and protection they would not live : and, lastly, "of their several most submissive addresses, by petition and all other ways, to his majesty ; being desirous, when their grievances were but heard, to lay themselves and their complaints at his royal feet, and to be most entirely disposed by him in such manner, as to his wisdom alone should be thought fit : but that, by the power and interposition of their adversaries, all their supplications had been rejected, and they never yet admitted to be heard."

With these and the like artifices our good lords were so wrought upon and transported, that they easily consented to whatsoever was proposed ; nor was there any proposition made and insisted on by them at the first or second treaty, which was not for the matter fully consented to : whereas, if their lordships had been fully advertised of the whole truth, (though there had been some inadvertencies and incogitancy in the circumstances of the transaction,) his majesty had full power, by the laws of Scotland then in force, to make that reformation he intended ; and all their petitions and addresses had found most gracious acceptance, and received most gracious answers ; and that, on the contrary, they had invaded all the rights of the crown, altered the government, affronted the magistrates and ministers of justice, and his majesty's own regal authority, with unheard of insolences and contempts ; rejected all his offers of grace and pardon, and, without cause or provocation, denounced war against him ; besieged and taken the castle of Edinburgh, and other places which held for his majesty ; I say, if this had been made as evident to them as surely it might have been made, it is not possible but those noble persons would have preserved themselves from being deluded by them ; at least many of the inconveniences which after ensued would have been prevented, if the form and method of their proceedings had been prescribed, or better looked into.

But it must be confessed, that in that conjuncture such necessary evidence and information could very hardly be given : for though it must not be doubted that there were many particular persons of honour of that nation who abhorred the outrages which were committed, and retained within their own breasts very loyal wishes for his majesty's prosperity ; yet it cannot be denied that those persons, who by the places they held (of king's advocate, and other offices) ought to have made that information of matter of law, and matter of fact, were themselves the most active promoters of the rebellion ; and the defection, as to any declaration on his majesty's behalf, was so general, that they who were not corrupted in their inward fidelity were so terrified, that they durst not appear in any office that might provoke those who solely had the power and the will to destroy them.

The last and most confounding error was the removing the treaty to London, and upon any terms consenting that the Scottish commissioners should reside there before a peace concluded. By which means, they had not only opportunity to publish all their counsels and directions in their sermons to the people, (who resorted thither in incredible numbers,) and to give their advice, from time to time, to those of the English who knew not so well yet to compass their own ends, but were ready (when any business was too big and unwieldy to be managed by the few who were yet thoroughly engaged) to interpose in the name of their nation, and, with reference to things or persons, to make such demands from and on the behalf of the kingdom of Scotland, as under no other style would have received any countenance : and this brought that universal terror with it (as will appear to the life in the process of this relation) upon those of nearest relation to the king's service, as well as those at a greater distance, who clearly discerned and detested the villainy and wickedness of those transactions, that their wariness and wisdom could not be great enough to preserve them, if they did not stupidly look on without seeming to understand what they could in no degree control or prevent.

In all conspiracies there must be great secrecy, consent, and union ; yet it can hardly be conceived, with what entire confidence in each other the numerous proud and indigent nobility of Scotland (for of the common people, who are naturally slaves to the other, there can be no wonder) concurred in the carrying on this rebellion : their strange condescension and submission to their ignorant and insolent clergy, who were to have great authority, because they were to inflame all sorts of men upon the obligations of conscience ; and in order there-unto, and to revenge a little indiscretion and ill manners of some of the bishops, had liberty to erect a tribunal the most tyrannical over all sorts of men, and in all the families of the kingdom: so that the preacher reprehended the husband, governed the wife, chastised the children, and insulted over the servants, in the houses of the greatest men. They referred the managery and conduct of the whole affair to a committee of a few, who had never before exercised any office or authority in the public, with that perfect resignation and obedience, that nobody presumed to inquire what was to be done, or to murmur at or censure any thing that was done; and the general himself, and the martial affairs, were subject to this regimen and discipline as well as the civil: yet they who were intrusted with this superiority, paid all the outward respect and reverence to the person of the general, as if the sole power and disposal had been in him alone.

The few English (for there were yet but very few who were intrusted from the beginning of the enterprise, and with all that was then projected) were men of reserved and dark natures, of great industry and address, and of much reputation for probity and integrity of life, and who trusted none but those who were contented to be trusted to that degree as they were willing to trust them, without being inquisitive into more than they were ready to communicate, and for the rest depended upon their discretion and judgment; and so prepared and disposed, by second and third hands, many to concur and contribute to many preparatory actions, who would never have consented to those conclusions which naturally resulted from those premises.

This united strength, and humble and active temper, was not encountered by an equal providence and circumspection in the king's councils, or an equal temper and dutiful disposition in the court; nor did they, who resolved honestly and stoutly to discharge the offices of good servants and good subjects to the utmost opposition of all unlawful attempts, communicate their purposes to men of the same integrity, that so they might unite their counsels as well in the manner and way, as their resolutions in the end. But every one thought it enough to preserve his own innocence, and to leave the rest to those who should have authority to direct. The king was perplexed and irresolute, and, according to his natural constitution, (which never disposed him to jealousy of any man of whom he had once thought well,) was full of hope, that his condition was not so bad as it seemed to be. The queen, how much troubled soever, wished much better to the earl of Holland, than to the archbishop, or the earl of Strafford, neither of them being in any degree acceptable to her; so that she was little concerned for the danger that threatened them: but when she saw the king's honour and dignity invaded in the prosecution, she withdrew her favour from the earl of Holland: but then she was persuaded, by those who had most credit with her, to believe, that, by the removal of the great ministers, her power and authority would be increased, and that the prevailing party would be willing to depend upon her; and that, by gratifying the principal persons of them with such preferments as they affected, she would quickly reconcile all ill humours; and so she hearkened to any overtures of that kind; which were always carried on without the consent or privity of those who were concerned, who in truth more disliked her absolute power with the king, than any other excess of the court, and looked upon it as the greatest grievance. Every man there considered only what application would be most like to raise his own fortune, or to do him harm with whom he was angry, and gave himself wholly up to those artifices which might promote either. To preserve themselves from the displeasure and censure of the parliament, and to render themselves gracious to those who were like to be powerful in it, was all men's business and solicitude. And in this very unequal and disproportioned condition and temper, was the king's and the Scottish army, the court and the country, when the parliament met.

BOOK III.

THE parliament met upon the third of November, 1640, with a fuller appearance than could be reasonably expected, from the short time for elections after the issuing out of the writs; inso-much as at the first [not] many members were absent. It had a sad and a melancholic aspect upon the first entrance, which presaged some unusual and unnatural events. The king himself did not ride with his accustomed equipage nor in his usual majesty to Westminster, but went privately in his barge to the parliament stairs, and so to the church, as if it had been to a return of a prorogued or adjourned parliament. And there was likewise an untoward, and in truth an unheard of accident, which brake many of the king's measures, and infinitely disordered his service, beyond a capacity of reparation. From the time the calling a parliament was resolved upon, the king designed sir Thomas Gardiner, who was recorder of London, to be speaker in the house of commons; a man of gravity and quickness, that had somewhat of authority and gracefulness in his person and presence, and in all respects equal to the service. There was little doubt but that he would be chosen to serve in one of the four places for the city of London, which had very rarely rejected their recorder upon that occasion; and lest that should fail, diligence was used in one or two other places that he might be elected. The opposition was so great, and the faction so strong, to hinder his being elected in the city, that four others were chosen for that service, without hardly mentioning his name: nor was there less industry used to prevent his being chosen in other places; clerks were corrupted not to make out the writs for one place, and ways were found to hinder the writ from being executed in another, time enough for the return before the meeting: so great a fear there was, that a man of entire affections to the king, and of prudence enough to manage those affections, and to regulate the contrary, should be put into that chair. So that the very morning the parliament was to meet, and when the king intended to go thither, he was informed, that sir Thomas Gardiner was not returned to serve as a member in the house of commons, and so was not capable of being chosen to be speaker; so that his majesty deferred his going to the house till the afternoon, by which time he was to think of another speaker.

Upon the perusal of all the returns into the crown office, there were not found many lawyers of eminent name, (though many of them proved very eminent men afterwards,) or who had served long in former parliaments, the experience whereof was to be wished; and men of that profession had been always thought the most proper for that service, and the putting it out of that channel at that time was thought too hazardous; so that, after all the deliberation that time would admit, Mr. Lenthall, a bencher of Lincoln's Inn, (a lawyer of competent practice, and no ill reputation for his affection to the government both of church and state,) was pitched upon by the king, and with very great difficulty rather prevailed with than persuaded to accept the charge. And no doubt a worse could not have been deputed of all that profession who were then returned; for he was a man of a very narrow, timorous nature, and of no experience or conversation in the affairs of the kingdom, beyond what the very drudgery in his profession (in which all his design was to make himself rich) engaged him in. In a word, he was in all respects very unequal to the work; and not knowing how to preserve his own dignity, or to restrain the license and exorbitance of others, his weakness contributed as much to the growing mischiefs, as the malice of the principal contrivers. However, after the king had that afternoon commended the distracted condition of the kingdom (with too little majesty) to the wisdom of the two houses of parliament, to have such reformation and remedies applied as they should think fit, proposing to them, as the best rule for their counsels, "that all things should be reduced to the practice of the time of queen Elizabeth:" the house of commons no sooner returned to their house, than they chose Mr. Lenthall to be their speaker; and two days after, with the usual ceremonies and circumstances, presented him to the king, who declared his acceptance; and so both houses were ready for their work.

There was observed a marvellous elated countenance in most of the members of parliament before they met together in the house; the same men who six months before were observed to be of very moderate tempers, and to wish that gentle remedies might be applied, without opening the wound too wide, and exposing it to the air, and rather to cure what was amiss than too strictly to make inquisition into the causes and original of the malady, talked now in another dialect both of things and persons. Mr. Hyde, who was returned to serve for a borough in Cornwall, met Mr. Pym in Westminster-hall some days before the parliament, and conferring together upon the state of affairs, the other told him, Mr. Hyde, "that they must now be of another temper than they were the last parliament; that they must not only sweep the house clean below, but must pull down all the cobwebs which hung in the top and corners, that they might not breed dust, and so make a foul house hereafter; that they had now an opportunity to make their country happy, by removing all grievances, and pulling up the causes of them by the roots, if all men would do their duties;" and used much other sharp discourse to him to the same purpose: by which it was discerned, that the warmest and boldest counsels and overtures would find a much better reception than those of a more temperate allay; which fell out accordingly: and the very first day they met together, in which they could enter upon business, Mr. Pym, in a long, formed discourse, lamented the miserable state and condition of the kingdom, aggravated all the particulars which had been done amiss in the government, as "done and contrived maliciously, and upon deliberation, to change the whole frame, and to deprive the nation of all the liberty and property which was their birthright by the laws of the land, which were now no more considered, but subjected to the arbitrary power of the privy-council, which governed the kingdom according to their will and pleasure; these calamities falling upon us in the reign of a pious and virtuous king, who loved his people, and was a great lover of justice." And thereupon enlarging in some specious commendation of the nature and goodness of the king, that he might wound him with less suspicion, he said, "We must inquire from what fountain these waters of bitterness flowed; what persons they were who had so far insinuated themselves into his royal affections, as to be able to pervert his excellent judgment, to abuse his name, and wickedly apply his authority to countenance and support their own corrupt designs. Though he doubted there would be many found of this classis, who had contributed their joint endeavours to bring this misery upon the nation; yet he believed there was one more signal in that administration than the rest, being a man of great parts and contrivance, and of great industry to bring what he designed to pass; a man, who in the memory of many present had sat in that house an earnest vindicator of the laws, and a most zealous assertor and champion for the liberties of the people; but that it was long since he turned apostate from those good affections, and, according to the custom and nature of apostates, was become the greatest enemy to the liberties of his country, and the greatest promoter of tyranny that any age had produced;" and then named "the earl of Strafford, lord lieutenant of Ireland, and lord president of the council established in York, for the northern parts of the kingdom: who, he said, had in both places, and in all other provinces wherein his service had been used by the king, raised ample monuments of his tyrannical nature; and that he believed, if they took a short survey of his actions and behaviour, they would find him the principal

"author and promoter of all those counsels which had exposed the kingdom to so much ruin;" and so instanced some high and imperious actions done by him in England and in Ireland, some proud and over-confident expressions in discourse, and some passionate advices he had given in the most secret councils and debates of the affairs of state; adding some lighter passages of his vanity and amours; that they who were not inflamed with anger and detestation against him for the former, might have less esteem and reverence for his prudence and discretion: and so concluded, "That they would well consider how to provide a remedy proportionable to the disease, and to prevent the farther mischiefs which they were to expect from the continuance of this great man's power and credit with the king, and his influence upon his counsels."

From the time that the earl of Strafford was named, most men believed that there would be some committee named to receive information of all his miscarriages, and that, upon report thereof, they would farther consider what course to take in the examination and prosecution thereof: but they had already prepared and digested their business to a riper period.

Mr. Pym had no sooner finished his discourse, than sir John Clotworthy (a gentleman of Ireland, and utterly unknown in England, who was, by the contrivance and recommendation of some powerful persons, returned to serve for a borough in Devonshire, that so he might be enabled to act this part against the lord lieutenant) made a long and confused relation "of his tyrannical carriage in that kingdom; of the army he had raised there to invade Scotland; how he had threatened the parliament, if they granted not such supplies as he required; of an oath he had framed to be administered to all the Scottish nation which inhabited that kingdom, and his severe proceedings against some persons of quality who refused to take that oath; and that he had with great pride and passion publicly declared at his leaving that kingdom, If ever he should return to that sword, he would not leave a Scottish-man to inhabit in Ireland:" with a multitude of very exalted expressions, and some very high actions in his administration of that government, in which the lives as well as the fortunes of men had been disposed of out of the common road of justice: all which made him to be looked upon as a man very terrible, and under whose authority men would not choose to put themselves.

Several other persons appearing ready to continue the discourse, and the morning being spent, so that, according to the observation of parliament hours, the time of rising being come, an order was suddenly made, "that the door should be shut, and nobody suffered to go out of the house;" which had been rarely practised: care having been first taken to give such advertisement to some of the lords, that that house might likewise be kept from rising; which would very much have broken their measures.

Then sir John Hotham, and some other Yorkshire men, who had received some disobligation from the earl in the country, continued the invective, mentioning many particulars of his imperious carriage, and that he had, in the face of the country, upon the execution of some illegal commission, declared, "that they should find the little finger of the king's prerogative heavier upon them than the loins of the law;" which expression, though upon after-examination it was found to have a quite contrary sense, marvellously increased the passion and prejudice towards him.

In conclusion, after many hours of bitter inveighing, and ripping up the course of his life before his coming to court, and his actions after, it was moved, according to the secret resolution taken before, "that he might be forthwith impeached of high treason;" which was no sooner mentioned, than it found an universal approbation and consent from the whole [house]: nor was there, in the whole debate, one person who offered to stop the torrent by any favourable testimony concerning the earl's carriage, save only that the lord Falkland, (who was very well known to be far from having any kindness for him,) when the proposition was made for the present accusing him of high treason, modestly desired the house to consider, "Whether it would not suit better with the gravity of their proceedings, first to digest many of those particulars, which had been mentioned, by a committee? declaring himself to be abundantly satisfied that there was enough to charge him before they sent up to accuse him:" which was very ingenuously and frankly answered by Mr. Pym, "That such a delay might probably blast all their hopes, and put it out of their power to proceed farther than they had done already; that the earl's power and credit with the king, and with all those who had most credit with king or queen, was so great, that when he should come to know that so much of his wickedness was discovered, his own conscience would tell him what he was to expect; and therefore he would undoubtedly procure the parliament to be dissolved, rather than undergo the justice of it, or take some other desperate course to preserve himself, though with the hazard of the kingdom's ruin: whereas, if they presently sent up to impeach him of high treason before the house of peers, in the name and on the behalf of all the commons of England, who were represented by them, the lords would be obliged in justice to commit him into safe custody, and so sequester him from resorting to council, or having access to his majesty: and then they should proceed against him in the usual form with all necessary expedition."

To those who were known to have no kindness for him, and seemed to doubt whether all the particulars alleged, being proved, would amount to high treason, it was alleged, "That the house of commons were not judges, but only accusers, and that the lords were the proper judges whether such a complication of enormous crimes in one person did not amount to the highest offence the law took notice of, and therefore that it was fit to present it to them." These reasons of the haste they made, so clearly delivered, gave that universal satisfaction, that, without farther considering the injustice and unreasonableness of it, they voted unanimously, (for aught appeared to the contrary by any avowed contradiction,) "That they would forthwith send up to the lords, and accuse the earl of Strafford of high treason, and several other crimes and misdemeanours, and desire that he might be presently sequestered from [the] council, and committed to safe custody;" and

Mr. Pym was made choice of for the messenger to perform that office. And this being determined, the doors were opened, and most of the house accompanied him on the errand.

It was about three of the clock in the afternoon, when the earl of Strafford, (being infirm, and not well disposed in his health, and so not having stirred out of his house that morning,) hearing that both houses still sat, thought fit to go thither. It was believed by some (upon what ground was never clear enough) that he made that haste then to accuse the lord Say, and some others, of having induced the Scots to invade the kingdom: but he was scarce entered into the house of peers, when the message from the house of commons was called in, and when Mr. Pym at the bar, and in the name of all the commons of England, impeached Thomas earl of Strafford (with the addition of all his other titles) of high treason, and several other heinous crimes and misdemeanours, of which he said the commons would in due time make proof in form; and in the mean time desired in their name, that he might be sequestered from all councils, and be put into safe custody; and so withdrawing, the earl was, with more clamour than was suitable to the gravity of that supreme court, called upon to withdraw, hardly obtaining leave to be first heard in his place, which could not be denied him.

And he then lamented "his great misfortune to lie under so heavy a charge; professed his innocence and integrity, which he made no doubt he should make appear to them; desired that he might have his liberty, until some guilt should be made appear; and desired them to consider, what mischief they should bring upon themselves, if upon such a general charge, without the mention of any one crime, a peer of the realm should be committed to prison, and so deprived of his place in that house, where he was summoned by the king's writ to assist in their counsel; and of what consequence such a precedent might be to their own privilege and birthright:" and then withdrew. And with very little debate the peers resolved "that he should be committed to the custody of the gentleman usher of the black-rod, there to remain until the house of commons should bring in a particular charge against him:" which determination of the house was pronounced to him at the bar upon his knees, by the lord keeper of the great seal, upon the woolsack: and so being taken away by Maxwell, gentleman usher, Mr. Pym was called in, and informed what the house had done; after which (it being then about four of the clock) both houses adjourned till the next day.

When this work was so prosperously over, they began to consider, that notwithstanding all the industry that had been used to procure such members to be chosen, or returned though not chosen, who had been most refractory to the government of the church and state; yet that the house was so constituted, that when the first heat (which almost all men brought with them) should be a little allayed, violent counsels would not be long hearkened to: and therefore, as they took great care by their committee of elections to remove as many of those members as they suspected not to be inclinable to their passions upon pretence "that they were not regularly chosen," that so they might bring in others more compliable in their places ; in which no rules of justice was so much as pretended to be observed by them ; insomuch as it was often said by leading men amongst them, " That they ought in those cases of elections to be guided by the fitness and worthiness of the person, whatever the desire of those was, in whom the right of election remained ;" and therefore one man hath been admitted upon the same rule by which another hath been rejected : so they declared, " That no person, how lawfully and regularly soever chosen and returned, should be and sit as a member with them, who had been a party or a favourer of any project, or who had been employed in any illegal commission."

And by this means (contrary to the custom and rights of parliament) many gentlemen of good quality were removed, in whose places commonly others were chosen of more agreeable dispositions : but in this likewise there was no rule observed ; for no person was hereby removed, of whom there was any hope that he might be applied to the violent courses which were intended. Upon which occasion the king charged them in one of his declarations, " that when, under that notion of projectors, they expelled many, they yet never questioned sir Henry Mildmay, or Mr. Laurence Whitaker ;" who had been most scandalously engaged in those pressures, though since more scandalously in all enterprises against his majesty ; to which never any answer or reply was made.

The next art was to make the severity and rigour of the house as formidable as was possible, and to make as many men apprehend themselves obnoxious to the house, as had been in any trust or employment in the kingdom. Thus they passed many general votes concerning ship-money, in which all who had been high-sheriffs, and so collected it, were highly concerned. The like sharp conclusions [were made] upon all lords lieutenants and their deputies, which were the prime gentlemen of quality in all the counties of England. Then upon some disquisition of the proceedings in the star-chamber, and at the council-table, all who concurred in such a sentence, and consented to such an order, were declared criminous, and to be proceeded against. So that, in a moment, all the lords of the council, all who had been deputy lieutenants, or high sheriffs, during the late years, found themselves within the mercy of these grand inquisitors : and hearing new terms of art, that a complication of several misdemeanours might grow up to treason, and the like, it was no wonder if men desired by all means to get their favour and protection.

When they had sufficiently startled men by these proceedings, and upon half an hour's debate sent up an accusation against the lord archbishop of Canterbury of high treason, and so removed him likewise from the king's council, they rested satisfied with their general rules, votes, and orders, without making haste to proceed either against things or persons ; being willing rather to keep men in suspense, and to have the advantage of their fears, than, by letting them see the worst that could befall them, lose the benefit of their application. For this reason they used their utmost skill to keep off any debate of ship-money, that that whole business might hang like a meteor over the heads of those that were in any degree faulty in it ; and it was observable, when, notwithstanding all their diversions, that business was brought into debate, and upon that (which could not be avoided) the lord Finch named as an avowed factor and procurer of that odious judgment ; who, if their rule were true, " that an endeavour to alter the government by law, and to introduce an arbitrary power, were treason," was the most notoriously and inexcusably guilty of that crime of any man that could be named ; before they would endure the mention of an accusation of high treason, they appointed a committee, with great deliberation and solemnity, to bring in a charge formally prepared, (which had not been done in the case of the lord archbishop, or the earl of Strafford,) and then gave him a day to be heard for himself at the house of commons' bar, and so, against all order, to take notice of what was handled in the house concerning him ; and then finding that, by their own rules, he would be likewise accused of high treason, they continued the debate so long, that the lords' house was risen, so that the accusation was not carried up till the next morning ; and before that time, the lord keeper (being well informed of all that had passed) had withdrawn himself ; and shortly after went into Holland : the lord Littleton, then chief justice of the court of common pleas, being made keeper of the great seal of England in his place.

About the same time, sir Francis Windebank, one of the principal secretaries of state, and then a member of the house of commons, was accused of many transactions on the behalf of the papists, of several natures, (whose extraordinary patron indeed he was,) and he being then present in the house, several warrants under his own hand were produced for the discharge of prosecutions against priests, and for the release of priests out of prison : whereupon, whilst the matter should be debated, according to custom he was ordered to withdraw, and so went into the usual place, the committee-chamber ; immediately whereupon, the house of commons went to a conference with the lords upon some other occasion, and returning from that conference, no more resumed the debate of the secretary ; but having considered some other business, rose at their usual hour ; and so the secretary had liberty to go to his own house ; from whence, observing the disposition of the house, and well knowing what they were able to say against him, he had no more mind to trust himself in that company, but the same night withdrew himself from any place where inquiry might be made for him, and was no more heard of till the news came of his being landed in France.

So that within less than six weeks, for no more time was yet elapsed, these terrible reformers had caused the two greatest counsellors of the kingdom, and whom they most feared, and so hated, to be removed from the king, and imprisoned, under an accusation of high treason ; and frightened away the lord keeper of the great seal of England, and one of the principal secretaries of state, into foreign kingdoms, for fear of the like ; besides the preparing all the lords of the council, and very many of the principal gentlemen throughout England, who (as was said before) had been high sheriffs, and deputy lieutenants, to expect such measure of punishment from their general votes and resolutions, as their future demeanour should draw upon them, for their past offences; by which means, they were like to find no very vigorous resistance or opposition in their farther designs.

I could never yet learn the reason, why they suffered secretary Windebank to escape their justice, (for the lord Finch, it was visible he was in their favour, and they would gladly have preserved him in the place,) against whom they had more pregnant testimony of offences within the verge of the law, than against any person they have accused since this parliament, and of some that, it may be, might have proved capital, and so their appetite of blood might have been satisfied: for, besides his frequent letters of intercession in his own name, and signification of his majesty's pleasure, on the behalf of papists and priests, to the judges, and to other ministers of justice; and protections granted by himself to priests, that nobody should molest them; he harboured some priests in his own house, knowing them to be such; which, by the statute made in the twenty-ninth year of queen Elizabeth, is made felony: and there were some warrants under his own hand for the release of priests out of Newgate, who were actually attainted of treason, and condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered; which, by the strict letter of the statute, the lawyers said, would have been very penal to him.

I remember one story brought into the house concerning him, that administered some mirth: A messenger, (I think his name was Newton,) who principally intended the service of apprehending priests, came one day to him in his garden, and told him, "that he had brought with him a priest, a stirring and active person, whom he had apprehended that morning; and desired to know to what prison he should carry him." The secretary sharply asked him, "Whether he would never give over this blood-thirsty humour?" and in great anger calling him knave, and taking the warrant from him by which he had apprehended him, departed without giving any other direction. The messenger, appalled, thought the priest was some person in favour, and therefore took no more care of him, but suffered him to depart. The priest, freed from this fright, went securely to his lodgings, and within two or three days was arrested for debt, and carried in execution to prison. Shortly after, secretary Windebank sent for the messenger, and asked him, "What was become of the priest he had at such a time brought before him?" He told him, "that he conceived his honour had been offended with the apprehension of him, and therefore he had looked no farther after him." The secretary in much passion told him, "the discharging a priest was no light matter; and that if he speedily found him not, he should answer the default with his life; that the priest was a dangerous fellow, and must not escape in that fashion." The messenger, besides his natural inclination to that exercise, terrified with those threats, left no means untried for the discovery, and at last heard where the man was in execution in prison: thither he went, and demanded the priest (who was not there known to be such) as his prisoner formerly, and escaped from him; and by virtue of his first warrant took him again into his custody, and immediately carried him to the secretary; and within few days after, the priest was discharged, and at liberty. The jailor, in whose custody he had been put for debt, was arrested by the parties grieved, and he again sued the messenger, who appealed for justice to the house of commons against the secretary.

And this case had been presented to the committee, and was ready to be reported, with all those warrants under his own hand before mentioned, at the time when secretary Windebank was in the house. Besides that, he was charged by the lords, by message or at a conference, for the breach of privilege at the dissolution of the last parliament, and signing warrants for the searching the studies and papers of some members; for which, according to the doctrine then received, he might have been put into the custody of the sergeant of the house. But as the last occasion was not laid hold of, because it would have inevitably involved his brother secretary, sir Harry Vane, who was under the same charge, and against whom indeed that charge was aimed: so, it seems, they were contented he should make an escape from any trial for the rest; either, because they thought his place would be sooner void by his flight than by his trial, which would have taken up some time, and required some formality, they [having] designed that place to Mr. Hollis; or, that they thought he would, upon any examination, draw in somewhat to the prejudice of sir Henry Vane, whom they were to protect: and so they were well content with his escape; so the house deferred the farther debate till the next morning, before which time he chose to retire, and transported himself into France.

Having made their first entrance upon business with this vigour, they proceeded every day with the same fervour; and he who expressed most warmth against the court and the government, was heard with the more favour; every day producing many formed elaborate orations against all the acts of state which had been done for many years preceding. That they might hasten the prosecution of the earl of Strafford, which was their first great design, they made a close committee of such members as they knew to be most for their purpose, who should, under an obligation of secrecy, prepare the heads of a charge against him; which had been never heard of before in parliament: and that they might be sure to do their business effectually, they sent a message to the house of peers, to desire them "to nominate a select committee likewise of a few, to examine upon oath such witnesses, as the committee of the house of commons for preparing the charge against the earl of Strafford should produce before them, and in their presence, and upon such interrogatories as they should offer;" which, though it was without precedent or example, the lords presently consented to, and named such men as knew well what they had to do. Then they caused petitions to be every day presented, by some who had been grieved by any severe sentences, in the star-chamber, or committed by the lords of the council, against lords lieutenants of counties, and their deputy lieutenants, for having levied money upon the country, for conducting and clothing of soldiers, and other actions of a martial nature, (which had been always done by those officers so qualified, from the time of queen Elizabeth, and was practised throughout her reign,) and against sheriffs, for having levied ship-money. Upon all which petitions (the matter being pressed and aggravated still upon every particular by some member of note and authority, upon which) all the acts how formal and judicial soever, and without so much as hearing the sentences or judgments read, were voted "to be illegal, and against the liberty and property of the subject; and that all who were guilty of such proceedings should be proceeded against for their presumption, and should likewise pay damages to the persons injured."

By which general votes (all passed within three or four days after the sitting of the parliament) they had made themselves so terrible, that all privy-counsellors, as well for what they had done at the board, as in the star-chamber; (where indeed many notable sentences had passed, with some excess in the punishment;) all lords lieutenants, who for the most part were likewise counsellors, whereof all were of the house of peers; and then all who were deputy lieutenants, or had been sheriffs since the first issuing out of writs for the collection of ship-money, whereof very many were then of the house of commons; found themselves involved under some of those votes, and liable to be proceeded against upon the first provocation; whereby they were kept in such awe, both in the one house and the other, as if they were upon their good behaviour, that they durst not appear to dislike, much less to oppose, whatsoever they proposed.

All persons imprisoned for sedition by the star-chamber upon the most solemn examination and the most grave deliberation, were set at liberty, that they might prosecute their appeals in parliament. In the mean time, though there were two armies in the bowels of the kingdom, at the monthly expense of no less than one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, care was taken only to provide money to pay them, without the least mention that the one should return into Scotland, and the other be disbanded, that so that vast expense might be determined; but, on the contrary, frequent insinuations were given, "that many great things were first to be done before the armies disbanded;" only they desired the king, "that all papists might be forthwith cashiered out of his army," which his majesty could not deny; and so some officers of good account were immediately dismissed.

It will not be impertinent nor unnatural to this present discourse, to set down in this place the present temper and constitution of both houses of parliament, and of the court itself, that it may be the less wondered at, that so prodigious an alteration should be made in so short a time, and the crown fallen so low, that it could neither support itself and its own majesty, nor them who would appear faithful to it.

Of the house of peers, the great contrivers and designers were—The earl of Bedford, a wise man, and of too great and plentiful a fortune to wish a subversion of the government; and it quickly appeared, that he only intended to make himself and his friends great at court, not at all to lessen the court itself.

The lord viscount Say, a man of a close and reserved nature, of a mean and a narrow fortune, of great parts, and of the highest ambition, but whose ambition would not be satisfied with offices and preferment, without some condescensions and alterations in ecclesiastical matters. He had for many years been the oracle of those who were called puritans in the worst sense, and steered all their counsels and designs. He was a notorious enemy to the church, and to most of the eminent churchmen, with some of whom he had particular contests. He had always opposed and contradicted all acts of state, and all taxes and impositions, which were not exactly legal, and so had as eminently and as obstinately refused the payment of ship-money as Mr. Hambden had done; though the latter, by the choice of the king's council, had brought his cause to be first heard and argued, with which judgment that was intended to conclude the whole right in that matter, and to overrule all other cases. The lord Say would not acquiesce, but pressed to have his own case argued, and was so solicitous in person with all the judges, both privately at their chambers, and publicly in the court at Westminster, that he was very grievous to them. His commitment at York the year before, because he refused to take an oath, or rather subscribe a protestation, against holding intelligence with the Scots, when the king first marched against them, had given him much credit. In a word, he had very great authority with all the discontented party throughout the kingdom, and a good reputation with many who were not [discontented,] who believed him to be a wise man and of a very useful temper, in an age of license, and one who would still adhere to the law.

The lord Mandevile, eldest son to the lord privy-seal, was a person of great civility, and very well bred, and had been early in the court under the favour of the duke of Buckingham, a lady of whose family he had married: he had attended upon the prince when he was in Spain, and had been called to the house of peers in the lifetime of his father, [by the name of the lord Kimbolton,] which was a very extraordinary favour. Upon the death of the duke of Buckingham, his wife being likewise dead, he married the daughter of the earl of Warwick; a man in no grace at court, and looked upon as the greatest patron of the puritans, because of much the greatest estate of all who favoured them, and so was esteemed by them with great application and veneration: though he was of a life very licentious, and unconformable to their professed rigour, which they rather dispensed with, than to withdraw from a house where they received so eminent a protection, and such notable bounty. From this latter marriage the lord Mandevile totally estranged himself from the court, and upon all occasions appeared enough to dislike what was done there, and engaged himself wholly in the conversation of those who were most notoriously of that party, whereof there was a kind of fraternity of many persons of good condition, who chose to live together in one family, at a gentleman's house of a fair fortune, near the place where the lord Mandevile lived; whither others of that class likewise resorted, and maintained a joint and mutual correspondence and conversation together with much familiarity and friendship: that lord, to support and the better to improve that popularity, living at a much higher rate than the narrow exhibition allowed to him by his wary father could justify, making up the rest by contracting a great debt, which long lay heavy upon him; by which generous way of living, and by his natural civility, good manners, and good nature, which flowed towards all men, he was universally acceptable and beloved; and no man more in the confidence of the discontented and factious party than he, and [none] to whom the whole mass of their designs, as well what remained in chaos as what was formed, was more entirely communicated, and more consulted with. And therefore these three lords are nominated as the principal agents in the house of peers, (though there were many there of quality and interest much superior to either of them,) because they were principally and absolutely trusted by those who were to manage all in the house of commons, and to raise that spirit which was upon all occasions to inflame the lords. Yet [it] being enough known and understood, that, how indisposed and angry soever many of them at present appeared to be, there would be still a major part there, who would, if they were not overreached, adhere to the king and the established government, and therefore these three persons were trusted without reserve, and relied upon so to steer, as might increase their party by all the arts imaginable; and they had dexterity enough to appear to depend upon those lords, who were looked upon as greater, and as popular men; and to be subservient to their purposes, whom in truth they governed and disposed of.

And by these artifices, and applications to his vanity, and magnifying the general reputation and credit he had with the people, and sharpening the sense he had of his late ill treatment at court, they fully prevailed [upon], and possessed themselves of the earl of Essex; who, though he was no good speaker in public, yet, having sat long in parliament, and so well acquainted with the order of it in very active times, he was a better speaker there than any where else, and being always heard with attention and respect, had much authority in the debates. Nor did he need any incitement (which made all approaches to him the more easy) to do any thing against the persons of the lord archbishop of Canterbury and the lord lieutenant of Ireland, towards whom he professed a full dislike; who were the only persons against whom there was any declared design, and the Scots having in their manifesto demanded justice against those two great men, as the cause of the war between the nations. And in this prosecution there was too great a concurrence: Warwick, Brook, Wharton, Paget, Howard, and some others, implicitly followed and observed the dictates of the lords mentioned before, and started or seconded what they were directed.

In the house of commons were many persons of wisdom and gravity, who being possessed of great and plentiful fortunes, though they were undevoted enough to the court, had all imaginable duty for the king, and affection to the government established by law or ancient custom; and without doubt, the major part of that body consisted of men who had no mind to break the peace of the kingdom, or to make any considerable alteration in the government of church or state: and therefore all inventions were set on foot from the beginning to work on them, and corrupt them, by suggestions "of the dangers which threatened all that was precious to the subject in their liberty and their property, by overthrowing or overmastering the law, and subjecting it to an arbitrary power, and by countenancing popery to the subversion of the pro"testant religion;" and then, by infusing terrible apprehensions into some, and so working upon their fears "of being called in question for some-what they had done," by which they would stand in need of their protection; and raising the hopes of others, "that, by concurring with them, they should be sure to obtain offices, and honours, and any kind of preferment." Though there were too many corrupted and misled by these several temptations, and others who needed no other temptations than from the fierceness and barbarity of their own natures, and the malice they had contracted against the church and against the court; yet the number was not great of those in whom the government of the rest was vested, nor were there many who had the absolute authority to lead, though there were a multitude that was disposed to follow.

Mr. Pym was looked upon as the man of greatest experience in parliament, where he had served very long, and was always a man of business, being an officer in the exchequer, and of a good reputation generally, though known to be inclined to the puritan party; yet not of those furious resolutions against the church as the other leading men were, and wholly devoted to the earl of Bedford, who had nothing of that spirit.

Mr. Hambden was a man of much greater cunning, and it may be of the most discerning spirit, and of the greatest address and insinuation to bring any thing to pass which he desired, of any man of that time, and who laid the design deepest. He was a gentleman of a good extraction, and a fair fortune, who, from a life of great pleasure and license, had on a sudden retired to extraordinary sobriety and strictness, and yet retained his usual cheerfulness and affability; which, together with the opinion of his wisdom and justice, and the courage he had shewed in opposing the ship-money, raised his reputation to a very great height, not only in Buckinghamshire, where he lived, but generally throughout the kingdom. He was not a man of many words, and rarely begun the discourse, or made the first entrance upon any business that was assumed; but a very weighty speaker, and after he had heard a full debate, and observed how the house was like to be inclined, took up the argument, and shortly, and clearly, and craftily, so stated it, that he commonly conducted it to the conclusion he desired; and if he found he could not do that, he never was without the dexterity to divert the debate to another time, and to prevent the determining any thing in the negative, which might prove inconvenient in the future. He made so great a show of civility, and modesty, and humility, and always of mistrusting his own judgment, and of esteeming his with whom he conferred for the present, that he seemed to have no opinions or resolutions, but such as he contracted from the information and instruction he received upon the discourses of others, whom he had a wonderful art of governing, and leading into his principles and inclinations, whilst they believed that he wholly depended upon their counsel and advice. No man had ever a greater power over himself, or was less the man that he seemed to be, which shortly after appeared to every body, when he cared less to keep on the mask.

Mr. Saint-John, who was in a firm and entire conjunction with the other two, was a lawyer of Lincoln's Inn, known to be of parts and industry, but not taken notice of for practice in Westminster-hall, till he argued at the exchequer-chamber the case of ship-money on the behalf of Mr. Hambden; which gave him much reputation, and called him into all courts, and to all causes, where the king's prerogative was most contested. He was a man reserved, and of a dark and clouded countenance, very proud, and conversing with very few, and those, men of his own humour and inclinations. He had been questioned, committed, and brought into the star-chamber, many years before, with other persons of great name and reputation, (which first brought his name upon the stage,) for communicating some paper among themselves, which some men had a mind at that time to have extended to a design of sedition: but it being quickly evident that the prosecution would not be attended with success, they were all shortly after discharged; but he never forgave the court the first assault, and contracted an implacable displeasure against the church purely from the company he kept. He was of an intimate trust with the earl of Bedford, to whom he was allied, (being a natural son of the house of Bullingbrook,) and by him brought into all matters where himself was to be concerned. It was generally believed, that these three persons, with the other three lords mentioned before, were of the most intimate and entire trust with each other, and made the engine which moved all the rest; yet it was visible, that Nathaniel Fiennes, the second son of the lord Say, and sir Harry Vane, eldest son to the secretary, and treasurer of the house, were received by them with full confidence and without reserve.

The former, being a man of good parts of learning, and after some years spent in New college in Oxford, of which his father had been formerly fellow, (that family pretending and enjoying many privileges there, as of kin to the founder,) had spent his time abroad, in Geneva and amongst the cantons of Switzerland, where he improved his disinclination to the church, with which milk he had been nursed. From his travels he returned through Scotland (which few travellers took in their way home) at the time when that rebellion was in the bud; and was very little known, except amongst that people, which conversed wholly amongst themselves, until he was now found in parliament, when it was quickly discovered, that as he was the darling of his father, so that he was like to make good whatsoever he had for many years promised.

The other, sir Harry Vane, was a man of great natural parts, and of very profound dissimulation, of a quick conception, and very ready, sharp, and weighty expression. He had an unusual aspect, which, though it might naturally proceed both from his father and mother, neither of which were beautiful persons, yet made men think there was somewhat in him of extraordinary; and his whole life made good that imagination. Within a very short time after he returned from his studies in Magdalen college in Oxford, where, though he was under the care of a very worthy tutor, he lived not with great exactness, he spent some little time in France, and more in Geneva; and, after his return into England, contracted a full prejudice and bitterness against the church, both against the form of the government, and the liturgy, which was generally in great reverence, even with many of those who were not friends to the other. In this giddiness, which then much displeased, or seemed to displease, his father, who still appeared highly conformable, and exceedingly sharp against those who were not, he transported himself into New England, a colony within few years before planted by a mixture of all religions, which disposed the professors to dislike the government of the church; who were qualified by the king's charter to choose their own government and governors, under the obligation, "that every man should take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy;" which all the first planters did, when they received their charter, before they transported themselves from hence, nor was there in many years after the least scruple amongst them of complying with those obligations; so far men were, in the infancy of their schism, from refusing to take lawful oaths. He was no sooner landed there, but his parts made him quickly taken notice of, and very probably his quality, being the eldest son of a privy-counsellor, might give him some advantage; inasmuch that, when the next season came for the election of their magistrates, he was chosen their governor: in which place he had so ill fortune (his working and unquiet fancy raising and infusing a thousand scruples of conscience, which they had not brought over with them, nor heard of before) that he unsatisfied with them, and they with him, he transported himself into England; having sowed such seed of dissension there, as grew up too prosperously, and miserably divided the poor colony into several factions, and divisions, and persecutions of each other, which still continue to the great prejudice of that plantation: inasmuch as some of them, upon the ground of their first expedition, liberty of conscience, have withdrawn themselves from their jurisdiction, and obtained other charters from the king, by which, in other forms of government, they have enlarged their plantation, within new limits adjacent to the other. He was no sooner returned into England, than he seemed to be much reformed in those extravagancies, and, with his father's approbation and direction, married a lady of a good family, and by his father's credit with the earl of Northumberland, who was high admiral of England, was joined presently and jointly with sir William Russel in the office of treasurer of the navy, (a place of great trust and profit,) which he equally shared with the other, and seemed a man well satisfied and composed to the government. When his father received the disobligation from the lord Strafford, by his being created baron of Raby, the house and land of Vane, (and which title he had promised himself, which was unluckily cast upon him, purely out of contempt,) they sucked in all the thoughts of revenge imaginable; and from thence he betook himself to the friendship of Mr. Pym, and all other discontented or seditious persons, and contributed all that intelligence (which will be hereafter mentioned, as he himself will often be) that designed the ruin of the earl, and which grafted him in the entire confidence of those who promoted the same; so that nothing was concealed from him, though it is believed that he communicated his own thoughts to very few.

Denzil Hollis, the younger son and younger brother of the earls of Clare, was as much valued and esteemed by the whole party, as any man; as he deserved to be, being a man of more accomplished parts than any of them, and of great reputation by the part he acted against the court and the duke of Buckingham, in the parliament of the fourth year of the king, (the last parliament that had been before the short one in April,) and his long imprisonment, and sharp prosecution afterwards, upon that account; of which he retained the memory with acrimony enough. But he would in no degree intermeddle in the counsel or prosecution of the earl of Strafford, (which he could not prevent,) who had married his sister, by whom all his children were, which made him a stranger to all those consultations, though it did not otherwise interrupt the friendship he had with the most violent of those prosecutors. In all other contrivances he was in the most secret counsels with those who most governed, and respected by them with very submissive applications as a man of authority. Sir Gilbert Gerrard, the lord Digby, Strode, Haslerig; and the northern gentlemen, who were most angry with the earl, or apprehensive of their own being in the mercy of the house, as Hotham, Cholmely, and Stapleton; with some popular lawyers of the house, who did not suspect any wickedness in design, and so became involved by degrees in the worst, observed and pursued the dictates and directions of the other, according to the parts which were assigned to them upon emergent occasions: whilst the whole house looked on with wonder and amazement, without one man's interposing to allay the passion and the fury with which so many were transported.

This was the present temper and constitution of both houses of parliament upon their first coming together, when (as Tacitus says of the Jews, "that they exercised the highest offices of kindness and friendship towards each other, et adversus omnes alios hostile odium") they watched all those who they knew were not of their opinions, nor like to be, with all possible jealousy; and if any of their elections could be brought into question, they were sure to be voted out of the house, and then all the artifices were used to bring in more sanctified members; so that every week increased the number of their party, both by new elections, and the proselytes they gained upon the old. Nor was it to be wondered at, for they pretended all public thoughts, and only the reformation of disapproved and odious enormities, and dissembled all purposes of removing foundations, which, though it was in the hearts of some, they had not the courage and confidence to communicate it.

The English and the Scottish armies remained quiet in their several quarters in the north, without any acts of hostility, under the obligation of the cessation, which was still prorogued from month to month, that the people might believe that a full peace would be quickly concluded. And the treaty, which during the king's being at York had been held at Rippon, being now adjourned to London, the Scottish commissioners (whereof the earl of Rothes, and the lord Lowden, who hath been mentioned before, were the chief) came thither in great state, and were received by the king with that countenance, which he could not choose but shew to them; and were then lodged in the heart of the city, near London-Stone, in a house which used to be inhabited by the lord mayor or one of the sheriffs, and was situate so near to the church of St. Antholine, (a place in all times made famous by some seditious lecturer,) that there was a way out of it into a gallery of that church. This benefit was well foreseen on all sides in the accommodation, and this church assigned to them for their own devotions, where one of their own chaplains still preached, amongst which Alexander Henderson was the chief, who was likewise joined with them in the treaty in all matters which had reference to religion: and to hear those sermons there was so great a conflux and resort, by the citizens out of humour and faction; by others of all quality out of curiosity; and by some that they might the better justify the contempt they had of them, that from the first appearance of day in the morning on every Sunday, to the shutting in of the light, the church was never empty. They (especially the women) who had the happiness to get into the church in the morning (they who could not, hung upon or about the windows without, to be auditors or spectators) keeping their places till the afternoon's exercise was finished, which both morning and afternoon, except to palates and appetites ridiculously corrupted, was the most insipid and flat that could be delivered upon any deliberation.

The earl of Rothes had been the chief architect of that whole machine from the beginning, and was a man very well bred, of very good parts, and great address; in his person very acceptable, pleasant in conversation, very free and amorous, and unrestrained in his discourse by any scruples of religion, which he only put on when the part he was to act required it, and then no man could appear more conscientiously transported. There will be sometimes occasion to mention him hereafter, as already as much hath been said of the other, the lord Lowden, as is yet necessary.

They were no sooner come to the town, but a new committee of the members of both houses, such as were very acceptable to them, was appointed to renew and continue the treaty with them that had been begun at Rippon: and then they published and printed their declaration against the archbishop of Canterbury and the lieutenant of Ireland, in which they said, "That as they did reserve those of their own country who had been incendiaries between the two kingdoms to be proceeded against in their own parliament; so they desired no other justice to be done against these two criminal persons but what should seem good to the wisdom of the parliament."

It was easily discerned (by those who saw at any distance, and who had been long jealous of that trick) from that expression concerning their own countrymen, that they meant no harm to the marquis of Hamilton, against whom, in the beginning of the rebellion, all their bitterness seemed to be directed, and who indeed of all men had the least portion of kindness or good-will from the three nations, of any man who related to the king's service. But he had, by the friendship he had shewed to the lord Lowden, and procuring his liberty when he was in the Tower for so notorious a treason, and [was] to be in the head of another as soon as he should be at liberty; and by his application and dexterity at York in the meeting of the great council, and with the Scottish commissioners employed thither before the treaty; and by his promise of future offices and services, which he made good abundantly; procured as well from the English as the Scots all assurance of indemnity: which they so diligently made good, that they were not more solicitous to contrive and find out evidence or information against the other two great men, than they were to prevent all information or complaint, and to stifle all evidence which was offered or could be produced against the marquis.

And they were exceedingly vigilant to prevent the Scottish commissioners entering into any familiarity or conversation with any who were not fast to their party: insomuch as one day the earl of Rothes walking in Westminster-hall with Mr. Hyde, towards whom he had [a] kindness by reason of their mutual friendship with some persons of honour, and they two walking towards the gate to take coach to make a visit together, the earl on a sudden desired the other "to walk towards the coach, and he would overtake him by the time he came thither:" but staying very long, he imagined he might be diverted from his purpose, and so walked back into the hall, where presently meeting him, they both pursued their former intention; and being in the coach, the earl told him, "that he must excuse his having made him stay so long, because he had been detained only concerning him; that when he was walking with him, a gentleman passing by touched his cloak, which made him desire the other to go before; and turning to the other person, he said, that seeing him walk in some familiarity with Mr. Hyde, he thought himself obliged to tell him, that he walked with the greatest enemy the Scottish nation had in the parliament, and that he ought to take heed how he communicated any thing of importance to him; and that after he was parted with that gentleman, before he could pass through the hall, four or five other eminent men, severally, gave him the same advertisement and caution;" and then spake as unconcernedly and as merrily of the persons and their jealousy as the other could do. Men who were so sagacious in pursuing their point were not like to miscarry.

The Scotch commissioners were in this time come to London, where they were magnificently entertained; and one of the best houses in the heart of the city assigned for their reception, the neighbour church for their devotion, whither so great a herd flocked on Sundays to hear Mr. Henderson and his fellow-chaplains, that very many came to and sat in the church from the time that it was light, that they might receive the comfort of those lectures, which were not till the afternoon; for in the morning their devotions were private. They were caressed by both houses with all possible expressions of kindness at least, if not of submission; and an order was carefully entered, "that upon all occasions the appellation should be used of Our brethren of Scotland;" and upon that, wonderful kind compliments passed, of a sincere resolution of amity and union between the two nations.

Things being thus constituted, it became them to satisfy the public expectation in the discovery of their new treasons, and in speedy proceedings against those two great persons. For the better preparing whereof, and facilitating whatever else should be necessary for that enterprise, the Scottish commissioners in the name of that nation presented (as is said before) two distinct declarations, against the persons of the archbishop and the earl of Strafford, stuffed with as much bitterness and virulency as can be imagined, making them "the odious incendiaries of the differences between the two nations, and the original causes of all those calamities in that kingdom which begat those differences, and most pathetically pressing for justice against them both." These discourses (for either of them consisted of many sheets of paper) were publicly read in both houses; that against the archbishop of Canterbury was for the present laid aside, and I am persuaded, at that time, without any thought of resuming it, hoping that his age and imprisonment would have quickly freed them from farther trouble. But a speedy proceeding against the other was vehemently pressed, as of no less importance than the peace between the two kingdoms, not without some intimation, "that there could be no expectation that the Scottish army would ever retire into their country, and consequently that the king's could be disbanded, before exemplary justice were done upon that earl to their satisfaction." When they had inflamed men with this consideration sufficiently, they, without any great difficulty, (in order to the necessary expedition for that trial,) prevailed in two propositions of most fatal consequence to the king's service, and to the safety and integrity of all honest men.

The first, "for a committee to be settled of both houses for the taking preparatory examinations." Thus the allegation was, "That the charge against the earl of Strafford was of an extraordinary nature, being to make a treason evident out of a complication of several ill acts; that he must be traced through many dark paths, and this precedent seditious discourse compared with that subsequent outrageous action, the circumstances of both which might be equally considerable with the matter itself; and therefore that, before this charge could be so directly made and prepared as was necessary," (for he was hitherto only accused generally of treason,) "it was requisite, that a committee should be made of both houses to examine some witnesses upon oath, upon whose depositions his impeachment would easily be framed." This was no sooner proposed in the house of commons, than consented to; and upon as little debate yielded to by the lords; and the committee settled accordingly: without considering that such an inquisition (besides that the same was most contrary to the rules of law or the practice of any former times) would easily prepare a charge against the most innocent man alive; where that liberty should be taken to examine a man's whole life; and all the light, and all the private discourses had passed from him, might be tortured, perverted, and applied, according to the conscience and the craft of a diligent and malicious prosecution.

The second was, "for the examining upon oath privy-counsellors, upon such matters as had passed at the council-table." The allegation for this was, "That the principal ingredient into the treason of which the earl was to be charged, was, a purpose to change the form of government; and, instead of that settled by law, to introduce a power merely arbitrary. Now this design must be made evident, as well by the advices which he gave, and the expressions he uttered upon emergent occasions, as by his public actions; and those could not be discovered, at least not proved, but by those who were present at such consultations, and they were only privy-counsellors." As it was alleged, "That at his coming from Ireland the earl had said in council there, That if he ever returned to that sword again, he would not leave a Scotchman in that kingdom: and at his arrival in this kingdom, the lord mayor and some aldermen of

"London attending the board about the loan of monies, and not giving that satisfaction was expected, that he should pull out a letter out of his pocket, and shew what course the king of France then took for the raising of money; and that he should tell the king, That it would never be well till he hanged up a lord mayor of London in the city to terrify the rest."

There was no greater difficulty to satisfy the house of commons with the reasonableness of this, than of the former; but the compassing it was not like to be so easy; for it was visible, that, though the lords should join with them, (which was not to be despaired,) the privy-counsellors would insist upon the oath they had taken, and pretend, "that without the king's consent they might not discover any thing that had passed at that board; so that the greatest difficulty would be, the procuring the king's consent for the betraying himself: but this must be insisted on, for God forbid that it might be safe for any desperate wicked counsellor to propose and advise at that board" (which in the intervals of parliaments wholly disposed the affairs of state) "courses destructive to the health and being of the kingdom; and that the sovereign physician, the parliament, (which had the only skill to cure those contagious and epidemical diseases,) should be hindered from preserving the public, because no evidence must be given of such corrupt and wicked counsels." And so provided with this specious oratory, they desire the lords "to concur with them for this necessary examination of privy-counsellors;" who, without much debate, (for the persons concerned knew well their acts were visible and public enough, and therefore considered not much what words had passed,) consented, and appointed some to attend the king for his consent: who, not well weighing the consequence, and being in public council unanimously advised "to consent to it; and that the not doing it would lay some taint upon his council, and be a tacit confession, that there had been agitations at that place which would not endure the light;" yielded that they should be examined: which was speedily done accordingly, by the committee of both houses appointed for that purpose.

The damage was not to be expressed, and the ruin that last act brought to the king was irreparable; for, besides that it served their turn (which no question they had discovered before) to prove those words against the earl of Strafford, which sir Harry Vane so punctually remembered, (as you shall find at the earl's trial,) and besides that it was matter of horror to the counsellors, to find that they might be arraigned for every rash, every inconsiderate, every imperious expression or word they had used there; and so made them more engaged to servile applications; it banished for ever all future freedom from that board, and those persons, whence his majesty was to expect advice in his greatest straits; all men satisfying themselves, "that they were no more obliged to deliver their opinions there freely, when they might be impeached in another place for so doing;" and the evincing this so useful doctrine was without doubt more the design of those grand managers, than any hope they had, of receiving further information thereby, than they had before.

And for my part, I must ask leave of those noble lords, who after the king's consent gave themselves leave to be examined, to say, that if they had well considered the oath they had taken when they were admitted to that society, which was, To keep secret all matters committed and revealed to them, or [that] should be treated of secretly in council, they would not have believed, that the king himself could have dispensed with that part of their oath. It is true, there is another clause in their oath, that allows them with the king's consent to reveal a matter of council: but that is, only what shall touch another counsellor; which they are not to do without the leave of the king or the council.

It was now time to intend themselves, as well as the public, and to repair, as well as to pull down; and therefore, as the principal reason (as was said before) for the accusing those two great persons of high treason (that is, of the general consent to it before any evidence was required) was, that they might be removed from the king's presence and his counsels, without which they conceived theirs would have no power with him; so that being compassed, care was taken to infuse into the king by marquis Hamilton, (who you heard before was licensed to take care of himself; and was now of great intimacy with the governing and undertaking party,) "that his majesty having declared to his people, that he really intended a reformation of all those extravagancies which former necessities, or occasions, or mistakes, had brought into the government of church or state: he could not give a more lively and demonstrable evidence, and a more gracious instance of such his intention, than by calling such persons to his council, whom the people generally thought most inclined to, and intent upon, such reformation: besides, that this would be a good means to preserve the dignity and just power of that board, which might otherwise for the late excess be more subject to violation, at least to some inconvenient attempts."

Hereupon in one day were sworn privy-counsellors, much to the public joy, the earl of Hertford, (whom the king shortly after made marquis,) the earl of Bedford, the earl of Essex, the earl of Bristol, the lord Say, the lord Savile, and the lord Kimbolton; and within two or three days after, the earl of Warwick: being all persons at that time very gracious to the people, or to the Scots, by whose election and discretion the people chose; and had been all in some umbrage at court, and most of them in visible disfavour there. This act the king did very cheerfully; heartily inclined to some of them, as he had reason; and not apprehending any inconvenience by that act from the other, whom he thought this light of his grace would reform, or at least restrain.

But the calling and admitting men to that board is not a work that can be indifferent; the reputation, if not the government, of the state so much depending on it. And though, it may be, there hath been too much curiosity heretofore used to discover men's particular opinions in particular points, before they have received that honour; whereas possibly such differences were rather to have been desired than avoided; yet there are certain opinions, certain propositions, and general principles, that whosoever does not hold, does not believe, is not, without great danger, to be accepted for a privy-counsellor. As, whosoever is not fixed to monarchical grounds, the preservation and upholding whereof is the chief end of such a council: whosever does not believe that, in order to that great end, there is a dignity, a freedom, a jurisdiction most essential to be preserved in and to that place; and takes not the preservation thereof to heart; ought never to be received there. What in prudence is to be done towards that end, admits a latitude that honest and wise men may safely and profitably differ [in]; and those differences (which I said before there was too much unskilful care to prevent) usually produce great advantages in knowledge and wisdom: but the end itself, that which the logicians call the terminus ad quem, ought always to be a postulatum, which whosever doubts, destroys: and princes cannot be too strict, too tender, in this consideration, in the constituting the body of their privy-council; upon the prudent doing whereof much of their safety, more of their honour and reputation (which is the life itself of princes) both at home and abroad, necessarily depends; and the inadvertencies in this point have been, mediately or immediately, the root and the spring of all the calamities that have ensued.

Two reasons have been frequently given by princes for oversights, or for wilful breaches, in this important dispensation of their favours. The first, "that such a man can do no harm;" when, God knows, few men have done more harm than those who have been thought to be able to do least; and there cannot be a greater error, than to believe, a man whom we see qualified with too mean parts to do good, to be therefore incapable of doing hurt: there is a supply of malice, of pride, of industry, and even of folly, in the weakest, when he sets his heart upon it, that makes a strange progress in mischief. The second, "when persons of ordinary faculties, either upon importunity, or other collateral respects, have been introduced thither, that it is but a place of honour, and a general testimony of the king's affection;" and so it hath been as it were reserved as a preferment for those, who were fit for no other preferment. As amongst the Jesuits they have a rule, that they who are unapt for greater studies, shall study cases of conscience. By this means the number hath been increased, which in itself breeds great inconveniences; since a less number are fitter both for counsel and despatch, in matters of the greatest moment, that depend upon a quick execution, than a greater number of men equally honest and wise: and for that, and other reasons of unaptness and incompetency, committees of dexterous men have been appointed out of the table to do the business of the table; and so men have been no sooner exalted with the reverent title, and pleased with the obligation of being made privy-counsellors, than they have checked that delight with discerning that they were not fully trusted; and so been more incensed with the reproachful distinction at, than obliged with the honourable admission to, that board, where they do not find all persons equally members. And by this kind of resentment, many sad inconveniences have befallen to the king, and to those men who have had the honour and misfortune of those secret trusts.

The truth is, the sinking and near desperate condition of monarchy in this kingdom can never be buoyed up, but by a prudent and steady council attending upon the virtue and vivacity of the king; nor be preserved and improved when it is up, but by cherishing and preserving the wisdom, integrity, dignity, and reputation of that council: the lustre whereof always reflects upon the king himself; who is not thought a great monarch when he follows the reins of his own reason and appetite; but when, for the informing his reason, and guiding his actions, he uses the service, industry, and faculties of the wisest men. And though it hath been, and will be, always necessary to admit to those counsels some men of great power, who will not take the pains to have great parts; yet the number of the whole should not be too great; and the capacities and qualities of the most [should be] fit for business; that is, either for judgment and despatch; or for one of them at least; and integrity above all.

This digression (much longer than was intended) will not appear very impertinent, when the great disservice shall appear, which befell unto the king by the swearing those lords formerly mentioned (I speak but of some of them) privy-counsellors. For, instead of exercising themselves in their new province, and endeavouring to preserve and vindicate that jurisdiction, they looked upon themselves as preferred thither, by their reputation in parliament, not [by the] kindness and estimation of the king; and so resolved to keep up principally the greatness of that place, to which they thought they owed their greatness. And therefore, when the king required the advice of his privy-council, in those matters of the highest importance which were then every day incumbent on him, the new privy-counsellors positively declared, "that they might not" (that was, that nobody might) give his majesty "any advice in matters depending in the two houses, and not agreeable to the sense of the two houses; which (forsooth) was his great council, by whose wisdom he was entirely to guide himself." And as this doctrine was most insipidly and perniciously urged by them; so it was most supinely and stupidly submitted to by the rest: insomuch as the king in a moment found himself bereaved of any public assistance or advice, in a time when he needed it most; and his greatest, and, upon the matter, his only business, being prudently to weigh and consider what to consent to, and what to deny, of such things as should be proposed to him by the two houses, he was now told, "that he was only to be advised by them;" which was as much as to ask, whether they had a mind he should do whatever they desired of him.

Whereas in truth, it is not only lawful for, but the duty of the privy-council, to give faithfully and freely their advice to the king upon all matters concluded in parliament, to which his royal consent is necessary, as well as upon any other subject whatsoever. Nay, as a counsellor, he is bound to dissuade the king to consent [from consenting] to that which is prejudicial to the crown; at least to make that prejudice manifest to him; though as a private person he could wish the matter consented to. And therefore, by the constitution of the kingdom, and the constant practice of all times, all bills, after they are passed both houses, and engrossed, are delivered by the clerk of the parliament to the clerk of the crown; and by him brought to the attorney-general; who presented the same to his majesty sitting in council, and having read them, declares what alterations are made by those bills in former laws, and what benefit or detriment, in profit or jurisdiction, will accrue thereby to the crown : and then, upon a full and free debate by his counsellors, the king resolves, and accordingly doth mark the bills that are to be enacted into laws, and respites the other that he thinks not fit to consent to. And methinks as this hath been the known practice, so the reason is very visible ; that the royal assent being a distinct and essential part towards the making a law, there should be as much care taken to inform the understanding and conscience of the king upon those occasions, as theirs, who prepare the same for his royal stamp.

That it might appear that what was done within the houses was agreeable to those who were without, and that the same spirit reigned in parliament and people, all possible license was exercised in preaching, and printing any old scandalous pamphlets, and adding new to them against the church : petitions presented by many parishioners against their pastors, with articles of their misdemeanours and behaviours ; most whereof consisted, " in their bowing at the name of Jesus, and obliging the communicants to come up to the altar," (as they enviously called it,) that is, to the rails which enclosed the communion-table, " to receive the sacrament." All which petitions were read with great delight, and presently referred to the committee for religion ; where Mr. White, a grave lawyer, but notoriously disaffected to the church, sat in the chair ; and then both petition and articles were suffered to be printed and published, (a license never practised before,) that the people might be inflamed against the clergy ; who were quickly taught to call all those against whom such petitions and articles were exhibited (which were frequently done by a few of the rabble, and meanest of the people, against the sense and judgment of the parish) the scandalous clergy ; which appellation was frequently applied to men of great gravity and learning, and the most unblemished lives.

There cannot be a better instance of the unruly and mutinous spirit of the city of London, which was the sink of all the ill humour of the kingdom, than the triumphant entry which some persons at that time made into London, who had been before seen upon pillories, and stigmatized as libellous and infamous offenders : of which classis of men scarce any age can afford the like.

There had been three persons of several professions some years before censured in [the] star-chamber ; William Pryn, a barrister of Lincoln's Inn ; John Bastwick, a doctor of physic ; and Henry Burton, a minister and lecturer in London.

The first, not unlearned in the profession of the law, as far as learning is acquired by the mere reading of books ; but being a person of great industry, had spent more time in reading divinity ; and, which marred that divinity, in the conversation of factious and hotheaded divines : and so, by a mixture of all three, with the rudeness and arrogance of his own nature, had contracted a proud and venomous dislike against the discipline of the church of England ; and so by degrees (as the progress is very natural) an equal irreverence to the government of the state too ; both which he vented in several absurd, petulant, and supercilious discourses in print.

The second, a half-witted, crack-brained fellow, unknown to either university, or the college of physicians ; but one that had spent his time abroad, between the schools and the camp, (for he had been in, or passed through armies,) and had gotten a doctorship, and Latin ; with which, in a very flowing style, with some wit and much malice, he inveighed against the prelates of the church in a book which he printed in Holland, and industriously dispersed in London, and throughout the kingdom ; having presumed (as their modesty is always equal to their obedience) to dedicate it to the sacred majesty of the king.

The third had formerly a kind of relation by service to the king ; having, before he took orders, waited as closet-keeper, and so attended at canonical hours, with the books of devotion, upon his majesty when he was prince of Wales ; and, a little before the death of king James, took orders : and so his highness coming shortly to be king, the vapours of ambition fuming into his head that he was still to keep his place, he would not think of less than being clerk of the closet to the new king, which place his majesty conferred upon, or rather continued in, the bishop of Durham, doctor Neyl, who had long served king James there. Mr. Burton thus disappointed, and, as he called it, despoiled of his rights, would not, in the greatness of his heart, sit down by the affront ; but committed two or three such weak, saucy indiscretions, as caused an inhibition to be sent him, " that he should presume to come any more to court ;" and from that time [he] resolved to revenge himself of the bishop of Durham, upon the whole order ; and so turned lecturer, and preached against them ; being endued with malice and boldness, instead of learning and any tolerable parts.

These three persons having been, for several follies and libelling humours, first gently reprehended, and after, for their incorrigibleness, more severely censured and imprisoned, found some means in prison of correspondence, which was not before known to be between them ; and to combine themselves in a more pestilent and seditious libel than they had ever before vented : in which the honour of the king, queen, counsellors, and bishops, was with equal license blasted and traduced ; which was faithfully dispersed by their proselytes in the city. The authors were quickly and easily known, and had indeed too much ingenuity to deny it ; and were thereupon brought together to the star-chamber-bar ore tenus ; where they behaved themselves with marvellous insolence ; with full confidence demanding, " that the bishops who sat in the court" (being only the archbishop of Canterbury, and the bishop of London) " might not be present, " because they were their enemies, and so parties : " which, how scandalous and ridiculous soever it seemed then there, was good logic and good law two years after in Scotland, and served to banish the bishops of that kingdom both from the council-table and the assembly. Upon a very patient and solemn hearing, in as full a court as I ever saw, without any difference in opinion or dissenting voice, they were all three censured as scandalous, seditious, and infamous persons, " to lose their ears " in the pillory, and to be imprisoned in several " gaols during the king's pleasure : " all which was executed with rigour and severity enough. But yet their itch of libelling still brake out ; and their friends of the city found a line of communication. Hereupon the wisdom of the state thought fit, that those infectious sores should breathe out their corruption in some air more remote from that catching city, and less liable to the contagion : and so, by an order of the lords of the council, Mr. Pryn was sent to a castle in the island of Jersey ; Dr. Bastwick to Scilly ; and Mr. Burton to Guernsey ; where they remained unconsidered, and truly I think unpitied, (for they were men of no virtue or merit,) for the space of two years, till the beginning of this present parliament.

Shortly upon that, petitions were presented by their wives or friends, to the house of commons, expressing "their heavy censures and long sufferings ;" and desiring, by way of appeal, "that the justice and rigour of that sentence might be reviewed and considered ; and that their persons might be brought from those remote and desolate places to London, that so they might be able to solicit or attend their own business." The sending for them out of prison (which was the main) took up much consideration : for though very many who had no kindness, had yet compassion towards them ; as thinking they had suffered enough ; and that, though they were scurvy fellows, they had been scurvily used : and others had not only affection to their persons, as having suffered for a common cause ; but were concerned to revive and improve their useful faculties of libelling and reviling authority ; and to make those ebullitions not thought noisome to the state : yet a sentence of a supreme court, the star-chamber, (of which they had not yet spoke with irreverence,) was not lightly to be blown off : but, when they were informed, and had considered, that by that sentence the petitioners were condemned to some prisons in London ; and were afterward removed thence by an order of the lords of the council ; they looked upon that order as a violation of the sentence ; and so made no scruple to order "that the prisoners should be removed from those foreign prisons, to the places to which they were regularly first committed." And to that purpose warrants were signed by the speaker, to the governors and captains of the several castles, "to bring them in safe custody to London : " which were sent with all possible expedition.

Pryn and Burton being neighbours (though in distinct islands) landed at the same time at Southampton ; where they were received and entertained with extraordinary demonstrations of affection and esteem ; attended by a marvellous conflux of company ; and their charges not only borne with great magnificence, but liberal presents given to them. And this method and ceremony kept them company all their journey, great herds of people meeting them at their entrance into all towns, and waiting upon them out with wonderful acclamations of joy. When they came near London, multitudes of people of several conditions, some on horseback, others on foot, met them some miles from the town ; very many having been a day's journey ; so they were brought, about two of the clock in the afternoon, in at Charing-cross, and carried into the city by above ten thousand persons, with boughs and flowers in their hands ; the common people strewing flowers and herbs in the ways as they passed, making great noise, and expressions of joy for their deliverance and return ; and in those acclamations mingling loud and virulent exclamations against the bishops, "who had so cruelly prosecuted such godly men." In the same manner, within five or six days after, and in like triumph, Dr. Bastwick returned from Scilly, landing at Dover ; and from thence bringing the same testimonies of the affections and zeal of Kent, as the others had done from Hampshire and Surrey, was met before he came to Southwark by the good people of London, and so conducted to his lodging likewise in the city.

I should not have wasted this much time and paper in a discourse of this nature, but that it is and was then evident, that this insurrection (for it was no better) and phrensy of the people was an effect of great industry and policy, to try and publish the temper of the people ; and to satisfy themselves in the activity and interest of their tribunals, to whom that province of shewing the people was committed. And from this time, the license of preaching and printing increased to that degree, that all pulpits were freely delivered to the schismatical and silenced preachers, who till then had lurked in corners, or lived in New England ; and the presses at liberty for the publishing the most invective, seditious, and scurrilous pamphlets, that their wit and malice could invent. Whilst the ministers of the state, and judges of the law, like men in an ecstasy, surprised and amazed with several apparitions, had no speech or motion ; as if, having committed such an excess of jurisdiction, (as men upon great surfeits are enjoined for a time to eat nothing,) they had been prescribed to exercise no jurisdiction at all. Whereas, without doubt, if either the privy-council, or the judges and the king's learned council, had assumed the courage to have questioned the preaching, or the printing, or the seditious riots upon the triumph of these three scandalous men, before the uninterrupted and security had confirmed the people in all three, it had been no hard matter to have destroyed those seeds, and pulled up those plants, which, [being] neglected, grew up and prospered to a full harvest of rebellion and treason. But this was yet but a rudeness and rankness abroad, without any visible countenance or approbation from the parliament : all was chaste within those walls.

The first malignity that was apparent there (for the accusation of the archbishop and the earl of Strafford were looked upon as acts of passion, directed against particular persons, who were thought to have deserved some extraordinary measure and proceeding) was against the church : not only in their committee for religion ; which had been assumed ever since the latter times of king James, but no such thing had been before heard of in parliament ; where, under pretence of receiving petitions against clergymen, they often debated points beyond the verge of their understanding : but, by their cheerful reception of a declaration of many sheets of paper against the whole government of the church ; presented by ten or a dozen ministers, at the bar ; and pretended to be signed by seven hundred ministers of London and the counties adjacent : and a petition, presented by alderman Pennington, and alleged to be subscribed by twenty thousand men, inhabitants within the city of London ; who required, in plain terms, "the total extirpation of episcopacy." But the house was then so far from being possessed with that spirit, that the utmost that could be obtained, upon a long debate upon that petition, was, "that it should not be rejected ;" against which the number of the petitioners was urged as a powerful argument ; only it was suffered to remain in the hands of the clerk of the house, with direction, "that no copy "of it should be given." And for the ministers' declaration, one part only of it was insisted on by them, and read in the house; which concerned the exercise of their jurisdiction, and the excess of their ecclesiastical courts: the other parts were declined by many of them, and especially ordered "to be sealed up by the clerk, that it might be perused by no man." So that all that envy and animosity against the church seemed to be resolved into a desire, "that a bill might be framed to remove the bishops from their votes in the lords' house, and from any office in secular affairs;" which was the utmost men pretended to wish: and to such a purpose a bill was shortly after prepared, and brought into the house; of which more shall be said in its proper place.

It was a strange uningenuity and mountebankry, that was practised in the procuring those petitions; which continued ever after in the like addresses. The course was, first, to prepare a petition very modest and dutiful, for the form; and for the matter, not very unreasonable; and to communicate it at some public meeting, where care was taken it should be received with approbation: the subscription of very few hands filled the paper itself, where the petition was written, and therefore many more sheets were annexed, for the reception of the number, which gave all the credit, and procured all the countenance, to the undertaking. When a multitude of hands was procured, the petition itself was cut off, and a new one framed, suitable to the design in hand, and annexed to the long list of names which were subscribed to the former. And by this means, many men found their hands subscribed to petitions, of which they before had never heard. As several ministers, whose hands were to the petition and declaration of the London ministers before mentioned, have professed to many persons, "that they never saw that petition or declaration before it was presented to the house; but had signed another, the substance of which was, not to be compelled to take the oath enjoined by the new canons: and when they found, instead of that, their names set to a desire of an alteration of the government of the church, they with much trouble went to Mr. Marshall, with whom they had intrusted their petition and their hands; who gave them no other answer, but that it was thought fit by those who understood business better than they, that the latter petition should rather be preferred than the former." And when he found, they intended by some public act to vindicate themselves from that calumny; such persons, upon whom they had their greatest dependence, were engaged, by threats and promises, to prevail with them to sit still, and to pass by that indirect proceeding.

For the better facilitating and making way for these virulent attempts upon the church, petitions and complaints are [were] exhibited against the exorbitant acts of some bishops; especially against the bishops of Bath and Wells, and Ely; who had with great pride and insolence provoked all the gentry, and in truth most of the inhabitants within their dioceses." And the new canons were insisted on, "as a most palpable invasion by the whole body of the clergy, upon the laws and liberty of the people."

I told you before, that after the dissolution of the former short parliament, the convocation-house was continued by special warrant from the king; and by his majesty, in a solemn message sent to them by sir Harry Vane, then principal secretary, "required to proceed in the making of canons, for the better peace and quiet of the church." Notwithstanding this command, the chief of the clergy, well knowing the spirit of bitterness that was contracted against them; and many obsolete pamphlets against their jurisdiction and power being, since the commotions in Scotland, revived and published with more freedom; desired his majesty, "that the opinions of the judges might be known and declared, whether they might then lawfully sit, the parliament being dissolved, and proceed in the making of canons; as likewise, upon other particulars in their jurisdiction, which had been most inveighed against?"

All the judges of England, upon a mature debate, in the presence of the king's council, under their hands asserted, "their power of making canons, and those other parts of jurisdiction, which had been so enviously questioned." Hereupon they proceeded; and having composed a body of canons, presented the same to his majesty, for his royal approbation. They were then again debated at the council-board, not without notable opposition; for upon some lessening the power and authority of the chancellors, and their commissaries, by those canons, the professors of that law took themselves to be disobliged; and sir Henry Martin, (who could not oversee any advantages,) upon several days of hearing at the council-table, with his utmost skill objected against them: but in the end, by the entire and unanimous advice of the privy-council, the canons were confirmed by the king, under the great seal of England, and thereby legally enjoined to be observed. So that whatever they were, the judges were at least as guilty of the first presumption in framing them, and the lords of the council in publishing and executing them, as the bishops, or the rest of the clergy, in either.

Yet the storm fell wholly on the church: and the matter of those canons, and the manner of making them, was insisted on, as a pregnant testimony of a malignant spirit in the very function of the bishops. The truth is, the season in which that synod continued to sit (as was observed before) was in so ill a conjuncture of time, (upon the dissolution of a parliament, and almost in an invasion from Scotland,) that nothing could have been transacted there, of a popular and prevailing influence. Then, some sharp canons against sectaries, and some additional in point of ceremonies, countenancing, though not enjoining, what had not been long practised, infinitely inflamed some, and troubled others; who jointly took advantage of what strictly was amiss; as the making an oath, the matter of which was conceived incongruous; and enjoining it to many of the laity, as well as the clergy; and the granting of subsidies.

So that the house of commons (that is, the major part) made no scruple, in that fury, to declare, "that the convocation-house had no power at all of making canons:" notwithstanding that it was apparent by the law, and the uncontradicted practice of the church, that canons had never been otherwise made: "and that those canons contained in them matter of sedition and reproach to the regal power; prejudicial to the liberty and property of the subject, and to the privileges of "parliament." By the extent of which notable vote and declaration, they had involved almost the whole clergy under an arbitrary guilt; as much as they had done the nobility and gentry before, under their votes of lords lieutenants, deputy lieutenants, privy-counsellors, and sheriffs; and of which they made the same use; as shall be remembered in its proper place.

The two armies were necessarily to be provided for, lest the countries where their quarters were should come to be oppressed by free quarter; which would not only raise a very inconvenient noise, but introduce a necessity of disbanding the armies, which they were in no degree ready for: and money not being to be raised soon enough in the formal way, by act of parliament, which would require some time in the passage; besides, that the manner and way of raising it had not been enough considered; and the collecting it would require much time, even after an act of parliament should be passed; therefore for the present supply they thought fit to make use of their credit with the city; to whom a formal embassy of lords and commons was sent; which were carefully chosen of such persons as carried the business of the house before them, that the performing the service might be as well imputed to their particular reputation and interest, as to the affection of the city: and these men in their orations to the citizens undertook "that their money should be repaid with interest by the care of the parliament." And this was the first introduction of the public faith; which grew afterwards to be applied to all monstrous purposes.

And this expedient succeeded twice or thrice for such sums as they thought fit to require; which were only enough to carry on their affairs, and keep them in motion; not proportionable to discharge the debt due to the armies, but to enable them to pay their quarters: it being fit to keep a considerable debt still owing, lest they should appear too ready to be disbanded.

And they had likewise another design in this commerce with the city; for always upon the loan of money they recommended some such thing to the parliament, as might advance the designs of the party; as "the proceeding against delinquents;" or "some reformation in the church;" which the managers knew well what use to make of upon any emergency. When they had set this traffick on foot in the city, and so brought their friends there into more reputation and activity; at their election of common-council men, (which is every year before Christmas; and in which new men had rarely used to be chosen, except in case of death, but the old still continued,) all the grave and substantial citizens were left out; and such chosen as were most eminent for opposing the government, and most disaffected to the church, though of never so mean estates: which made a present visible alteration in the temper of the city, (the common-council having so great a share in the management of affairs there,) and even in the government itself.

Other ways were to be thought of for getting of money, which was, once at least every month, called for very importunately by the Scottish commissioners; which caused the same provision to be made for the English forces. The next expedient was, "That in so great an exigence, and for the public peace; that the armies might not enter "into blood, by the determination of the cessation, which want of pay would inevitably produce; the several members of the house would lend money, according to their several abilities; or that such as had no money would become bound for it; and upon these terms enough could be borrowed." And this was no sooner proposed, but consented to by all the eminent leaders; and by many others, in order to make themselves the more acceptable to those; and some did it for their own convenience, there being little hazard of their money, and full interest to be received, and believing it would facilitate the disbanding of the armies; upon which all sober men's hearts were directed.

And now, to support their stock of credit, it was time to raise money upon the people by act of parliament; which they had an excuse for not doing in the usual way, "and giving it immediately to the king, to be paid into the exchequer; because the public faith was so deeply engaged to the city for a great debt; and so many particular members in the loan of monies, and in being bound for the payment of great sums, for which their estates were liable: and therefore it was but reason, that for their indemnity the money that was to be raised should be paid into the hands of particular members of the house, named by them; who should take care to discharge all public engagements." And the first bill they passed being but for two subsidies, which was not sufficient to discharge any considerable part of the money borrowed, they inserted in the bill the commissioners' names, who were to receive and dispose the money. And the king made no pause in the passing it; himself not considering the consequence of it, and none about him having the courage to present it to him.

But from that time, there was no bill passed for the raising of money, but it was disposed of in the same, or the like manner; that none of it could be applied to the king's use, or by his direction. Nor were they contented with this invasion of his prerogative, but took notice, "that, from the time of his majesty's coming to the crown, he had taken the customs and impositions upon merchandise as his own right, without any act of parliament; which no king had ever before done;" insinuating withal, "that they meant to make a further inquisition into those, who had been the chief ministers in that presumption." They said, "Nobody could imagine, but that they intended to grant the same to his majesty, in the same manner, for his life, as had been done to his progenitors by former parliaments: but that they found such an act could not be presently made ready; because the book of rates now in practice (besides that it had not been made by lawful authority) contained many excesses, and must be reformed in several particulars; in preparing which, they would use all possible diligence, and hoped to effect it in a short time: however, that the continuance of the collection in the manner it was in, without any lawful title, and during the very sitting of the parliament, would be a precedent of a very evil consequence, and make the right of giving it the more questioned; at least the less valued. And therefore it would be fit, that either all the present collection be discontinued, and cease absolutely; which was in the power of the merchants themselves to do, by "refusing to pay any duties which there was no law to compel them to: or, that a short act should be presently passed, for the continuance of the payments for a short time; against the expiration whereof, the act [for granting them] for life, with the book of rates, would be prepared, and ready." There were many inconveniences discovered in the first, in discontinuing the collection and payment of duties, "which would not be so easily revived again, and reduced into order: and that the last would, without prejudice to either, both vindicate the right of the subject, and secure the king's profit:" and so they prepared (with all the expressions of duty and affection to the king that can be imagined) and presented a grant of those duties for some few months. In which there was a preamble, disapproving and condemning "all that had been done in that particular, from his majesty's first coming to the crown, to that time; and asserting his whole right to depend upon the gift of his subjects:" and concluded with "most severe penalties to be inflicted upon those, who should presume hereafter to collect or receive those duties otherwise than as they were, or should be, granted by act of parliament:" which was never before provided for, and the king likewise passed it; and so, besides other unseasonable concessions and determinations, put all the revenue he had to live upon, and to provide him meat, into their hands, and to take from him whenever they should think it convenient to their other designs: of which he shortly after found the mischief.

Though, as hath been observed, there was not yet one penny of money given to the king, or received by his ministers; yet, because subsidies were raised upon the people, according to the formality of parliaments; and as if all that great supply had been to the king's own coffers; it was thought necessary, that the people should be refreshed with some behevful law, at the same time that they found themselves charged with the payment of so many subsidies. And under that consideration, together with that bill for subsidies, another was sent up to the lords, for a triennial parliament: both which quickly passed that house, and were transmitted to the king.

In that for the triennial parliament (though the same was grounded upon two former statutes in the time of king Edward the Third, "That there should be once every year a parliament") there were some clauses very derogatory to monarchical principles; as "giving the people authority to assemble together, if the king failed to call them," and the like: yet his majesty, really intending to make those conventions frequent, without any great hesitation, enacted those two bills together; so much to the seeming joy and satisfaction of both houses, that they pretended "to have sufficiently provided for the indemnity of the commonwealth; and that there remained nothing to be done, but such a return of duty and gratitude to the king, as might testify their devotions; and that their only end was to make him glorious:" but those fits of zeal and loyalty never lasted long.

The lord Finch's flight made not only that place vacant, but begat several other vacancies. The seal was given to Littleton, who was then chief justice of the common pleas; for which place he was excellently fitted: but being a man of a grave and comely presence, his other parts were overvalued; his learning in the law being his masterpiece. And so he was chosen to be keeper, upon the opinion and recommendation of the two great ministers under the cloud; who had before brought him to be a privy-counsellor, whilst chief justice, to the no little jealousy of the lord Finch.

Banks, the attorney general, was weary enough of the inquisition that was made into the king's grants, and glad to be promoted to the common pleas. And Herbert, the solicitor general, who had sat all this time in the house of commons, awed and terrified with their temper; applying himself to Mr. Hamblen, and two or three of the other, without interposing or crossing them in any thing; longed infinitely to be out of that fire: and so the office of attorney general, which at any other time had been to be wished, was now most grateful, as it removed him from the other attendance, there being an incapacity put upon that place of sitting as a member in parliament: and so he was called by writ to attend the house of peers, where he sits upon the woolsack at the back of the judges.

From the time that there was no more fear of the archbishop of Canterbury, nor the lord lieutenant of Ireland, nor of any particular men who were like to succeed them in favour; all who had been active in the court, or in any service for the king, being totally dispirited, and most of them to be disposed to any vile offices against him; the great patriots thought they might be able to do their country better service, if they got the places and preferments in the court, and so prevented the evil counsels which had used to spring from thence. And they had then a fast friend there, the marquis of Hamilton; who could most dexterously put such an affair into agitation, with the least noise, and prepare both king and queen to hearken to it very willingly: and in a short time all particulars were well adjusted for every man's accommodation.

The earl of Bedford was to be treasurer: in order to which, the bishop of London had already desired the king "to receive the staff into his hand, and give him leave to retire to the sole care of his bishopric;" by which he wisely withdrew from the storm, and enjoyed the greatest tranquillity of any man of the three kingdoms, throughout the whole boisterous and destroying time that followed; and lived to see a happy and blessed end of them, and died in great honour and glory. And so the treasury was for the present put into commission. Mr. Pym was to be chancellor of the exchequer: which office the lord Cottington was likewise ready to surrender, upon assurance of indemnity for the future. These two were engaged to procure the king's revenue to be liberally provided for, and honourably increased and settled.

And, that this might be the better done, the earl of Bedford prevailed with the king, upon the removes mentioned before, to make Oliver Saint-John (who hath been often, and will be oftener mentioned in this discourse) his solicitor general; which his majesty readily consented to; hoping that, being a gentleman of an honourable extraction, (if he had been legitimate,) he would have been very useful in the present exigence to support his service in the house of commons, where his authority was then great; at least, that he would be ashamed ever to appear in any thing that might prove prejudicial to the crown. And he became immediately possessed of that office of great trust; and was so well qualified for it, by his fast and rooted malignity against the government, that he lost no credit with his party, out of any apprehension or jealousy that he would change his side: and he made good their confidence; not in the least degree abating his malignant spirit, or dissembling it; but with the same obstinacy opposed every thing which might advance the king's service, when he was his solicitor, as ever he had done before.

The lord Say was to be master of the wards; which place the lord Cottington was likewise to surrender for his quiet and security. And Denzil Hollis was to be secretary of state, in the place of secretary Windebank.

Thus far the intrigue for preferments was entirely complied with: and it is great pity that it was not fully executed, that the king might have had some able men to have advised or assisted him; which probably these very men would have done, after they had been so thoroughly engaged: whereas the king had none left about him in any immediate trust in business, (for I speak not of the duke of Richmond, and some very few men more about his person, who always behaved themselves honourably,) who either did not betray, or sink under the weight or reproach of it.

But the earl of Bedford was resolved, that he would not enter into the treasury, till the revenue was in some degree settled; and at least the bill for tonnage and poundage passed, with all decent circumstances, and for life; which both he and Mr. Pym did very heartily labour to effect; and had in their thoughts many good expedients, by which they intended to raise the revenue of the crown. And none of them were very solicitous to take their promotions, before some other accommodations were provided for some of the rest of their chief companions; who would be neither well pleased with their so hasty advancement before them, nor so submissive in the future to follow their dictates.

Hambden was a man they could not leave unprovided for; and therefore there were several designs, and very far driven, for the satisfaction and promotion of him, and Essex, and Kimbolton, and others; though not so fully concluded, as those before mentioned. For the king's great end was, by these compliances, to save the life of the earl of Strafford, and to preserve the church from ruin: for nobody thought the archbishop in danger of his life. And there were few of the persons mentioned before, who thought their preferments would do them much good, if the earl were suffered to live; but in that of the church, the major part even of those persons would have been willing to have satisfied the king; the rather, because they had no reason to think the two houses, or indeed either of them, could have been induced to have pursued the contrary. And so the continued and renewed violence in the prosecution of the earl of Strafford made the king well contented (as the other reasons prevailed with the other persons) that the execution of those promotions should be for a time suspended.

When there was a new occasion, upon the importunity of the Scottish commissioners, to procure more money; and the leading men, who used to be forward in finding out expedients for supply, seemed to despair of being able to borrow more; because the city was much troubled and disheartened, to see the work of reformation proceed so slowly, and no delinquents yet brought to justice; and that till some advance was made towards those longed-for ends, there must be no expectation of borrowing more money from or in the city: upon which Mr. Hyde said, "That he did not believe the thing to be so difficult as was pretended; that no man lent his money, who did not gain by it; and that it was evident enough, that there was plenty of money; and therefore he was confident, if a small committee of the house were nominated, who, upon consultation between themselves, might use the name of the house to such men as were reputed to have money, they might prevail with them to lend as much as might serve for the present exigence." Whereupon the house willingly approved the motion; and named himself, Mr. Capel, sir John Strange-ways, and five or six more, whom they desired might be joined with them; who, the same or the next day, repaired into the city; resolving to apply themselves to no men but such who were of clear reputation in point of wisdom, and sobriety of understanding, as well as of wealth and ability to lend. And after they had spoken together with four or five eminent men, they agreed to pair, and to confer severally with their particular acquaintance, upon the same subject: many men choosing rather to lend their money, than to be known to have it; and being very wary in their expressions, except in private.

When they had again communicated together, they found that the borrowing the money would be very easy; every man with whom they had conferred being ready and forward to lend the money upon their security who proposed, or to find a friend who should. Most of them in their private discourse said, "that there was money enough to be lent, if men saw there would be like to be any end of borrowing; but that it was an universal discomfort and discouragement, to all men of estates and discretion, to see two great armies still kept on foot in the kingdom, at so vast a charge, when there remained no fear of a war; and that if a time were once appointed for the disbanding them, there should not want money for the doing all that should be necessary in order to it." This answer satisfied them in all respects: and the next day Mr. Hyde reported to the house the success of their employment; "that they had conferred with the most substantial and best reputed men of the city; who, by themselves and their friends, had promised to supply the money which was desired." And then he enlarged upon "the temper they understood the city to be in, by the reports of those who might be reasonably supposed to know it best; that it was indeed very much troubled and melancholic, to see two armies kept on foot at so vast a charge within the bowels of the kingdom, when, God be thanked, all the danger of a war was removed; and that they who were very able to make good what they promised, had frankly undertaken, that if a peremptory day was appointed for being rid of those armies, there should not be want of money to discharge them."

The report was received with great applause by the major part of the house, as was reasonably collected by their countenance : but it was as apparent, that the governing party was exceedingly perplexed with it, and knew not on a sudden what to say to it : if they embraced the opportunity, to procure a supply of money which was really wanted, it would be too great a countenance to the persons who had procured it; and whose reputation they were willing to depress : besides, it would imply their approbation of what had been said of the disbanding : at least, would be a ground of often mentioning and pressing it; and which, how grateful soever to most other men, was the thing they most abhorred. After a long silence, Mr. Hambden said, "that the worthy gentlemen were to be much commended for the pains they had taken; of which, he doubted not, good use would be made:" and so proposed, "That it might be well thought of, and the debate resumed the next day;" which could not be denied. The next day, alderman Pennington (a man in highest confidence with the party; and one, who insinuated all things to the common-council which he was directed should be started there) began the discourse; and said, "that the gentlemen, who had been last in the city to borrow money, had made a fair report; but that in the end of it there was colloquintida; that he could not find with what persons they had conferred about the temper of the city; nor that any considerable people troubled themselves with designing or wishing what the parliament should do, which they knew to be wise enough, to know what and when they were to do that which was best for the kingdom: and they acquiesced in their grave judgment:" and concluded, "that the money that the house stood in need of, or a greater sum, was ready to be paid to whomsoever they would appoint to receive it." The house made itself very merry with the alderman's colloquintida, and called upon him "to explain it;" and so the debate ended: all men being well pleased to see the disorder they were in, and the pains they had taken to free themselves from it; which every day was renewed upon them, as the subject-matter afforded occasion; and they visibly lost much of the reverence, which had been formerly paid to them.

About the beginning of March, they began to make preparations for the trial of the earl of Strafford; who had then been about three months in prison, under their accusation of high treason: and by this time, for their better supply in that work, a committee was come from the parliament in Ireland, to solicit matters concerning that kingdom. This committee (most of them being papists, and the principal actors since in the rebellion) was received with great kindness, and, upon the matter, added to the committee for the prosecution of the earl of Strafford. So that now, Ireland seemed no less intent upon the ruin of that unfortunate lord, than England and Scotland; there being such a correspondence settled between Westminster and Dublin, that whatsoever was practised in the house of commons here was very soon after done likewise there: and as sir George Ratcliff was accused here of high treason, upon pretence of being a confederate with the earl in his treasons; but in truth that he might not be capable of giving any evidence on the behalf of him, and thereupon sent for into this kingdom: so all, or most of the other persons, who were in any trust with the earl, and so privy to the grounds and reasons of the counsels there, and only able to make those apparent, were accused by the house of commons in that kingdom of high treason; under the general impeachment, of "endeavouring to subvert the fundamental laws of that kingdom, and to introduce an arbitrary power:" which served [the] turn there, to secure their persons, and to remove them from councils, as it had done here.

What seeds were then sown for the rebellion, which within a year after broke out in Ireland, by the great liberty and favour that committee found; who, for the good service against that lord, were hearkened to in all things that concerned that kingdom, shall be observed, and spoken of at large, hereafter.

Much time was spent in consideration of the manner of the trial; for they could find no precedent would fit their case: "Whether it should be in the house of peers? which room was thought too little, for the accusers, witnesses, judges, and spectators: Who should prosecute? Whether members chosen of the commons, or the king's council? Whether the bishops" (which were twenty-four in number, and like to be too tender-hearted in matter of blood, and so either to convert many, or to increase a dissenting party too much) "should have voices in the trial? Whether those who had been created peers since the accusation [was] carried up, should be admitted to be judges?" And lastly, "Whether the commons, who were to be present at the trial, should sit uncovered? and, Whether any members of the house of commons should be examined at the trial on the behalf of the earl?" who had sent a list of names, and desired an order to that purpose.

After much debate it was resolved, "that the trial should be in Westminster-hall, where seats should be built for the reception of the whole house of commons, which together with the speaker should be present:" for they then foresaw, that they might be put to another kind of proceeding than that they pretended; and (though with much ado) they consented to sit uncovered, lest such a little circumstance might disturb the whole design.

For the prosecution, they had no mind to trust the king's council; who neither knew their secret evidence, nor, being informed, were like to apply and press it so vigorously as the business would require: and therefore they appointed "that committee which had prepared the charge, to give in the evidence, and in the name of all the commons of England to prosecute the impeachment."

For the bishops: after many bitter invectives, and remembering the faults of particular persons, and the canons which seemed to involve the whole body, with sharpness and threats; they took the case to be so clear upon an old canon, (the only one they acknowledged for orthodox,) that clericus non debet interesse sanguini, that they were content "to refer that to the house of peers, as proper only for their determination." And this they did, not upon any confidence they had in the matter itself, whatever law, or reason, or canon they pretended; or in the lords, the major part of whom, when any difference of opinion was, always dissented from their designs: but that they had a trick of doing their business by intimation; and they had a sure friend amongst the bishops, who had promised them seasonably to free them of that trouble.

And therefore they would not trust their lords' own inclinations with the other point, of the new barons, which they knew would be controverted; but in plain terms demanded, "that no peer, created since the day upon which the earl of Strafford was impeached for high treason, because they were involved as commoners in the making that accusation, should sit as judges at his trial."

For the earl's demand, "of an order to examine some members on his behalf, upon matters of fact, at his trial;" after a long debate, they left it only in the power of the persons themselves who were nominated, "to be examined if they would," (not without some smart animadversions, "that they should take heed what they did,") and refused to enjoin them; though the same had been done at their desire, for the lords of the council; but that was against the earl, and so the less to be considered.

The lords, in the absence of the lord keeper, who was very sick, made choice of the earl of Arundel to preside and govern the court; being a person notoriously disaffected to the earl of Strafford.

And for the great business of the bishops, they were saved the labour of giving any rule (which, it may be, would have troubled them) by the bishop of Lincoln's standing up, and moving, on the behalf of himself and his brethren, "that they might be excused from being present at the trial, being ecclesiastical persons, and so not to have their hands in blood;" and such other reasons, as, when they are examined, will be found very trivial.

This bishop had been, by several censures in the star-chamber, imprisoned in the Tower, where he remained till after the beginning of this parliament, and was then set at liberty upon the desire of the lords; who knew him to be a mortal and irreconcilable enemy to the archbishop of Canterbury, and indeed had always been a puritan so far, as to love none of the bishops, and to have used all learned churchmen with great contempt and insolence; and yet he left no way unpractised to assure the king, "that he would do great matters in parliament for his service, if he might be at liberty." The next day after he came to the house of peers, the lord Say made that schismatical speech, which he since printed; taking notice "of some imputations laid on him by the archbishop of Canterbury, that he should be a sectary;" which nobody can doubt, that reads that speech: yet he had no sooner done, than that bishop rose, and made a large panegyric in his praise, and professed, "that he always believed his lordship to be as far from a sectary, as himself." And when he found the great desire of the house of commons to be freed from the bishops' votes in that trial, he never left terrifying them with the censure that hung over their heads for making the canons, till he persuaded them to ingratiate themselves, by desiring to be excused in that matter, before an order should be made for their absence.

This example of the bishops prevailed with some lords, who had been created since the accusation, to quit their right of judging; and amongst them, the lord Littleton (who had been made a baron upon the desire of the earl of Strafford, for that only reason, that he professed, "if he were a peer, he would (and indeed he could) do him notable service") was the first who quitted his right to judge, because he had been a commoner when the accusation was first brought up: but they who insisted upon their right, (as the lord Seymour and others,) and demanded the judgment of the house, were no more disturbed, but exercised the same power to the end, as any of the other lords did; and so, no doubt, might the bishops too, if they would: for, though there might be some reason for their absence, when the trial was according to law, before and by his peers only; yet, when that judgment was waved, and a bill of attainder brought up against him, their votes in that bill were as necessary and essential, as of any other of the lords. And it may be, their unseasonable, voluntary, unjust quitting it then, made many men less solicitous for the utter taking away that right afterwards. But of that in its place.

All things being thus prepared, and settled; on Monday, the twenty-second of March, the earl of Strafford was brought to the bar in Westminster-hall; the lords sitting in the middle of the hall in their robes; and the commoners, and some strangers of quality, with the Scottish commissioners, and the committee of Ireland, on either side: there being a close box made at one end, at a very convenient distance for hearing, in which the king and queen sat untaken notice of; his majesty, out of kindness and curiosity, desiring to hear all that could be alleged: of which, I believe, he afterwards repented himself; when "his having been present at the trial" was alleged and urged to him, as an argument for the passing the bill of attainder.

After his charge was read, and an introduction made by Mr. Pym, in which he called him the wicked earl; some member of the house of commons, according to their parts assigned, being a lawyer, applied and pressed the evidence, with great license and sharpness of language; and, when the earl had made his defence, replied with the same liberty upon whatsoever he said; taking all occasions of bitterly inveighing against his person: which reproachful way of carriage was looked upon with so much approbation, that one of the managers (Mr. Palmer) lost all his credit and interest with them, and never recovered it, for using a decency and modesty in his carriage and language towards him; though the weight of his arguments pressed more upon the earl, than all the noise of the rest.

The trial lasted eighteen days; in which, "all the hasty or proud expressions, or words, he had uttered at any time since he was first made a privy-counsellor; all the acts of passion or power that he had exercised in Yorkshire, from the time that he was first president there; his engaging himself in projects in Ireland, as the sole making of flax, and selling tobacco in that kingdom; his billeting of soldiers, and exercising of martial law in that kingdom; his extraordinary proceeding against the lord Mountnorris, and the lord chancellor [Loftus]; his assuming a power of judicature at the council-table to determine private interest, and matter of inheritance; some rigorous and extrajudicial determinations in cases of plantations; some high discourses at the council-table in Ireland; and some casual and light discourses at his own table, and at public meetings; and lastly, some words spoken in secret council in this kingdom after the dissolution of the last parliament," were urged and pressed against him, to make good the general charge, of "an endeavour to overthrow the fundamental government of the kingdom, and to introduce an arbitrary power."

The earl behaved himself with great show of humility and submission; but yet, with such a kind of courage, as would lose no advantage; and, in truth, made his defence with all imaginable dexterity; answering this, and evading that, with all possible skill and eloquence; and though he knew not, till he came to the bar, upon what parts of his charge they would proceed against him, or what evidence they would produce, he took very little time to recollect himself, and left nothing unsaid that might make for his own justification.

For the business of Ireland; he complained much, "that, by an order from the committee which prepared his charge against him, all his papers in that kingdom, by which he should make his defence, were seized and taken from him; and, by virtue of the same order, all his goods, household stuff, plate, and tobacco (amounting, as he said, to eighty thousand pounds) were likewise seized; so that he had not money to subsist in prison: that all those ministers of state in Ireland, who were most privy to the acts for which he was questioned, and so could give the best evidence and testimony on his behalf, were imprisoned under the charge of treason. Yet he averred, that he had behaved himself in that kingdom, according to the power and authority granted by his commission and instructions, and according to the rules and customs observed by former deputies and lieutenants. That the monopolies of flax and tobacco had been undertaken by him for the good of that kingdom, and benefit of his majesty: the former establishing a most beneficial trade and good husbandry, not before practised there; and the latter bringing a revenue of above forty thousand pounds to the crown, and advancing trade, and bringing no damage to the subject. That billeting of soldiers," (which was alleged to be treason, by a statute made in Ireland in the time of king Henry the Sixth,) "and the exercising of martial law, had been always practised by the lieutenants and deputies of that kingdom;" (which he proved by the testimony and confession of the earl of Cork and the lord Wilmot; neither of which desired to say more for his behoof, than inevitably they must. He said, "the act of parliament mentioned, of Henry the Sixth, concerned not him; it comprehending only the inferior subjects, and making it penal to them to billet soldiers, not the deputy, or supreme commander; if it did, that it was repealed by Poyning's act, in the eleventh year of Henry the Seventh: however, if it were not, and that it were treason still, it was treason only in Ireland, and not in England; and therefore, that he could not be tried here for it, but must be transmitted thither." He said, "the council-table in Ireland had a large, natural, legal jurisdiction, by the institution and fundamental customs of that kingdom; and had, in all times, determined matters of the same nature, which it had done in his time: and that the proceedings there upon plantations had been with the advice of the judges, upon a clear title of the crown, and upon great reason of state: and that the nature and disposition of that people required a

"severe hand and strict reins to be held upon them, which being loosed, the crown would quickly feel the mischief."

For the several discourses, and words, wherewith he was charged; he denied many, and explained and put a gloss upon others, by the reasons and circumstances of the debate. One particular, which they much insisted on, though it was spoken twelve years before, "that he should say in the public hall in York, that the little finger of the prerogative should lie heavier upon them than the loins of the law," he directly inverted; and proved, by two or three persons of credit, "that he said" (and the occasion made it probable, being upon the business of knighthood, which was understood to be a legal tax) "the little finger of the law was heavier than the loins of the prerogative;" that imposition for knighthood amounting to a much higher rate, than any act of the prerogative which had been exercised. "However," he said, "he hoped no indiscretion, or unskilfulness, or passion, or pride of words, would amount to treason; and for misdemeanours, he was ready to submit to their justice."

He made the least, that is, the worst excuse, for those two acts against the lord Mountnorris, and the lord chancellor; which indeed were powerful acts, and manifested a nature excessively imperious if not inclined to tyranny; and, no doubt, drew a greater dislike and terror, from sober and dispassioned persons, than all that was alleged against him. A servant of the earl's, one Annesley, (kinsman to Mountnorris,) attending on his lord during some fit of the gout, (of which he often laboured,) had by accident, or negligence, suffered a stool to fall upon the earl's foot; enraged with the pain whereof, his lordship with a small cane struck Annesley: this being merrily spoken of at dinner, at a table where the lord Mountnorris was, (I think, the lord chancellor's,) he said, "the gentleman had a brother that would not have taken such a blow." This coming some months after to the deputy's hearing, he caused a council of war to be called; the lord Mountnorris being an officer of the army; where, upon an article "of moving sedition, and stirring up the soldiers against the general," he was charged with those words formerly spoken at the lord chancellor's table. What defence he made, I know not; for he was so surprised, that he knew not what the matter was, when he was summoned to that council: but the words being proved, he was deprived of his office (being then vice-treasurer) and his foot-company; committed to prison; and sentenced "to lose his head." The office and company were immediately disposed of, and he imprisoned, till the king sent him over a pardon, by which he was discharged with his life; all other parts of the sentence being fully executed.

This seemed to all men a most prodigious course of proceeding; that, in a time of full peace, a peer of the kingdom and a privy-counsellor, for an unadvised, passionate, mysterious word, (for the expression was capable of many interpretations,) should be called before a council of war, which could not reasonably be understood to have then a jurisdiction over such persons, and in such cases; and, without any process, or formality of defence, in two hours should be deprived of his life and fortune: the injustice whereof seemed the more formidable, for that the lord Mountnorris was known, for some time before, to stand in great jealousy and disfavour with the earl : which made it looked on as a pure act of revenge ; and gave all men warning, how they trusted themselves in the territories where he commanded.

The earl discharged himself of the rigour and severity of the sentence, and laid it upon " the council of war ; where himself not only forbore to be present, but would not suffer his brother, " who was an officer of the army, to stay there : " he said, " that he had conjured the court to proceed without any respect of favour or kindness to himself ; and that, as soon as he understood the judgment of the council, which was unanimous, he declared publicly, (which he had likewise done before,) that a hair of his head should not perish ; and immediately wrote an earnest letter to his majesty, for the procuring his pardon ; which was by his majesty, upon his lordship's recommendation and mediation, granted accordingly ; and thereupon the lord Mountnorris was set at liberty : though, it is true, he was, after his enlargement, not suffered to come to England." He concluded, " that the lord Mountnorris was an insolent person ; and that he took this course to humble him ; and that he would be very well content, that the same course might be taken to reform him ; if the same care might likewise be, that it might prove no more to his prejudice, than the other had been to that lord."

But the standers by made another excuse for him : " The lord Mountnorris was a man of great industry, activity, and experience in the affairs of Ireland ; having raised himself from a very private, mean condition " (having been an inferior servant to the lord Chichester) " to the degree of a viscount, and a privy-counsellor, and to a very ample revenue in lands and offices ; and had always, by servile flattery and sordid application, wrought himself into trust and nearness with all deputies, at their first entering upon their charge, informing them of the defects and oversights of their predecessors ; and, after the determination of their commands, and return into England, informing the state here, and those enemies they usually contracted in that time, of whatsoever they had done, or suffered to be done, amiss ; whereby they either suffered disgrace, or damage, as soon as they were recalled from those honours. " And in this manner he began with his own master, the lord Chichester ; and continued the same arts upon the lord Grandison, and the lord Falkland, who succeeded ; and, upon that score, procured admission and trust with the earl of Strafford, upon his first admission to that government : so that this dilemma seemed unquestionable, that either the deputy of Ireland must destroy my lord Mountnorris, whilst he continued in his office, or my lord Mountnorris must destroy the deputy, as soon as his commission was determined, which usually lasted not above six years." And upon this consideration, besides that his no virtue made him unpitied, many looked with less concernedness upon that act, than the matter itself in the logic of it deserved.

The case of the lord chancellor seemed, to common understandings, an act of less violence, because it concerned not life ; and had some show of formality at least, if not regularity in the proceeding ; and that which was amiss in it took its growth from a nobler root than the other, by how much love is a more honourable passion than revenge. The endeavour was, to compel the lord chancellor to settle more of his land, and in another manner, upon his eldest son, than he had a mind to, and than he could legally be compelled to do : this the earl, upon a paper petition preferred to him by the wife of that son, (a lady, of whom the earl had so great a value and esteem, that made his justice the more suspected,) pressed, and in the end ordered him to do. The chancellor refused ; was committed to prison ; and shortly after, the great seal taken from him, which he had kept with great reputation of ability for the space of above twenty years. In the pressing this charge, many things of levity, as certain letters of great affection and familiarity from the earl to that lady, which were found in her cabinet after her death, for she was lately dead ; others of passion, were exposed to the public view ; to procure prejudice rather to his gravity and discretion, than that they were in any degree material to the business.

The earl said little more to it, than " that he hoped, what passion soever, or what injustice soever, might be found in that proceeding, and sentence, there would be no treason : and that, for his part, he had yet reason to believe, what he had done was very just ; since it had been reviewed by his majesty, and his privy-council here, upon an appeal from the lord viscount Ely, " (the degraded lord chancellor,) and upon a solemn hearing there, which took up many days, it had received a confirmation."

But the truth is, that rather accused the earl of an excess of power, than absolved him of injustice ; for most men, that weighed the whole matter, believed it to be a high act of oppression, and not to be without a mixture of that policy, which was spoken of before in the case of the lord Mountnorris : for the chancellor, being a person of great experience, subtilty, and prudence, had been always very severe to departed deputies ; and not over agreeable, nor in any degree submissive, to their full power ; and taking himself to be the second person of the kingdom, during his life, thought himself little less than equal to the first, who could naturally hope but for a term of six years in that superiority : neither had he ever before met with the least check, that might make him suspect a diminution of his authority, dexterity, or interest.

That which was with most solemnity and expectation alleged against the earl, as the hinge upon which the treason was principally to hang, was a discourse of the earl's in the committee of state (which they called the cabinet council) upon the dissolution of the former parliament. Sir Harry Vane, the secretary of state, gave in evidence, " That the king at that time calling that committee to him, asked them, since he failed of the assistance and supply he expected by subsidies, what course he should now take ? that the earl of Strafford answered, Sir, you have now done your duty, and your subjects have failed in theirs ; and therefore you are absolved from the rules of government, and may supply yourself by extraordinary ways ; you must prosecute the war vigorously ; you have an army in Ireland, with which you may reduce this kingdom."

The earl of Northumberland being examined, for the confirmation of this proof, remembered only, " that the earl had said, You have done your duty,

"and are now absolved from the rules of government;" but not a word of the army in Ireland, or reducing this kingdom. The lord marquis Hamilton, the lord bishop of London, and the lord Cottington, being likewise examined, answered upon their oaths, "that they heard none of those words spoken by the earl." And these were the only persons present at that debate, save only the archbishop of Canterbury, and Secretary Windbank, neither of which could be examined, or would be believed.

The earl positively denied the words; alleged "much animosity to be in sir Harry Vane towards him;" and observed, "that not one of the other witnesses, who were likewise present, and as like to remember what was spoken as the secretary, heard one word of the Irish army, or reducing this kingdom: that, if he had spoken those words, it could not be understood to be spoken of England, but of Scotland, of which the discourse was, and for which that army was known to be raised." He concluded, "that if the words were spoken by him, which he expressly denied, they were not treason; and if they were treason, that, by a statute made in Edward the Sixth's time, one witness was not sufficient to prove it, and that here was but one."

Seventeen days being spent in these skirmishes; the earl having defended himself with wonderful dexterity and ability, concluded, "that if the whole charge (in which he hoped he had given their lordships satisfaction of his loyalty and integrity, how great soever his infirmities were) was proved, that the whole made him not guilty of high treason; and to that purpose desired, that his learned counsel might be heard;" and most pathetically conjured their lordships, "that, for their own sakes, they would not, out of displeasure or disfavour towards his person, create a precedent to the prejudice of the peerage of England, and wound themselves through his sides;" which was good counsel; and hath been since (though too late) acknowledged to be so.

The next day, his counsel was heard in the same place to the matter of law. And here I cannot pass by an instance of as great animosity, and indirect prosecution, in that circumstance of assigning him counsel, as can be given. After the house of peers had assigned him such counsel as he desired, to assist him in matter of law, (which never was, or can justly be denied to the most scandalous felon, the most inhuman murderer, or the most infamous traitor,) the house of commons, upon some occasion, took notice of it with passion and dislike, somewhat unskilfully, "that such a thing should be done without their consent;" which was no more, than that the judge should be directed by the prosecutor, in what manner to proceed and determine: others, with much bitterness, inveighing against "the presumption of those lawyers, that durst be of counsel with a person accused by them of high treason;" and moving, "that they might be sent for, and proceeded against for that contempt:" whereas, they were not only obliged to it, by the honour and duty of their profession; but had been punishable for refusing to submit to the lords' orders. The matter was too gross to receive any public order, and so the debate ended; but served (and no doubt that was the intention) to let those gentlemen know, how warily they were to demean themselves, lest the anger of that terrible congregation should be kindled against them.

But truly I have not heard that it made any impression upon those persons; it did not, I am sure, upon Mr. Lane, who argued the matter of law for the earl. The matters which were by him principally insisted on, and averred with such confidence as a man uses who believes himself, were these:

"1. That by the wisdom and tenderness of parliaments, which knew that there could not be a greater snare for the subject, than to leave the nature of treason undefined and unlimited, all treasons were particularly mentioned and set down in the statute of the 25 Edw. III. de Proditionibus. That nothing is treason, but what is comprehended within that statute; all treasons before that statute, as killing the king's uncle, his nurse, piracy, and divers others, being restrained and taken away by the declaration of that act. And that no words or actions, in any of the articles of the earl of Strafford's charge, did amount to treason within that statute.

"2. That by reason of the clause in that statute, of declaring treason in parliament, divers actions were declared to be treasons in parliament, in the time of king Richard the Second, to the great prejudice of the subject: it was therefore specially provided, and enacted, by a statute in the first year of the reign of king Henry the Fourth, chapter the tenth, which is still in force, that nothing should be declared and adjudged treason, but what was ordained in that statute of the 25 Edw. III. by which statute, all power of declaring new treasons in parliament was taken away; and that no precedent of any such declaration in parliament can be shewed since that time: all new treasons, made by any act of parliament in the reign of king Henry the Eighth, being by the statute of the first year of queen Mary, chapter the first, taken away, and restrained by the 25th Edw. III. and likewise that, by another statute of the first year of queen Mary, chapter the tenth, all trials of treasons ought to be according to the rules of the common law, and not otherwise.

"3. That the foundation, upon which the impeachment was framed, was erroneous; for that (besides that it was confessed on all hands, that the laws of the kingdom were not subverted) an endeavour to subvert the fundamental laws and statutes of the realm, by force attempted, is not treason, being only made felony by the statute of the first year of queen Mary, chapter the twelfth; which is likewise expired. That cardinal Wolsey, in the thirty-third year of king Henry the Eighth, was indicted only of a premunire, for an endeavour to bring in the imperial laws into this kingdom. And that an endeavour, or intention, to levy war, was made treason, only by a statute of the 13th Elizabeth, (a time very inquisitive for treason,) which expired with her life.

"4. Lastly, that if any thing was alleged against the earl which might be penal to him, that it was not sufficiently and legally proved; for that by the statute of the first year of king Edward the Sixth, chapter the twelfth, no man ought to be arraigned, indicted, or condemned, of any treason, unless it be upon the testimony of two lawful and sufficient witnesses, produced in the presence of the party accused; unless the party confess the "same : and if it be for words, within three months after the same spoken, if the party be within the kingdom : whereas there was in this case only one witness, sir Henry Vane, and the words spoken six months before."

The case being thus stated on the earl's behalf, the judgment of the lords, in whom the sole power of judicature was conceived to be, was by all men expected ; the house of commons having declared, "that they intended not to make any reply to the argument of law made by Mr. Lane, it being below their dignity to contend with a private lawyer." Indeed they had a more convincing way to proceed by ; for the next day after that argument, sir Arthur Haslerig, brother-in-law to the lord Brooke, and an absurd, bold man, brought up by Mr. Pym, and so employed by that party to make any attempt, preferred a bill in the house of commons, "for the attainder of the earl of Strafford of high treason : " it being observed, that by what the earl had said for himself in the matter of fact and in matter of prudence, of the consequence of such an extraordinary proceeding ; and by what had been said for him in the point of law ; most sober men, who had been, and still were, full enough of dislike and passion against the earl, were not at all satisfied in the justice of the impeachment, or in the manner of the prosecution ; and therefore, that the house of peers, which consisted of near one hundred and twenty, besides the bishops, and of whom fourscore had been constantly attending the trial, were not like to take upon them the burden of such a judgment as was expected.

The bill was received with wonderful alacrity, and immediately read the first and the second time, and so committed ; which was not usual in parliaments, except in matters of great concernment and conveniency in the particular ; or of little importance or moment to the general. Those who at first consented, upon slight information, to his impeachment, upon no other reason, but (as hath been said before) because they were only to accuse, and the lords to judge, and so thought to be troubled no more with it, being now as ready to judge, as they had been to accuse, finding some new reasons to satisfy themselves, of which one was, "They had gone too far to sit still, or retire."

A day or two before the bill of attainder was brought into the house of commons, there was a very remarkable passage, of which the pretence was, "to make one witness, with divers circumstances, as good as two ;" though I believe it was directed in truth to an end very foreign to that which was proposed. The words of the earl of Strafford, by which "his endeavour to alter the frame of government, and his intention to levy war," should principally appear, were proved singly by sir Henry Vane ; which had been often averred, and promised, should be proved by several witnesses ; and the law was clear, "that less than two witnesses ought not to be received in case of treason."

To make this single testimony appear as sufficient as if it had been confirmed by more, Mr. Pym informed the house of commons, "of the grounds upon which he first advised that charge, and was satisfied that he should sufficiently prove it. That some months before the beginning of this parliament, he had visited young sir Henry Vane, eldest son to the secretary, who was then newly recovered from an ague ; that being together,

"and condoling the sad condition of the kingdom, by reason of the many illegal taxes and pressures, sir Harry told him, if he would call upon him the next day, he would shew him some- what that would give him much trouble, and inform him what counsels were like to be followed to the ruin of the kingdom ; for that he had, in perusal of some of his father's papers, accidentally met with the result of the cabinet council upon the dissolution of the last parliament, which comprehended the resolutions then taken.

"The next day he shewed him a little paper of the secretary's own writing ; in which was contained the day of the month, and the results of several discourses made by several counsellors ; with several hieroglyphics, which sufficiently expressed the persons by whom those discourses were made. The matter was of so transcendent a nature, and the counsel so prodigious, with reference to the commonwealth, that he desired he might take a copy of it ; which the young gentleman would by no means consent to, fearing it might prove prejudicial to his father. But when Mr. Pym informed him, that it was of extreme consequence to the kingdom, and that a time might probably come, when the discovery of this might be a sovereign means to preserve both church and state, he was contented that Mr. Pym should take a copy of it ; which he did, in the presence of sir Henry Vane ; and having examined it together, delivered the original again to sir Henry. He said that he had carefully kept this copy by him, without communicating the same to any body, till the beginning of this parliament, which was the time he conceived fit to make use of it ; and that then, meeting with many other instances of the earl's disposition to the kingdom, it satisfied him to move whatsoever he had moved, against that great person."

And having said thus much, he read the paper in his hand ; in which the day of the month was set down, and his majesty to be present, and stating the question to be, "What was now to be done ? since the parliament had refused to give subsidies for the supply of the war against Scotland." There were then written two LL's and a t over, and an l and an r, which was urged, "could signify nothing but lord lieutenant of Ireland ;" and the words written and applied to that name were, "Absolved from rules of government ; — Prosecute the war vigorously ; — An army in Ireland to subdue this kingdom ;" which was urged, "to comprehend the matter of the earl's speech and advice : " that paper by fractions of words (without mentioning any formed speech) containing only the results of the several counsellors' advice. Before those letters which were ordered to signify the lieutenant of Ireland, were an A.B.C.G. which might be understood to signify, the archbishop of Canterbury his grace ; and at those letters, some short, sharp expressions against parliaments, and thereupon fierce advice to the king. Next in the paper, was an M with an r over, and an Ho, which were to be understood for marquis Hamilton, who was master of the horse ; and the words annexed thereunto seemed to be rough, but without a supplement signified nothing. Then there was an L, an H, and an A, which must be interpreted lord high admiral, which was the earl of Northumberland ; and from that hieroglyphic proceeded only a few words, which implied advice to the king, "to be advised by his parliament." Then there was L<sup>d</sup> Cott. (which would easily be believed to signify the lord Cottington) with some expressions as sharp as those applied to the lieutenant of Ireland.

When he had read this paper, he added ; " That though there was but one witness directly in the point, sir Henry Vane the secretary, whose handwriting that paper was, whereof this was a copy ; yet he conceived, those circumstances of his and young sir Henry Vane's having seen those original results, and being ready to swear, that the paper read by him was a true copy of the other, might reasonably amount to the validity of another witness : and that it was no wonder, that the other persons mentioned in that writing, who had given as bad counsel, would not remember, for their own sakes, what had passed in that conference ; and that the earl of Northumberland (who was the only good counsellor in the pack) had remembered some of the words, of a high nature, though he had forgotten the other."

When Mr. Pym had ended, young sir Harry Vane rose, in some seeming disorder ; confessed all that the other had said ; and added, " That his father being in the north with the king the summer before, had sent up his keys to his secretary, then at Whitehall ; and had written to him (his son) that he should take from him those keys, which opened his boxes where his writings and evidences of his land were, to the end that he might cause an assurance to be perfected which concerned his wife ; and that he having perused those evidences, and despatched what depended thereupon, had the curiosity to desire to see what was in a red velvet cabinet which stood with the other boxes ; and thereupon required the key of that cabinet from the secretary, as if he still wanted somewhat towards the business his father had directed ; and so having gotten that key, he found, amongst other papers, that mentioned by Mr. Pym, which made that impression in him, that he thought himself bound in conscience to communicate it to some person of better judgment than himself, who might be more able to prevent the mischiefs that were threatened therein ; and so shewed it to Mr. Pym ; and being confirmed by him, that the seasonable discovery thereof might do no less than preserve the kingdom, had consented that he should take a copy thereof ; which to his knowledge he had faithfully done : and thereupon had laid the original in its proper place again, in the red velvet cabinet. He said, he knew this discovery would prove little less than his ruin in the good opinion of his father ; but having been provoked by the tenderness of his conscience towards his common parent, his country, to trespass against his natural father, he hoped he should find compassion from that house, though he had little hopes of pardon elsewhere."

The son no sooner sat down, than the father (who, without any counterfeiting, had a natural appearance of sternness) rose, with a pretty confusion, and said, " That the ground of his misfortune was now discovered to him ; that he had been much amazed, when he found himself pressed by such interrogatories, as made him suspect some discovery to be made, by some person as conversant in the counsels as himself : but he " was now satisfied to whom he owed his misfortunes ; in which, he was sure, the guilty person should bear his share. That it was true, being in the north with the king ; and that unfortunate son of his having married a virtuous gentlewoman, (daughter to a worthy member then present,) to whom there was somewhat in justice and honour due, which was not sufficiently settled ; he had sent his keys to his secretary ; not well knowing in what box the material writings lay ; and directed him to suffer his son to look after those evidences which were necessary : that by this occasion, it seemed, those papers had been examined and perused, which had begot much of this trouble. That for his part, after the summons of this parliament, and the king's return to London, he had acquainted his majesty, that he had many papers remaining in his hands, of such transactions as were not like to be of further use ; and therefore, if his majesty pleased, he would burn them, lest by any accident they might come into hands that might make an ill use of them : to which his majesty consenting, he had burned many ; and amongst them, the original results of those debates, of which that which was read was pretended to be a copy : that to the particulars he could say nothing more, than what he had upon his examination expressed, which was exactly true, and he would not deny ; though by what he had heard that afternoon (with which he was surprised and amazed) he found himself in an ill condition upon that testimony."

This scene was so well acted, with such passion and gestures, between the father and the son, that many speeches were made in commendation of the conscience, integrity, and merit of the young man, and a motion made, " that the father might be enjoined by the house to be friends with his son : " but for some time there was, in public, a great distance observed between them.

Many men wondered very much at the unnecessary relation of this story ; which would visibly appear very ridiculous to the world, and could not but inevitably produce much scandal and inconvenience to the father, and the son ; who were too wise to believe, that those circumstances would add any thing to the credit of the former single testimony : neither was there ever after any mention of it in public, to move the judgment of those, who were concerned to be satisfied in what they were to do : and therefore some, who observed the stratagems used by that party to compass their own private ends, believed that this occasion was taken to publish those results, only to give the lord Cottington notice in what danger he was, that so he might wisely quit his mastership of the wards to the lord Say ; who expected it, and might be able, by that obligation, to protect him from farther prosecution : and so that they meant to sacrifice the reputation of the secretary to the ambition of the lord Say. But without doubt (though this last consideration was very powerful with them) the true reason of the communication of this passage was, that they found it would be impossible to conceal their having received the principal information from the secretary, for their whole prosecution ; by reason some of the committee, who were intrusted to prepare the charge against the earl of Strafford, and consequently were privy to that secret, were fallen from them ; at least from their ends ; and therefore they thought fit to publish this history of their intelligence, that it might be rather imputed to the conscience and curiosity of the son, than to the malice and perjury of the father.

The bill of attainder in few days passed the house of commons ; though some lawyers, of great and known learning, declared, "that there was no ground or colour in law, to judge him guilty of high treason : " and the lord Digby (who had been, from the beginning, of that committee for the prosecution, and had much more prejudice than kindness to the earl) in a very pathetic speech declared, "that he could not give his consent to the bill ; not only, for that he was unsatisfied in the matter of law, but, for that he was more unsatisfied in the matter of fact ; those words, upon which the impeachment was principally grounded, being so far from being proved by two witnesses, that he could not acknowledge it to be by one ; since he could not admit sir Harry Vane to be a competent witness, who being first examined, denied that the earl spake those words ; and upon his second examination, remembered some ; and at his third the rest of the words : " and thereupon related many circumstances, and made many sharp observations upon what had passed ; which none but one of the committee could have done : for which he was presently after questioned in the house ; but made his defence so well, and so much to the disadvantage of those who were concerned, that from that time they prosecuted him with an implacable rage and uncharitableness upon all occasions. The bill passed with only fifty-nine dissenting voices, there being near two hundred in the house ; and was immediately sent up to the lords, with this addition, "that the commons would be ready the next day in Westminster-hall, to give their lordships satisfaction in the matter of law, upon what had passed at the trial."

The earl was then again brought to the bar ; the lords sitting as before, in their robes ; and the commons as they had done ; amongst them, Mr. Saint-John, (whom his majesty had made his solicitor general since the beginning of parliament,) from his place, argued for the space of near an hour the matter of law. Of the argument itself I shall say little, it being in print, and in many hands ; I shall only remember two notable propositions, which are sufficient characters of the person and the time. Lest what had been said on the earl's behalf, in point of law, and upon the want of proof, should have made any impression in their lordships, he averred, "That, in that way of bill, private satisfaction to each man's conscience was sufficient, although no evidence had been given in at all : " and as to the pressing the law, he said, " It was true, we give law to hares and deer, because they be beasts of chase ; but it was never accounted either cruelty, or foul play, to knock foxes and wolves on the head as they can be found, because they be beasts of prey." In a word, the law and the humanity were alike ; the one being more fallacious, and the other more barbarous, than in any age had been vented in such an auditory.

The same day, as a better argument to the lords speedily to pass the bill, the nine and fifty members of the house of commons, who (as is said before) had dissented from that act, had their names written in pieces of parchment or paper, under this superscription, STRAFFORDIANS, or enemies to their country ; and those papers fixed upon posts, and other the most visible places about the city ; which was as great and destructive a violation of the privileges and freedom of parliament, as can be imagined : yet, being complained of in the house, not the least countenance was given to the complaint, or the least care taken for the discovery.

The persons, who had still the conduct of the designs, began to find, that their friends abroad (of whose help they had still great need, for the getting petitions to be brought to the house ; and for all tumultuous appearances in the city ; and negotiations with the common council) were not at all satisfied with them, for their want of zeal in the matter of religion ; and, though they had branded as many of the bishops, and others of the prelatical party, as had come in their way ; and received all petitions against the church with encouragement : yet, that there was nothing done, or visibly in projection to be done, towards lessening their jurisdiction ; or indulging any of that liberty to their weak brethren, which they had from the beginning expected from them. And then, the discourse of their ambition, and hopes of preferment at court, was grown public, and raised much jealousy of them.

But the truth is, they who had made in their hearts the most destructive vows against the church, never durst communicate their bloody wishes to their best friends, whose authority gave them their greatest credit. For besides that their own clergy, whose hands they produced in great numbers to complaints against the innovations, which had (as they said) been introduced ; and against the ceremonies, which had been in constant practice since the reformation, as well as before ; were far from being of one mind in the matter or manner of what they wished should be altered ; as appeared whenever they appeared before the house, or a committee, when any of them were asked questions they did not expect ; there was less consent amongst their lay-friends, in ecclesiastical affairs, than amongst the other.

The earl of Bedford had no desire that there should be any alteration in the government of the church ; and had always lived towards my lord of Canterbury himself with all respect and reverence, and frequently visited and dined with him ; subscribed liberally to the repair of St. Paul's church, and seconded all pious undertakings : though, it is true, he did not discountenance notoriously those of the clergy who were unconformable.

The earl of Essex was rather displeased with the person of the archbishop, and some other bishops, than indevoted to the function ; and towards some of them he had great reverence and kindness, as bishop Moreton, bishop Hall, and some other of the less formal and more popular prelates : and he was as much devoted as any man to the Book of Common Prayer, and obliged all his servants to be constantly present with him at it ; his household chaplain being always a most conformable man, and a good scholar.

In truth, in the house of peers there were only at that time taken notice of, the lords Say and Brooke, and they believed to be positive enemies to the whole fabric of the church, and to desire a dissolution of that government ; the earl of Warwick himself having never discovered any aversion to episcopacy, and much professed the contrary.

In the house of commons, though of the chief leaders, Nathaniel Fiennes, and young sir Harry Vane, and shortly after Mr. Hamden (who had not before owned it) were believed to be for root and branch; which grew shortly after a common expression, and discovery of the several tempers: yet Mr. Pym was not of that mind, nor Mr. Hollis, nor any of the northern men, or those lawyers who drove on most furiously with them: all who were pleased with the government itself of the church.

The first design that was entertained against the church; and which was received in the house of commons with a visible countenance and approbation of many, who were neither of the same principles or purpose; was a short bill that was brought in, "to take away the bishops' votes in parliament; and to leave them out in all commissions of the peace, and with relation to any temporal affairs." This was contrived, with great deliberation and preparation, to dispose men to consent to it: and to this many of the house of peers were much disposed; and amongst them, none more than the earl of Essex, and all the popular lords; who observed, "that they seldom carried any thing which directly opposed the king's interest, by [reason of] the number of the bishops, who, for the most part, unanimously concurred against it, and opposed many of their other designs: and they believed that it could do the church no harm, by the bishops having fewer diversions from their spiritual charges."

In the house of commons, they used that, and other arguments, to remove the prejudice from it; and, as there were many who were persuaded, that the passing that bill would be no prejudice; and were as unwilling, that the bishops should be justices of peace, and in any other secular commissions, as the lords were that they should not sit with them: so they prevailed with others, who heartily desired that there might be no such diminution of their honour and authority, by persuading them, "That there was so great a concurrence towards the passing this bill; and so great a combination throughout the nation against the whole government of the church, and a resolution to destroy it absolutely: in which the Scots were so resolutely engaged, that they discoursed in all companies, that it was impossible for a firm peace to be preserved between the nations, if bishops were not taken away; and that the army would never march out of the kingdom, till that were brought to pass: but that if this bill were once passed, a greater number in both houses would be so well satisfied, that the violent party would be never able to prosecute their desires." And this reason did prevail over many men of excellent judgments, and unquestionable affections; who did in truth at that time believe, "that the passing this act was the only expedient to preserve the church:" insomuch, as when it was brought into the house, it found a better reception than was expected; and some men, who, others thought, would have opposed it, spake on its behalf, expressing their desire "that it might pass."

There was a difference in opinion in this debate, between two persons, who had been never known to differ in the house, and the entire friendship they had for each other was very remarkable; which administered much pleasure to very many who loved neither of them. When the bill was put to the question, Mr. Hyde (who was from the beginning known to be an enemy to it) spake very earnestly "for the throwing it out;" said, "It was changing the whole frame and constitution of the kingdom, and of the parliament itself: that, from the time that parliaments began, there had never been one parliament, when the bishops were not part of it: that if they were taken out of the house, there would be but two estates left; for that they as the clergy were the third estate, and being taken away, there was nobody left to represent the clergy: which would introduce another piece of injustice, which no other part of the kingdom could complain of, who were all represented in parliament, and were therefore bound to submit to all that was enacted, because it was upon the matter with their own consent: whereas, if the bishops were taken from sitting in the house of peers, there was nobody who could pretend to represent the clergy; and yet they must be bound by their determinations."

When he had done, the lord Falkland, who always sat next to him, (which was so much taken notice of, that, if they came not into the house together, as usually they did, every body left the place for him that was absent,) suddenly stood up, and declared himself "to be of another opinion; and that, as he thought the thing itself to be absolutely necessary for the benefit of the church, which was in so great danger; so he had never heard, that the constitution of the kingdom would be violated by the passing that act; and that he had heard many of the clergy protest, that they could not acknowledge that they were represented by the bishops. However we might presume, that if they could make that appear, that they were a third estate, that the house of peers (amongst whom they sat, and had yet their votes) would reject it." And so, with some facetiousness, answering some other particulars, concluded, "for the passing the act."

The house was so marvellously delighted, to see the two inseparable friends divided in so important a point, that they could not contain from a kind of rejoicing; and the more, because they saw Mr. Hyde was much surprised with the contradiction; as in truth he was; having never discovered the least inclination in the other towards such a compliance: and therefore they entertained an imagination and hope that they might work the lord Falkland to a farther concurrence with them. But they quickly found themselves disappointed; and that, as there was not the least interruption of close friendship between the other two; so, when the same argument came again into debate, about six months after, the lord Falkland changed his opinion, and gave them all the opposition he could: nor was he reserved in acknowledging, "that he had been deceived, and by whom;" and confessed to his friends, with whom he would deal freely, "that Mr. Hamden had assured him, that if that bill might pass, there would be nothing more attempted to the prejudice of the church:" which he thought, as the world then went, would be no ill composition.

This bill, for taking away the bishops' votes out of the house of peers, produced another discovery, which cast the conductors farther behind, than they were advanced by their conquest amongst the commons; and disquieted them much more, than the other had exalted them. How currently soever it had passed in the lower house; when it was brought to the upper, the lords gave it not so gracious a reception as was expected: many of the greatest men of that house grew weary of the empire which the others had exercised over them; and some, who had gone with them, upon their observation that they had worse designs than they owned, fell from them, and took the opportunity to discover themselves, upon the debate of this bill; against which they inveighed with great sharpness; and blamed the house of commons, "for presuming to meddle with an affair, that so immediately concerned them: that if they might send up a bill this day, at once to take out one whole bench from the house, as this would do the bishops, they might to-morrow send another, to take away the barons, or some other degree of the nobility:" with many more arguments, as the nature of the thing would easily administer; with such warmth and vigour as they had not before expressed: insomuch as, though the other party, which had not hitherto been withstood, set up their rest upon the carrying it; supplying their other arguments with that, "How much the house of commons, which best knew the temper and expectation of the nation, would resent their not concurring with them in a remedy they judged so necessary; and what the consequence might be, of such a breach between the two houses, they trembled to think; since the kingdom had no hope of being preserved but by their union, and the effects of their wisdom, in removing all things, and all persons, out of the way, which were like to obstruct such a thorough reformation, as the kingdom needs and expects;" all which prevailed so little, that the house could not be prevailed with, so much as to commit the bill, (a countenance they frequently give to bills they never intend to pass,) but at the second reading it, they utterly cast it out.

This unexpected and unimagined act cast such a damp upon the spirits of the governing party in both houses, that they knew not what to do: the mischiefs which were in view, by this discovery of the temper of the house of peers, had no bottom; they were not now sure, that they should be able to carry any thing; for the major part, which threw out this bill, might cross them in any thing they went about: besides the influence it would have in the house of commons, and every where else; for they very well knew, how many of their followers therefore followed them, because they believed they would carry all before them.

However, that their spirits might not be thought to fail, they made haste to proceed in all the angry and choleric things before them: to the trial of the earl of Strafford; impeaching several bishops for innovations, and the like; the house of commons being very diligent to kindle those fires which might warm the peers: and that the bishops might see how little they had gotten, by obstructing the other bill, they prepared a very short bill, "for the utter eradication of bishops, deans, and chapters; with all chancellors, officials, and all officers, and other persons belonging to either of them:" which they prevailed with sir Edward Deering, a man very opposite to all their designs, (but a man of levity and vanity; easily flattered, by being commended,) who presented it to the house from the gallery, with the two verses in Ovid, the application whereof was his greatest motive;

*Cuncta prius tentanda, sed immedicabile vulnus
Ense recidendum est, ne pars sincera trahatur.*

He took notice "of the great moderation and candour of the house, in applying so gentle a remedy, by the late bill, to retrench the exorbitances of the clergy: hoping that the pruning and taking off a few unnecessary branches from the trunk, the tree might prosper the better; that this mortification might have mended their constitution, and that they would the more carefully have intended their health: but that this soft remedy had proved so ineffectual, that they were grown more obstinate and incorrigible; so that it was now necessary to put the axe to the root of the tree;" and thereupon desired, "that the bill might be read."

As soon as the title of it was read, (which was almost as long as the bill itself,) Mr. Hyde moved with great warmth, "that the bill might not be read: that it was against the custom and rule of parliament, that any private person should take upon him (without having first obtained the leave and direction of the house) to bring in a new act, so much as to abrogate and abolish any old single law; and therefore, that it was a wonderful presumption in that gentleman, without any communication of his purpose, or so much as a motion that he might do it, to bring in a bill, that overthrew and repealed so many acts of parliament, and changed and confounded the whole frame of the government of the kingdom:" and therefore desired, "that it might be rejected." The gentleman who brought it in made many excuses "of his ignorance in the customs of parliament, having never before served in any;" and acknowledged, "that he had never read more than the title of the bill; and was prevailed with by his neighbour who sat next to him (who was sir Arthur Haslerig) to deliver it;" which he saw would have been done by somebody else. Though the rejecting it was earnestly urged by very many; and ought, by the rules of parliament, to have been done; yet, all the other people as violently pressed the reading it; and none so importunately as Saint-John, who was now the king's solicitor (who in truth had drawn it:) he said, "nobody could judge of a bill by the title, which might be false; and this bill, for aught any man knew to the contrary, at least, for aught he and many others knew, might contain the establishing the bishops, and granting other immunities to the church; instead of pursuing the matter of the title:" and others, as uningeniously declaring, "that our orders are in our own power, and to be altered, or dispensed with, as we see cause:" many out of curiosity desiring to hear it read; and more to shew the lords that they would not abate their mettle; upon their declaring their pleasure, the bill was at last read; and no question being to be put, upon the first reading, it was laid by, and not called upon in a long time after; many men being really persuaded, that there was no intention to pursue it; and that it was only brought in, to manifest a neglect towards the lords.

When the house grew entangled in multiplicity of business and despatches now, the northern gentlemen, at least they who were most active, and had most credit, (as Hotham, and Cholmely, and Stapleton,) were marvellously solicitous to despatch the commitment of [the bill "for taking away] the court of York;" and having after great debate, and hearing what all parties interested could offer, gotten the committee to vote, "That it was an illegal commission, and very prejudicial to the liberty and the property of his majesty's subjects of those four northern counties, where that jurisdiction was exercised;" they called upon Mr. Hyde (the chairman) to make the report: and the house having concurred in, and confirmed, the same vote; they appointed him "to prepare himself to deliver the opinion of the house (they having confirmed the vote of the committee) at a conference with the house of peers, and to desire their concurrence in it; and that they would thereupon be suitors to the king, that there might be no more commissions of that kind granted:" for they had a great apprehension, that either upon the earl of Strafford's resignation, or his death, (which they resolved should be very shortly,) they should have a new president put over them.

Mr. Hyde, at the conference in the painted chamber, (being appointed by the house to manage it,) told the lords, "that the four northern counties were suitors to their lordships, that they might not be distinguished from the rest of his majesty's subjects, in the administration of his justice, and receiving the fruits thereof; that they only were left to the arbitrary power of a president and council, which every day procured new authority and power to oppress them:" he told them, that till "[the thirty-first] year of king Harry the Eighth, the administration of justice was the same in the north, as in the west, or other parts of the realm; that about that time there was some insurrection in that country, which produced great disorders and bloodshed, which spread itself to the very borders of Scotland: whereupon that king issued out a commission to the archbishop of York, and the principal gentlemen of those counties, and some learned lawyers, to examine the grounds of all those disorders, and to proceed against the malefactors with all severity, according to the laws of the land." He read that first commission to them; which appeared to be no other, than a bare commission ofoyer and terminer. "It was found that this commission did much good, and therefore it was kept on foot for some time longer than such commissions use to be; and it was often renewed after, but still in the same form, or very little alteration, till queen Elizabeth's time; and then there was some alteration in the commission itself; besides that, it had reference to instructions, which contained matters of state upon some emergent occasions: there were more and greater alterations, both in the commission and instructions, in the time of king James, when the lord Scroop was president; and that, when the lord Strafford was first made president, they were more enlarged; and yet he had procured new additions to be made twice after." The instructions of the several times were read; and the alterations observed; and some precedents very pertinently and smartly urged; in which it appeared, that great men had been very severely sentenced, in no less penalty than of a premunire, for procuring and executing such commissions:

and concluded with "desiring the lords to concur in the same sense, the house of commons had expressed themselves to be of, with reference to the commission and instructions."

The speech, and argument, had a wonderful approbation in both houses; where he got great credit by it: and the earl of Bath, who was to report it, and had no excellent or graceful pronunciation, came himself to Mr. Hyde, and "desired a copy of it, that he might not do him wrong in the house, by the report;" and having received it, it was read in the house, and by order entered, and the paper itself affixed to their Journal; where it still remains; and the house of peers fully concurred with the commons in their vote: so that there was not, in many years after, any attempt, or so much as mention of another commission.

And the northern men were so well pleased, that they resolved to move the house, "to give Mr. Hyde public thanks for the service he had done the house;" but the principal leaders diverted them from it, by saying, "that he had too much credit already, and needed not such an addition, as he behaved himself." However, those northern men themselves continued marvellously kind; and on his behalf, on all occasions, opposed any combination of the most powerful of them against him; of which somewhat will be said hereafter.

In the afternoon of the same day (when the conference had been in the painted chamber upon the court of York) Mr. Hyde going to a place called Piccadilly, (which was a fair house for entertainment and gaming, and handsome gravel walks with shade, and where were an upper and lower bowling-green, whither very many of the nobility, and gentry of the best quality, resorted, both for exercise and conversation,) as soon as ever he came into the ground, the earl of Bedford came to him; and after some short compliments upon what had passed in the morning, he told him, "He was glad he was come thither, for there was a friend of his in the lower ground, who needed his counsel." He then lamented "the misery the kingdom was like to fall into, by their own violence, and want of temper, in the prosecution of their own happiness." He said, "This business concerning the earl of Strafford was a rock, upon which we should all split, and that the passion of the parliament would destroy the kingdom: that the king was ready to do all they could desire, if the life of the earl of Strafford might be spared: that he was satisfied, that he had proceeded with more passion in many things, than he ought to have done, by which he had rendered himself useless to his service for the future; and therefore he was well contented, that he might be made incapable of any employment for the time to come; and that he should be banished, or imprisoned for his life, as they should choose: that if they would take his death upon them, by their own judicatory, he would not interpose any act of his own conscience: but since they had declined that way, and meant to proceed by an act of parliament, to which he himself must be a party, that it could not consist with his conscience, ever to give his royal assent to that act; because, having been present at the whole trial," (as he had been, in a box provided on purpose, incognito, though conspicuous enough,) "and heard all the testimony they had given against him, and he had heard nothing proved, by which he could

"believe that he was a traitor, either in fact or in intention: and therefore his majesty did most earnestly desire, that the two houses would not bring him a bill to pass, which in conscience he could not, and therefore would not consent."

The earl said; "Though he yet was satisfied so well in his own conscience, that he believed he should have no scruple in giving his own vote for the passing it," (for it yet depended in the lords' house,) "he knew not how the king could be pressed to do an act so contrary to his own conscience; and that, for his part, he took all the pains he could to persuade his friends to decline their violent prosecution, and to be contented with the remedy proposed by the king; which he thought might be rendered so secure, that there need remain no fears of that man's ever appearing again in business: and that how difficult a work soever he found it to be, he should not despair of it, if he could persuade the earl of Essex to comply; but that he found him so obstinate, that he could not in the least degree prevail with him; that he had left his brother, the earl of Hertford, (who was that day made a marquis,) in the lower ground, walking with him, who he knew would do all he could; and he desired Mr. Hyde to walk down into that place, and take his turn, to persuade him to what was reasonable;" which he was very willing to do.

He found the marquis and the earl walking there together, and no other persons there; and as soon as they saw him, they both came to him; and the marquis, after a short salutation, departed, and left the other two together; which he did purposely. The earl began merrily, in telling him, "That he had that morning performed a service, which he knew he did not intend to do; that by what he had said against the court of York, he had revived their indignation against the earl of Strafford; so that he now hoped, they should proceed in their bill against him with vigour, (whereas they had slept so long upon it,) which he said was the effect, of which he was sure he had no mind to be the cause." Mr. Hyde confessed, "he had indeed no such purpose; and hoped, that something he had said might put other thoughts into them, to proceed in another manner upon his crimes: that he knew well, that the cause of their having slept so long upon the bill, was their disagreement upon the point of treason, which the longer they thought of, would administer the more difficulties: but that, if they declined that, they should all agree, that there were crimes and misdemeanours evidently enough proved, to deserve so severe a censure, as would determine all the activity hereafter of the earl of Strafford, that might prove dangerous to the kingdom; or mischievous to any particular person, to whom he was not a friend."

He shook his head, and answered, "Stone-dead hath no fellow: that if he were judged guilty in a premunire, according to the precedents cited by him; or fined in any other way; and sentenced to be imprisoned during his life; the king would presently grant him his pardon and his estate, release all fines, and would likewise give him his liberty, as soon as he had a mind to receive his service; which would be as soon as the parliament should be ended." And when he was ready to reply to him, the earl told him familiarly, "that he had been tired that afternoon upon

"that argument, and therefore desired him to continue the discourse no longer then; assuring him, he would be ready to confer with him upon it at any other time."

And shortly after, Mr. Hyde took another opportunity to speak freely with him again concerning it, but found him upon his guard; and though he heard all the other would say, with great patience, yet he did not at all enlarge in his answers, but seemed fixed in his resolution; and when he was pressed, "how unjustifiable a thing it was, for any man to do any thing which his conscience informed him was sinful; that he knew him so well, that if he were not satisfied in his own conscience, of the guilt of the earl of Strafford, the king could never be able to oblige him to give his vote for that bill; and therefore he wondered, how he could urge the king to do an act which he declared to be so much against his conscience, that he neither could, nor would, ever give his royal assent to that bill;" to which he answered more at large, and with some commotion, (as if he were in truth possessed with that opinion himself,) "That the king was obliged in conscience to conform himself, and his own understanding, to the advice and conscience of his parliament:" which was a doctrine newly resolved by their divines, and of great use to them for the pursuing their future counsels.

Notwithstanding all this, the bill had not that warm reception in the house of peers, that was expected; but, after the first reading, rested many days; and being then read the second time, depended long at the committee; few men believing, upon consideration of the affections and parts of the several lords, that of the fourscore, who were present at the trial, above twenty would ever have consented to that act: besides, it was not believed, now the formal trial and way of judicature was waved, the bishops would so stupidly (to say no worse) exclude themselves from voting in a law which was to be an act of parliament.

But there happened about that time two accidents, which (though not then, or it may be since, taken notice of, as of any moment or relation to that business) contributed strangely to the passing that bill; and so to the fate of that great person. The first, a discovery of some meetings and discourses, between some persons of near relation to his majesty's service, and some officers of the army, about the high proceedings of the parliament; and of some expedients, that might reduce them to a better temper; which were no sooner intimated to some of the great managers, than the whole was formed and shaped into "a formidable and bloody design against the parliament." The second, the sudden death of the earl of Bedford. Of both which it will be necessary to say somewhat; that it may be observed, from how little accidents, and small circumstances, by the art and industry of those men, the greatest matters have flowed, towards the confusion we now labour under.

Some principal officers of the army, who were members of the house of commons, and had been caressed, both before and after the beginning of the parliament, by the most popular agents of both houses; and had in truth contributed more to their designs, than was agreeable to their duty, and the trust reposed in them by the king; found themselves now not so particularly considered as they expected, by that party; and their credit in other places, and particularly in the army, to be lessened : for that there was visibly much more care taken for the supply of the Scottish army, than of the king's ; insomuch, that sometimes money that was assigned and paid for the use of the king's army, was again taken away, and disposed to the other ; and yet, that the parliament much presumed, and depended, upon their interest in, and power to dispose, the affections of that army.

Therefore, to redeem what had been done amiss, and to ingratiate themselves to his majesty's favour, they bethought themselves how to dispose, or at least to pretend that they would dispose, the army to some such expressions of duty and loyalty towards the king, as might take away all hope from other men, that it might be applied to his disservice : and to that purpose, they had conference, and communication, with some servants of a more immediate trust and relation to both their majesties ; through whom they might convey their intentions and devotions to the king, and again receive his royal pleasure, and direction, how they should demean themselves. For aught I could ever observe, by what was afterwards reported in the house of commons ; or could learn from those who were conversant with all the secrets of that design ; there was never the least intention of working farther upon the affections of the army, than to preserve them from being corrupted, or made use of, for the imposing unjust or unreasonable things upon the king : and all that ever the king so much as consented should be done by them, was, that as most counties in England, or rather, the factious and seditious persons in most counties, had been induced to frame and subscribe petitions to the parliament, against the established government of the church, with other clauses, scandalous to the government of the state too ; [so] the officers of the army should subscribe this following petition ; which was brought ingrossed to his majesty for his approbation, before they would presume to recommend it to any for their subscription.

To the king's most excellent majesty ; the lords spiritual and temporal ; the knights, citizens, and burgesses, now assembled in the high court of parliament.

" The humble petition of the officers and soldiers of the army,

" Humbly sheweth, That although our wants have been very pressing, and the burden we are become unto these parts (by reason of those wants) very grievous unto us : yet so have we demeaned ourselves, that your majesty's great and weighty affairs, in this present parliament, have hitherto received no interruption, by any complaint, either from us, or against us ; a temper not usual in armies ; especially in one destitute not only of pay, but also of martial discipline, and many of its principal officers ; that we cannot but attribute it to a particular blessing of Almighty God, on our most hearty affections and zeal to the common good, in the happy success of this parliament ; to which, as we should have been ready hourly to contribute our dearest blood, so now that it hath pleased God to manifest his blessing so evidently therein, we cannot but acknowledge it with thankfulness ; as likewise his great mercy, in that he hath inclined your majesty's royal heart so to cooperate with the wisdom of the parliament, as to effect so

" great and happy a reformation upon the former distempers of this church and commonwealth : as first, in your majesty's gracious condescending to the many important demands of our neighbours of the Scottish nation ; secondly, in granting so free a course of justice against all delinquents of what quality soever ; thirdly, in the removal of all those grievances, wherewith the subjects did conceive either their liberty of persons, property, or estate, or freedom of conscience, prejudiced ; and lastly, in the greatest pledge of security that ever the subjects of England received from their sovereign, the bill of triennial parliament.

" These things so graciously accorded unto by your majesty, without bargain or compensation, as they are more than expectation or hope could extend unto, so now certainly they are such, as all loyal hearts ought to acquiesce in with thankfulness ; which we do with all humility, and do at this time, with as much earnestness as any, pray, and wish, that the kingdom may be settled in peace and quietness, and that all men may, at their own homes, enjoy the blessed fruits of your wisdom and justice.

" But it may please your excellent majesty, and this high court of parliament, to give us leave, with grief and anguish of heart, to represent unto you, that we hear that there are certain persons stirring and pragmatical, who, instead of rendering glory to God, thanks to your majesty, and acknowledgment to the parliament, remain yet as unsatisfied and mutinous as ever ; who, whilst all the rest of the kingdom are arrived even beyond their wishes, are daily forging new and unreasonable demands ; who, whilst all men of reason, loyalty, and moderation, are thinking how they may provide for your majesty's honour and plenty, in return of so many graces to the subject, are still attempting new diminutions of your majesty's just regalities, which must ever be no less dear to all honest men than our own freedoms ; in fine, men of such turbulent spirits, as are ready to sacrifice the honour and welfare of the whole kingdom to their private fancies, whom nothing else than a subversion of the whole frame of government will satisfy : far be it from our thoughts to believe, that the violence and unreasonableness of such kind of persons can have any influence upon the prudence and justice of the parliament. But that which begets the trouble and disquiet of our loyal hearts, at this present, is, that we hear those ill-affected persons are backed in their violence by the multitude and the power of raising tumults ; that thousands flock at their call, and beset the parliament, and Whitehall itself ; not only to the prejudice of that freedom which is necessary to great councils and judicatories, but possibly to some personal danger of your sacred majesty, and the peers.

" The vast consequence of these persons' malignity, and of the licentiousness of those multitudes that follow them, considered, in most deep care and zealous affection for the safety of your sacred majesty, and the parliament ; our humble petition is, that in your wisdom you would be pleased to remove such dangers, by punishing the ringleaders of these tumults, that your majesty and the parliament may be secured from such insolences hereafter. For the suppressing "of which, in all humility we offer ourselves to wait upon you, (if you please,) hoping we shall appear as considerable in the way of defence, to our gracious sovereign, the parliament, our religion, and the established laws of the kingdom, as what number soever shall audaciously presume to violate them: so shall we, by the wisdom of your majesty and the parliament, not only be vindicated from precedent innovations, but be secured from the future, that are threatened, and likely to produce more dangerous effects than the former.

"And we shall pray," &c.

His majesty having read this petition, and conceiving that the authority of the army might seem of as great importance for the good reception of so much reason and justice, as the subscription of a rabble had been alleged often to be, for the countenance of what in truth was mutinous and seditious, said, "that he approved well enough of it, and was content that it might be subscribed by the officers of the army, if they desired it." The officer, who presented the draught to his majesty, told him, that very few of the army had yet seen it: and that it would be a great countenance to it, if, when it was carried to the principal officers who were first to sign it, any evidence might be given to them, that it had passed his majesty's approbation; otherwise possibly they might make scruple for fear of offending him." Thereupon his majesty took a pen, and writ at the bottom of the petition C. R. as a token that he had perused and allowed it: and so the petition was carried down into the country where the army lay, and was signed by some officers; but was suddenly quashed, and no more heard of, till in the discovery of the plot: of which more in its place.

The meetings continuing, between those officers of the army and some servants of his majesty's, to the ends aforesaid; others of the army, who had expressed very brisk resolutions towards the service, and were of eminent command and authority with the soldier, were by special direction introduced into those councils (all persons obliging themselves by an oath of secrecy, not to communicate anything that should pass amongst them) for the better executing what should be agreed.

At the first meeting, the person that was so introduced, after he had heard the calm propositions of the rest, and that "their design was, only to observe and defend the laws, that neither the arguments of the Scots, nor the reputation of their army, might compel the king to consent to the alteration of the government of the church, nor to remove the bishops out of the house of peers, which would, in a great degree, produce an alteration; or the power of any discontented persons, by their tumultuary petitions, impose upon, or diminish, the just legal power of the king," told them, "Those resolutions would produce very little effects for his majesty's service; that there was but one way to do his majesty notable service, which was by bringing up the army presently to London, which would so awe the parliament, that they would do any thing the king commanded." There was not (as I have been credibly informed) a man in the company, that did not perfectly abhor (or seemed so to do) that odious proposition; but contented themselves with making such objections against it, as rendered it ridiculous and unpracticable; and so the meeting, for that time, dissolved.

Whether the person that proposed this desperate device, did it only as a bait, to draw an opinion from other men, (for he was of a perfect dislike and malice to some of the company,) or whether the disdain to see his counsel rejected, and the fear that it might be discovered to his disadvantage, wrought upon him, I know not; but the same, or the next day, he discovered all, and more than had passed, to some of those who seemed to take most care for the public; intimated to them, "how he was startled with the horror of the design, and how faithfully he resolved to serve the commonwealth, or to lose his life in the attempt:" yet at the same time acted his part at court, with all possible demonstration of abhorring the proceedings of the parliament, to that degree, that he offered "to undertake, with a crew of officers and good fellows, (who, he said, were at his disposal,) to rescue the earl of Strafford from the lieutenant of the Tower, as he should bring him to his trial, and so to enable him to make an escape into foreign parts."

The discovery being thus made, to the earl of Bedford, the lord Say, and the lord Kimbolton, and, no doubt, by them communicated to their chief associates; as dangerous as the design was afterwards alleged to be, it was not published in three months after to the houses, against whom the treason was intended; nor till long after the death of the earl of Bedford: who, no doubt, rather desired to bind up those wounds which were made, than to make them wider, by entertaining new jealousies between king and people; and would not consent to the extending and extorting conclusions, which did not naturally flow from the premises; without which, this so useful a treason to them could not have been made up.

But as they thought not fit (as I said before) to publish this whole discovery till near three months after, so they made extraordinary use of it by parts, from the instant that they received the secret; it being always their custom, when they found the heat and distemper of the house (which they endeavoured to keep up, by the sharp mention and remembrance of former grievances and pressures) in any degree allayed, by some gracious act, or gracious profession of the king, to warm and inflame them again with a discovery, or promise of a discovery, of some notable plot and conspiracy against themselves, "to dissolve the parliament by the papists;" or some other way, in which they would be sure that somewhat always should reflect upon the court. Thus they were sometimes informing "of great multitudes of papists gathering together in Lancashire;" then "of secret meetings in caves, and under ground in Surrey;" letters from beyond sea, of great provisions of "arms making there for the catholics of England;" and the like; which upon examination always vanished: but for the time (and they were always applied in useful articles of time) served to transport common minds with fears and apprehensions, and so induced them to comply in sense with those, who were like soonest to find remedies for those diseases which none but themselves could discover. And in this progress there sometimes happened strange accidents for the confirmation of their credit.

Whilst they were full of clamour against the papists, upon the instances of some insolences and indiscretions committed by them, during the late intervals of parliament, (and mentioned before,) especially upon a great alacrity expressed, and contribution raising, the year before, for advancing the war with Scotland; an order was made, "that the justices of peace of Westminster should carefully examine, what strangers were lodged within their jurisdiction; and that they should administer the oaths of allegiance and supremacy to all suspected for recusancy, and proceed according to those statutes." An afternoon being appointed for that service, in Westminster-hall, and many persons warned to appear there, amongst the rest one — James, a papist, appeared, and being pressed by Mr. Hayward, a justice of peace, to take the oaths, suddenly drew out his knife, and stabbed him; with some reproachful words "for his persecuting poor catholics." This strange, unheard of outrage, upon the person of a minister of justice executing his office by an order of parliament, startled all men; the old man sinking with the hurt, though he died not of it. And though, for aught I could ever hear, it proceeded only from the rage of a sullen varlet (formerly suspected to be crazed in his understanding) without the least confederacy or combination with any other; yet it was a great countenance to those, who were before thought over apprehensive and inquisitive into dangers; and made many believe it rather a design of all the papists of England, than a desperate act of one man, who could never have been induced to it, if he had not been promised assistance from the rest. — But to the point.

This discovery of the plot concerning the army being made about the middle of April, which was the end of the earl of Strafford's trial, they for the present made no farther use of it than might contribute to their ends in that business; reserving the rest (as was said before) to be applied in more necessary seasons: therefore, about the time that the bill of attainder was preferred, that no interposition from the court might discountenance or hinder that great work, Mr. Pym one day informed the house of commons, "that he had great cause to fear, there was at that time as desperate a design and conspiracy against the parliament, as had been in any age; and he was in doubt, persons of great quality and credit at court had their hands in it: that several officers had been treated with in London to raise men, under pretence that they should go for Portugal; but that the Portugal ambassador being conferred with about it, professed that he knew nothing of it: and that no person had any authority or promise from him to that purpose:" (and it is true, there had been some idle discourses in a tavern between some officers, about raising men for Portugal, which was immediately carried to Mr. Pym; as all tavern and ordinary discourses were:) "that, for the present, he might not acquaint them with other particulars, which might hinder their further discovery; only desired, that a message might be sent to the lords, to desire them to appoint a committee to examine such witnesses as should be produced, for the discovery of a plot against the parliament; and that in the meantime they would join in a message to the king to desire his majesty that he would not, for some few days, grant any pass to any of his servants

"to pass beyond the seas; saying, that he believed some men's consciences would tempt them to make an escape, when they heard of this examination."

Such a committee was appointed to examine, and such a message sent to his majesty, as was desired. But in the mean time, some persons who had been at the tavern, and talked of raising men for Portugal; and others who had been at the conference before mentioned, where the proposition was for bringing up the army; finding that what had passed so privately, and amongst them, had been discovered, and was like to pass a very severe inquisition, by them who made glosses and comments as they pleased, upon what other men spake or did; and not knowing how much more than the truth had been informed, or what interpretation should be made of that which was the truth; resolved not to trust themselves with such judges, (whose formality was first to imprison, and after, at their leisure, to examine,) and so fled into France.

This was no sooner known and published, than it gave great credit and reputation to Mr. Pym's vigilancy and activity; for it now appeared, there was some notable mischief intended, upon the discovery whereof, such eminent persons were fled. And in this disorder and trouble of mind, men fearing according as they were directed, the bill of attainder found the easier passage in the house of commons.

Having gotten this much ground; and the bill then depending (and like long to depend) with the lords; Mr. Pym told them in the house of commons, "that it appeared by the flight of such considerable persons, that what he had before imparted to them was of moment, and that his fears were not groundless; that it concerned their service, that he should not yet impart the whole matter to them, since the danger was prevented, which they should shortly understand at large: in the mean time, he did assure them, that God had miraculously preserved them from a most prodigious conspiracy, in which all their privileges and liberties should have been swallowed up: that though this attempt was discovered, yet he feared there might be some new device; and therefore he proposed, for the better evidence of their union and unanimity, (which would be the greatest discouragement to all who wished ill to them,) that some protestation might be entered into by the members of both houses, for the defence of their privileges, and the performance of those duties to God and the king, which they were obliged to, as good Christians and good subjects; and that a committee might be appointed speedily to withdraw, and prepare such a protestation."

The motion was entertained with a general approbation; inasmuch as they who were apprehensive enough of the ill designs of those who advanced this, and of the ill consequence of such voluntary protestations, thought fit rather to watch the matter and words, than to oppose the thing itself; which, it was evident, it was to no purpose to do: and therefore they were well contented with the naming such persons for the committee, as were not like to submit to any unlawful or inconvenient obligation. This was urged as of such consequence, that the doors were locked, and no persons suffered to go out of the house, till this should be concluded. After a long debate, these words were agreed upon, and offered to the house for the protestation.

"I A. B. do, in the presence of Almighty God, promise, vow, and protest, to maintain and defend, as far as lawfully I may, with my life, power, and estate, the true reformed protestant religion, expressed in the doctrine of the church of England, against all popery and popish innovations within this realm, contrary to the same doctrine: and, according to the duty of my allegiance, his majesty's royal person, honour, and estate; as also, the power and privileges of parliament; the lawful rights and liberties of the subject; and every person that maketh this protestation, in whatsoever he shall do in the lawful pursuance of the same: and to my power, and as far as lawfully I may, I will oppose, and, by all good ways and means, endeavour to bring to condign punishment, all such, as shall, either by force, practice, counsels, plots, conspiracies, or otherwise, do any thing to the contrary of any thing in this present protestation contained: and further, that I shall, in all just and honourable ways, endeavour to preserve the union and peace between the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland; and neither for hope, fear, nor other respect, shall relinquish this promise, vow, and protestation."

This was immediately taken by the speaker of the house of commons, and by all the members then present; and sent up to the lords, who all likewise took the same, except the earl of Southampton, and the lord Roberts, who positively refused it, alleging, "There was no law that enjoined it, and the consequence of such voluntary engagements might produce effects that were not then intended:" which without doubt was very wisely considered; and had not been pressed in the house of commons, for two reasons; it being visibly impossible to dissuade the thing, the house being awakened by the discourse, mentioned before, of a plot against the parliament, the poison of which, this sovereign antidote would expel and discover; but especially for that well-affected persons, who were jealous of no other design than the alteration of the government of the church, thought they had obliged those rigid reformers from any such attempt, when they had once bound themselves "to maintain and defend the protestant religion expressed in the doctrine of the church of England;" there being no other scheme of the doctrine of the church of England, than the thirty-nine Articles, of which one is, "to preserve the government of the church by bishops."

Whereas the other party was abundantly gratified with having an oath of their own making, to entangle the people, (so like a covenant, by which such admirable things had been compassed by their neighbours,) and upon which they could make what gloss they pleased, when they had occasion; as they did within two days after: for the protestation being taken on Monday the third of May, the Wednesday following some of their own party took occasion to inform the house, "that it was apprehended by many well-affected persons abroad, who were of notable and exemplary devotion to the parliament, that if they should take that protestation, they should thereby engage themselves for the defence of bishops, which in their

"conscience they could not do: and which they hoped the house did not intend to oblige them to:" whereupon, without any great opposition, (the house being thin; and they who were of another opinion, believing this artifice would, to all sober men, appear very ridiculous,) this ensuing order was made:

"Whereas some doubts have been raised, by several persons out of this house, concerning the meaning of these words contained in the protestation lately made by the members of this house, [viz. the true reformed protestant religion, expressed in the doctrine of the church of England, against all popery and popish innovations within this realm, contrary to the same doctrine,] this house doth declare, that by those words was and is meant, only the public doctrine professed in the said church, so far as it is opposite to popery and popish innovations; and that the said words are not to be extended to the maintaining of any form of worship, discipline, or government, nor of any rites, or ceremonies, of the said church of England."

This explanation being thus procured in the house of commons, without ever advising with the house of peers, (who had likewise taken the same protestation,) and, in truth, so contrary to the intentions of most that took it; they ordered, that the protestation, together with this explanation, should be printed and published; and that the knights and burgesses should send copies thereof to the counties and boroughs for which they served; and that they should intimate unto the people, with what willingness all the members of that house made that protestation; and that they should further signify, that as they did justify the taking it themselves, so they could not but approve it in all such as should take it." Upon which declaration, the emissaries of the clergy caused the same to be taken in London, and the parts adjacent, within very few days after the publishing thereof. And for their better encouragement (though their zeal would not attend such formalities) a bill was prepared, passed the house of commons, and was sent up to the lords, "to compel all the subjects to take that protestation." What the success of that bill was, and what use was afterwards made of this protestation, (which was then thought so harmless a thing,) and particularly, what influence it had upon the business of the earl of Strafford, shall be remembered in its proper place.

The other accident that fell out during the time that the business of the earl of Strafford was agitated, and by which he received much prejudice, was the death of the earl of Bedford. This lord was the greatest person of interest in all the popular party, being of the best estate, and best understanding, of the whole party; and therefore most like to govern the rest. He was besides of great civility, and of much more good-nature than any of the other. And therefore the king, resolving to do his business with that party by him, resolved to make him lord high treasurer of England, in the place of the bishop of London; who was as willing to lay down the office, as any body was to take it up. And to gratify him the more, at his desire, intended to make Mr. Pym chancellor of the exchequer, as he had done Mr. Saint-John his solicitor general; Mr. Hollis was to be secretary of state, the lord Say master of the wards, and the lord Kimbolton to be lord privy-seal after the death of his father, who then held that place. Others were to be placed about the prince, and to have offices when they fell.

The earl of Bedford secretly undertook to his majesty, that the earl of Strafford's life should be preserved; and to procure his revenue to be settled, as amply as any of his progenitors; the which he intended so really, that, to my knowledge, he had it in design to endeavour the setting up the excise in England, as the only natural means to advance the king's profit. He fell sick within a week after the bill of attainder was sent up to the lords' house; and died shortly after, much afflicted with the passion and fury which he perceived his party inclined to: insomuch as he declared, to some of near trust with him, "that he feared the rage and madness of this parliament would bring more prejudice and mischief to the kingdom, than it had ever sustained by the long intermission of parliaments." He was a wise man, and would have proposed and advised moderate courses; but was not incapable, for want of resolution, of being carried into violent ones, if his advice would not have been submitted to: and therefore many, who knew him well, thought his death not unseasonable, as well to his fame, as his fortune; and that it rescued him as well from some possible guilt, as from those visible misfortunes, which men of all conditions have since undergone.

As soon as the earl of Bedford was dead, the lord Say (hoping to receive the reward of the treasurer-ship) succeeded him in his undertaking, and faithfully promised the king, "that he should not be pressed in the matter of the earl of Strafford's life:" and under that promise got credit enough to persuade his majesty to whatsoever he told was necessary to that business. And thereupon, when the bill was depending with the lords, and when there was little suspicion that it would pass, though the house of commons every day by messages endeavoured to quicken them, he persuaded the king "to go to the house of peers, and, according to custom, to send for the house of commons, and then to declare himself, that he could not, with the safety of a good conscience, ever give his consent to the bill that was there depending before them concerning the earl of Strafford, if it should be brought to him, because he was not satisfied in the point of treason: but he was so fully satisfied that the earl was unfit ever to serve him more, in any condition of employment, that he would join with them in any act, to make him utterly incapable of ever bearing office, or having any other employment in any of his majesty's dominions; which he hoped would satisfy them."

This advice, upon the confidence of the giver, the king resolved to follow: but when his resolution was imparted to the earl, he immediately sent his brother to him, beseeching his majesty "by no means to take that way, for that he was most assured it would prove very pernicious to him; and therefore desired, he might depend upon the honour and conscience of the peers, without his majesty's interposition." The king told his brother, "that he had taken that resolution by the advice of his best friends; but since he liked [it] not, he would decline it." The next morning the lord Say came again to him, and finding his majesty altered in his intention, told him, "if he took that course he had advised him, he was

"sure it would prevail; but if he declined it, he could not promise his majesty what would be the issue, and should hold himself absolutely disengaged from any undertaking." The king observing his positiveness, and conceiving his intentions to be very sincere, suffered himself to be guided by him; and immediately went to the house, and said as the other had advised. Whether that lord did in truth believe the discovery of his majesty's conscience in that manner would produce the effect he foretold; or whether he advised it treacherously, to bring on those inconveniences which afterwards happened; I know not: but many, who believed his will to be much worse than his understanding, had the uncharitableness to believe, that he intended to betray his master, and to put the ruin of the earl out of question.

The event proved very fatal; for the king no sooner returned from the house, than the house of commons, in great passion and fury, declared this last act of his majesty's to be "the most unparalleled breach of privilege, that had ever happened; that if his majesty might take notice what bills were passing in either house, and declare his own opinion, it was to forejudge their counsels, and they should not be able to supply the commonwealth with wholesome laws, suitable to the diseases it laboured under; that this was the greatest obstruction of justice, that could be imagined; that they, and whosoever had taken the late protestation, were bound to maintain the privileges of parliament, which were now so grossly invaded and violated:" with many other sharp discourses to that purpose.

The next day great multitudes of people came down to Westminster, and crowded about the house of peers, exclaiming with great outcries, "that they would have justice;" and publicly reading the names of those who had dissented from that bill in the house of commons, as enemies to their country; and as any lord passed by, called, Justice, justice! and with great rudeness and insolence, pressing upon, and thrusting, those lords whom they suspected not to favour that bill; professing aloud, "that they would be governed and disposed by the honourable house of commons, and would defend their privileges according to their late protestation." This unheard of act of insolence and sedition continued so many days, till many lords grew so really apprehensive of having their brains beaten out, that they absented themselves from the house; and others, finding what seconds the house of commons was like to have to compass whatever they desired, changed their minds; and so in an afternoon, when of the fourscore who had been present at the trial, there were only six and forty lords in the house, (the good people still crying at the doors for justice,) they put the bill to the question, and eleven lords only dissenting, it passed that house, and was ready for the king's assent.

The king continued as resolved never to give his consent. The same oratory then attended him at Whitehall, which had prevailed at Westminster; and a rabble of many thousand people besieged that place, crying out, Justice, justice: that they would have justice: not without great and insolent threats and expressions, what they would do, if it were not speedily granted. The privy-council was called together, to advise what course was to be taken to suppress these traitorous riots. Instead of considering how to rescue their master's honour and his conscience from this infamous violence and constraint, they press the king to pass the bill of attainder, saying, "there was no other way to preserve himself and his posterity, than by so doing; and therefore that he ought to be more tender of the safety of the kingdom, than of any one person how innocent soever." not one counsellor interposing his opinion, to support his master's magnanimity and innocence: they who were of that mind, either suppressing their thoughts through fear, upon the new doctrine established then by the new counsellors, "that no man ought to presume to advise any thing in that place contrary to the sense of both houses;" others sadly believing, the force and violence offered to the king would be, before God and man, a just excuse for whatsoever he should do.

His majesty told them, "that what was proposed to him to do, was in a diameter contrary to his conscience, and that being so, he was sure they would not persuade him to it, though themselves were never so well satisfied." To that point, they desired him "to confer with his bishops, who, they made no question, would better inform his conscience." The archbishop of York was at hand; who, to his argument of conscience, told him, "that there was a private and a public conscience; that his public conscience as a king might not only dispense with, but oblige him to do that which was against his private conscience as a man: and that the question was not, whether he should save the earl of Strafford, but, whether he should perish with him: that the conscience of a king to preserve his kingdom, the conscience of a husband to preserve his wife, the conscience of a father to preserve his children, (all which were now in danger,) weighed down abundantly all the considerations the conscience of a master or a friend could suggest to him, for the preservation of a friend, or servant." And by such unrelational, ignominious arguments, in plain terms advised him, "even for conscience sake, to pass that act."

Though this bishop acted his part with more prodigious boldness and impiety, the other of the same function (of whose learning and sincerity the king and the world had greater reverence) did not what might have been expected from their calling or their trust; but at least forbore to fortify and confirm a conscience, upon the courage and piety of which, themselves and their order did absolutely depend.

During these perplexities, the earl of Strafford, taking notice of the straits the king was in, the rage of the people still increasing, (from whence he might expect a certain outrage and ruin, how constant soever the king continued to him; and, it may be, knowing of an undertaking (for such an undertaking there was) by a great person, who had then a command in the Tower, "that if the king refused to pass the bill, to free the kingdom from the hazard it seemed to be in, he would cause his head to be stricken off in the Tower,") writ a most pathetic letter to the king, full of acknowledgment of his favours; but lively presenting "the dangers, which threatened himself and his posterity, by his obstinacy in those favours;" and therefore by many arguments conjuring him "no longer to defer his assent to the bill, that so his death might free the kingdom from the many troubles it apprehended."

The delivery of this letter being quickly known, new arguments were applied; "that this free consent of his own clearly absolved the king from any scruple that could remain with him;" and so in the end they extorted from him, to sign a commission to some lords to pass the bill: which was as valid as if he had signed it himself; though they comforted him even with that circumstance, "that his own hand was not in it."

It may easily be said, that the freedom of the parliament, and his own negative voice, being thus barbarously invaded, if his majesty had, instead of passing that act, come to the house and dissolved the parliament; or if he had withdrawn himself from that seditious city, and put himself in the head of his own army; much of the mischief, which hath since happened, would have been prevented. But whoever truly considers the state of affairs at that time; the prevalence of that faction in both houses; the rage and fury of the people; the use that was made by the schismatical preachers (by whom all the orthodox were silenced) of the late protestation in their pulpits; the fears and jealousies they had infused into the minds of many sober men, upon the discourse of the late plot; the constitution of the council-table, that there was not an honest man durst speak his conscience to the king, for fear of his ruin; and that those, whom he thought most true to him, betrayed him every hour, insomuch as his whispers in his bedchamber were instantly conveyed to those against whom those whispers were; so that he had very few men to whom he could breathe his conscience and complaint, that were not suborned against him, or averse to his opinions: that on the other side, if some expedient were not speedily found out, to allay that frantic rage and combination in the people, there was reason enough to believe, their impious hands would be lifted up against his own person, and (which he much more apprehended) against the person of his royal consort: and lastly, that (besides the difficulty of getting thither except he would have gone alone) he had no ground to be very confident of his own army: I say, whoever sadly contemplates this, will find cause to confess, the part which the king had to act was not only harder than any prince, but than any private gentleman, had been incumbent to; and that it is much easier, upon the accidents and occurrences which have since happened, to determine what was not to have been done, than at that time to have foreseen, by what means to have freed himself from the labyrinth in which he was involved.

All things being thus transacted, to conclude the fate of this great person, he was on the twelfth day of May brought from the Tower of London (where he had been a prisoner near six months) to the scaffold on Tower-hill; where, with a composed, undaunted courage, he told the people, "he was come thither to satisfy them with his head; but that he much feared, the reformation which was begun in blood would not prove so fortunate to the kingdom, as they expected, and he wished:" and after great expressions "of his devotion to the church of England, and the protestant religion established by law, and professed in that church; of his loyalty to the king, and affection to the peace and welfare of the kingdom;" with marvellous tranquillity of mind, he delivered his head to the block, where it was severed from his body at a blow : many of the standers by, who had not been over charitable to him in his life, being much affected with the courage and Christianity of his death.

Thus fell the greatest subject in power, and little inferior to any in fortune, that was at that time in any of the three kingdoms ; who could well remember the time, when he led those people, who then pursued him to his grave. He was a man of great parts, and extraordinary endowments of nature ; not unadorned with some addition of art and learning, though that again was more improved and illustrated by the other ; for he had a readiness of conception, and sharpness of expression, which made his learning thought more than in truth it was. His first inclinations and addresses to the court were only to establish his greatness in the country ; where he apprehended some acts of power from the old lord Savile, who had been his rival always there, and of late had strengthened himself by being made a privy-counsellor, and officer at court : but his first attempts were so prosperous, that he contented not himself with being secure from his power in the country, but rested not, till he had bereaved him of all power and place in court ; and so sent him down, a most abject, disconsolate old man, to his country, where he was to have the superintendency over him too, by getting himself at that time made lord president of the north. These successes, applied to a nature too elate and arrogant of itself, and a quicker progress into the greatest employments and trust, made him more transported with disdain of other men, and more contemning the forms of business, than happily he would have been, if he had met with some interruptions in the beginning, and had passed in a more leisurely gradation to the office of a statesman.

He was, no doubt, of great observation, and a piercing judgment, both into things and persons ; but his too good skill in persons made him judge the worse of things : for it was his misfortune to be of a time wherein very few wise men were equally employed with him ; and scarce any (but the lord Coventry, whose trust was more confined) whose faculties and abilities were equal to his : so that upon the matter he wholly relied upon himself ; and discerning many defects in most men, he too much neglected what they said or did. Of all his passions, his pride was most predominant : which a moderate exercise of ill fortune might have corrected and reformed ; and which was by the hand of Heaven strangely punished, by bringing his destruction upon him by two things that he most despised, the people and sir Harry Vane. In a word, the epitaph, which Plutarch records that Sylla wrote for himself, may not be unfitly applied to him ; " that no man did ever pass him, either in " doing good to his friends, or in doing mischief " to his enemies ; " for his acts of both kinds were most exemplary and notorious.

Together with that of attainder of the earl of Strafford, another bill was passed by the king, of almost as fatal a consequence to the king and kingdom, as that was to the earl, " the act for " the perpetual parliament ; " as it is since called.

The vast burden of the two armies was no other way supplied, (for I have told you before the reason why they were so slow in granting of subsidies,) than by borrowing great sums of money from the city or citizens of London, upon the credit of particular persons. The emissaries in that negotiation, about the time the act for attainder passed the commons, returned, " that there was no more hope of " borrowing in the city ; that men had before " cheerfully lent their estates, upon their confidence " in the honour and justice of the two houses : but " they had now considered, how desperate that " security must prove, if the two houses should be " dissolved." Which consideration begun to have an universal influence upon all those who were personally bound for monies already borrowed ; " for " that their persons and fortunes must answer those " sums which had been paid for the public benefit, " if the parliament should be dissolved before any " act passed for their indemnity. That their fears " and apprehensions that this might happen were " much advanced by the late discovery of the plot " against the parliament ; for though the particulars thereof were not yet published, they discerned there was not that good meaning to the " parliament, as it deserved." This was no sooner offered, than the reasonableness of the objection was enforced ; and the necessity of finding some expedient " to satisfy the people of the gracious " intentions and resolutions of the king ; " which were most unquestionable ; (for in all those articles of time, when they were to demand some unreasonable thing from him, they spared no dutiful mention of the piety and goodness of his own princely nature ; or large promises what demonstrations of duty they would shortly make to him.) No way could be thought of so undeniable, as an act of parliament, " that this parliament should not be " adjourned, prorogued, or dissolved, but by act " of parliament ; which, upon this occasion, his " majesty would never deny to pass."

It is not credible, what an universal reception and concurrence this motion met with, (which was to remove the landmarks, and to destroy the foundation of the kingdom,) inasmuch, as a committee was immediately appointed to withdraw, and to prepare a short bill to that purpose ; which was within a short time (less than an hour) brought into the house, and immediately twice read, and committed ; an expedition never before heard of in parliament ; and the next day, with as little agitation, and the contradiction of very few voices, engrossed, and carried up to the lords. With them it had some debate, and amendments, which were delivered at a conference, the principal whereof was, " that the time should be limited, and not left " indefinite, and that it should not be dissolved " within two years, except by consent of both " houses ; " that time being sufficient to provide against any accidents that were then apprehended.

These alterations were highly resented in the house of commons, as argument of jealousy between the king and the parliament, " that it should " be imaginable the members of both houses, who " resided from their houses and conveniences at " great charge for the service of the public, would " desire to continue longer together than the necessity of that service should require ; " without considering, that it was more unlikely that the king (who had condescended so far to them, and had yet in truth received no fruit from their meeting) would dissolve them, as long as they intended that for which they were summoned together, and contained themselves within the bounds of duty and moderation.

THOMAS WENTWORTH, EARL OF STRAFFORD.

OB. 1641

FROM THE ORIGINAL OF VANDYKE IN THE COLLECTION OF

But the commons stoutly insisted on their own bill; and the lords, in that hurry of noise and confusion, when the people were abroad, kindly consented likewise to it: and so, by the importunity, and upon the undertaking of persons he then most trusted, in the agony of the other despatch, the king was induced to include that bill in the commission with the act of attainder, and so they were both passed together.

After the passing these two bills, the temper and spirit of the people, both within and without the walls of the two houses, grew marvellous calm and composed; there being likewise about that time passed by the king, the two bills, for the taking away the star-chamber court, and the high commission: so that there was not a grievance or inconvenience, real or imaginary, to which there was not a through remedy applied; and therefore all men expected, that both armies would be speedily disbanded; and such returns of duty and acknowledgment be made to the king, as might be agreeable to their professions, and to the royal favours he had vouchsafed to his people.

But what provisions soever were made for the public, particular persons had received no satisfaction. The death of the earl of Bedford, and the high proceedings in all those cases in which the king was most concerned, left all those who expected offices and preferments, desperate in their hopes: and yet an accident happened, that might have been looked upon as an earnest or instance of some encouragement that way.

Besides the lord Say's being invested in the mastership of the wards, in the place of the lord Cottington, (who was every day threatened, upon the secretary's paper of results, to be accused of high treason, till, like a wise man, he retired from the offices which begat his trouble; and for a long time after, till he again embarked himself in public employments, enjoyed himself without the least disturbance,) at a committee in the lords' house, in the afternoon, in some debate, passion arose between the earl of Pembroke, who was then lord chamberlain of the household, and the lord Mowbray, eldest son to the earl of Arundel; and from angry and disdainful words, an offer or attempt of blows was made; for which misdemeanour, they were the next day both sent to the Tower by the house of lords. The king, taking advantage of this miscarriage; and having been long incensed by the passionate, indiscreet, and insolent carriage of the earl, sent to him, by a gentleman usher, for his staff; and within two or three days after bestowed it upon the earl of Essex; who, without any hesitation, took it.

It was thought this extraordinary grace to the most popular person of the kingdom would have had a notable influence upon the whole party, which made him believe it depended very much on him: but it was so far from having that effect, as they looked upon that favour, rather as a mark of punishment and revenge upon the earl of Pembroke, for his affection to them, and for giving his suffrage against the earl of Strafford, (which he had often professed to the king he could never in conscience do,) than of estimation and kindness to the earl of Essex; and so were in truth more offended and incensed with the disgrace and disobligation to the one, than they were pleased with the preferment of the other: therefore whatever concerned the king in right; or what he might naturally expect from the compliance and affection of the house; or what was any way recommended by his majesty to them, found little or no respect.

His revenue was so far from being advanced, (as had been gloriously promised,) that it was, both in dignity and value, much lessened from what it was: for shortly after the beginning of the parliament, great complaint had been made, "that tonnage and poundage" (which is the duty and subsidy paid by the merchant upon trade) "had been taken by the king without consent of parliament;" the case whereof in truth is this: this duty had been constantly given to the succeeding king, ever since the reign of king Edward the Fourth, for his life, in the first parliament they held after their coming to the crown: before that time, it had been granted for years; and was originally intended for the support of the navy, whereby the merchant might be freed from danger of pirates; and upon the death of every king since that time, his successor always received it, without the least interruption, till the next parliament; in the beginning whereof it was always without scruple granted: so that, though it was, and must always be acknowledged as the free gift of the people, (as all other subsidies are,) yet it was looked upon as so essential a part of the revenue of the crown, that it could not be without it: and as the king is not less king before his coronation than he is after, so this duty had been still enjoyed as freely before, as it was after an act of parliament to that purpose; neither had there been ever any exception taken in parliament, (which sometimes was not in a year after the death of the former king,) that the crown had continued the receipt of it; which it always did, till the time of a new grant.

Thus, after the death of king James, his majesty received it, till the first parliament was summoned; and, that and two more being unfortunately dissolved, (as was said before,) in which his ministers were not solicitous enough for the passing that act for tonnage and poundage, continued the receipt of it till this present parliament: then (that is, many weeks after the beginning of it) it was directed, "that a bill should be speedily prepared for the granting it, as had been usual, lest the crown might, by so long enjoying, in a manner pre-scribe to it of right, without the donation of the people;" which the king always disclaimed to do. Shortly after (no man presuming to intimate, that it should be granted in any other manner than of course it had been) it was alleged, "that the bill could not be so speedily prepared as were to be wished, by reason that there were many just exceptions made by the merchants to the book of rates, which had been lately made by the farmers of the customs, in the time and by the direction of the earl of Portland;" (circumstances that carried prejudice enough to whatsoever they were applied;) and therefore it was proposed, for the present, as the best expedient to continue his majesty's supply, and to preserve the right of giving in the people, "that a temporary bill should pass, for the granting the same to his majesty for two months only, in which time a new book of rates should be made, more advantageous to his majesty in point of profit," (which was always solemnly professed,) "and then a complete act might pass."

"against not only any power in the crown of levying the duty of tonnage and poundage, without the express consent of parliament, but also any power of imposition upon any merchandises whatsoever, and in any case whatsoever;" which had been constantly practised in the best times by the crown; had the countenance of a solemn judgment in the exchequer chamber; and, though often agitated in parliament, had never been yet declared against: yet this quietly passed both houses, as a thing not worth considering; those who in duty ought to have opposed it in both houses, in relation to their service and trust, persuading his majesty, since he was sure to have whatsoever he or his progenitors had enjoyed, fully and frankly given and granted to him within two months, not to enter into disputes, (upon how just claims soever,) which would only delay what he so much desired. And so, in expectation and confidence, that they would make glorious additions to his state and revenue of the crown, his majesty suffered himself to be stripped of all that he had left; and of the sole stock of credit he had to borrow monies upon: for though, in truth, men knew that revenue was not legally vested in the king till an act of parliament, yet all men looked upon it as unquestionably to pass; and so it was not only a competent proportion for the present support of his house, but was understood a good security for any ordinary sum of money upon advance, as forty or fifty thousand pound, upon any emergent occasion.

All men discerned this gross usage, and the disadvantage imposed upon his majesty by this mutation; and therefore expected a full reparation, by such an act for life as had been usual; and such an improvement of the book of rates as had been promised, as soon as the business of the earl of Strafford was over: which had been always objected, as necessary to precede all other consultations. But this was no sooner moved, "as seasonable in order to their own professions, and in a degree due to the king, after so many reiterated expressions of favour and affection to his people, by so many excellent laws, and other condescensions," than they objected, "the odiousness of the late plot against the parliament, which was not yet fully discovered: that notwithstanding those gracious demonstrations of favour from the king, in the laws and other acts mentioned, they had great cause to apprehend, some ill affected persons had still an influence upon his majesty, to the disservice of the parliament, and to beget jealousies in him towards them; for that they had plainly discovered (which they should in a short time be able to present fully to the house) that there had been a design, not only to poison the affections of the army towards the parliament, by making them believe that they were neglected, and the Scots preferred much before them; but to bring up that army to London, with a purpose to awe the parliament: that there was a resolution to seize the Tower, and to make it a curb upon the city: that there had been an attempt to prevail with the officers of the Scottish army, at least to sit still as neutrals, whilst the other acted this tragedy: that the confederates in this design had taken an oath, to oppose any course that should be advised for the removing the bishops out of the house of peers; to preserve and defend the king's prerogative, to the utmost extent that any of his progenitors had enjoyed; and to settle his majesty's revenue: that they had reason to fear his majesty's own concurrence, at least his approbation, in this design, (which, if not prevented, must have proved so pernicious and fatal to the kingdom,) for that, besides that the persons principally engaged in it were of the nearest trust about the king and queen, they had clear proof, that a paper had passed his majesty's perusal, in which were contained many sharp invectives against the parliament; a desire that they might have the exercise of martial law, (the mention whereof was the most unpopular and odious thing that could be imagined,) and an offer of service to defend his majesty's person, which was an implication as if it had been in danger: and that this paper should have been signed by all the officers of the army; for their better encouragement whereon, the king himself had written a C. and an R. as a testimony that he approved of it."

This discourse, so methodically and confidently averred, made a strange impression (without reserving themselves till the evidence should be produced) in the minds of most men; who believed, that such particulars could never have been with that solemnity informed, if the proofs were not very clear; and served, not only to blast whatsoever was moved on his majesty's behalf, but to discountenance what, till then, had been the most popular motion that could be made, which was, the disbanding both armies, and the Scots' return into their own country. For the better accomplishment whereof, and as a testimony of their brotherly affection, the two houses had frankly and bountifully undertaken "to give them a gratuity of three hundred thousand pounds, over and above the twenty-five thousand pounds the month, during the time that their stay here should be necessary."

After that act, the king might have been reasonably awaked from any extraordinary confidence in the loyalty, honour, or justice, of both houses. And without doubt, when posterity shall recover the courage, and conscience, and the old honour of the English nation, it will not with more indignation and blushes contemplate any action of this seditious and rebellious age, than that the nobility and gentry of England, who were not guilty of the treason, should recompense an invasion from a foreign contemned nation, with whatever establishments they proposed in their own kingdom, and with a donative of three hundred thousand pounds, over and above all charges, out of the bowels of England; which will yet appear the more prodigious, when it shall be considered, that a fifth part of those who were accessaries to that infamous prodigality were neither favourers of their ends, or well-wishers of their nation.

Very many giving themselves leave, unfaithfully, to be absent from those debates, when the wealth and honour of their country was to be transplanted into a strange land; others looked upon it as a good purchase, to be freed of the payment of fourscore thousand pounds the month, (which was the charge of both armies,) by an entire sum of three hundred thousand pounds; and some pleased themselves with an assurance, that the scandal and unreasonableness of the sum would provoke the people to a hatred and revenge, and so that the brotherhood would not be supported, but destroyed, by that extravagant bounty: but these were only short ejaculations to please themselves for the time; for many of those, who had no other reason to consent to that vast sum, but that they might be rid of them, were so inflamed and transported with the tale of the plot, that they had then no mind to let them go; and had so far swallowed and digested an assurance that it was true, that they reserved no distinguishing or judging faculties, for the time when the evidence and proof should be presented to them.

After they had played with this plot, and given the house heats and colds, by applying parts of it to them upon emergent occasions, for the space of near three months; and finding, that though it did them many notable services, in advancing their own reputations, and calumniating the king's honour, yet, that it had not a through effect at court for their preferment; they resolved to shew all their ware, and to produce the whole evidence: for the perfecting whereof, they had "a late great mark of God's great favour towards them, in his furnishing them with evidence for the complete discovery of all the mischief, from one that was "a principal contriver of it."

We said before, that upon the first motion in the house of commons, by Mr. Pym, "for a committee to examine, and for an address to the king, that he would grant no passes to any of his servants to go beyond seas," two persons, of near relation to his trust, immediately absented themselves; which were Mr. Peirce, and Mr. Jermyn. The latter of these, without interruption, transported himself into France; but Mr. Peirce, delaying his journey upon some occasions of his own, and concealing himself in some obscure places in Sussex, near to his brother's house, was at last discovered; and when he endeavoured to have escaped, was set upon by the country people, and with great difficulty, and not without some hurt, got from them, and was not in some months again heard of.

It was generally believed afterwards, that finding the seaports shut, and watches set for his apprehension in all those places, whereby the transporting himself into foreign parts was very difficult, he found means to return to London, and to put himself into his brother's protection; where it is thought he was harboured, till his hurt was cured; the strictness of the inquiry over; and till he had prepared that letter to his brother, the earl of Northumberland, which served, as far as in him lay, to destroy all his companions, and furnished the committee with that which they called "a double evidence:" for they had no sooner received that letter from the earl of Northumberland, than they told the house, "they were now ready for a complete discovery;" and thereupon produced the evidence of colonel Goring, and the letter from Mr. Peirce; both which agreed upon the relation, "of a meeting at Mr. Peirce's chamber; and of a discourse of the parliament's neglect of the king's, and favouring the Scottish army; the taking an oath of secrecy; and some other particulars:" all which had been positively denied, by those members of the house of commons, Mr. Wilmot, Mr. Ashburnham, and Mr. Pollard, upon their examinations upon oath.

It will hardly be believed hereafter, (but that the effects of such impostures have left such deep marks,) that the evidence then given could, in so grave and judging an assembly, as a high court of parliament, till then, had always been, have brought the least prejudice upon the king; or, indeed, damage to any person accused: there being, in all the testimonies produced, so far from any proof, of a real design, or plot, to bring up the army (which was the grand matter alleged) to awe the parliament, that in truth it was very evident, there was no plot at all; only a free communication between persons (the major part whereof were of the house) "of the ill arts that were generally used to corrupt the affections of the people; and of some expedient, whereby, in that so public infection, the "army" (in which they had all considerable commands, two of them being general officers) "might be preserved from being wrought upon and corrupted:" in which discourse, colonel Goring himself, as appeared by his own examination, only proposed wild and extravagant overtures, "of bringing up the army, and surprising the Tower; which was, by all the rest, with manifest dislike, rejected: that all this had passed at one meeting, in which, they who met were so ill satisfied in one another, that they never would come together again: that, when the bringing up the army to London was mentioned to the king, his majesty would not hear of it, but only desired, that their affections might be kept entire for his service, as far as was consistent with the laws of the land, which were in danger to be invaded."

Yet, notwithstanding that all this appeared; and that this was all which did appear, (besides a discourse of the petition; for the petition itself they would not produce, signed with C. R. which is before set down in terms,) the specious, positive narration of the whole by Mr. Pym, before the evidence was read; the denying of what was now proved, and confessed by themselves, by Mr. Wilmot, Ashburnham, and Pollard, upon the former examination; the flight of Mr. Jermyn, and Mr. Peirce, and some others; the mention of some clauses in the petition signed with C. R.; and some envious, dark glances, both in Mr. Goring's examination, and Mr. Peirce's letter, at the king and queen, as if they knew more than was expressed, so transported the hearers, (who made themselves judges too,) that, taking all that was said, to be proved, they quickly voted, "that there was a design to bring up the army to force the parliament;" resolved to accuse Mr. Jermyn and Mr. Peirce of high treason; committed the three members of the house of commons to several prisons, and put them from being members of parliament, that in their rooms they might bring in three more fit for their service, as they shortly did; gave colonel Goring public thanks, "for preserving the kingdom, and the liberties of parliament;" and filled the people with jealousy for their security, and with universal acclamations of their great wisdom and vigilancy. So that this plot served to produce their first protestation; to inflame the people against the earl of Strafford, and in a degree to compass their ends upon that great person, as hath been before observed; to procure the bill for the continuance of this parliament, the foundation, or the fountain, of all the public calamities, to hinder and cross all overtures made for the revenue of the king, and to lessen the general reverence and duty to both their majesties; to continue the Scottish army within the kingdom, and consequently to hinder the king's from being disbanded; to incense both houses against the bishops, as if the design had been principally for their protection, (and there being one witness who said, "he had been told, that the clergy would "raise and pay one thousand horse, to be employed against the parliament,") to blast the reputation of the earl of Newcastle, whose zeal to his majesty's service was most remarkable, as if he had been to have commanded the army; and lastly, to advance their own credit and estimation with the people, as if they were the only patriots, that intended the preservation of religion, law, and liberty.

And having made this use of it, (which is a sufficient argument what opinion they had of their own evidence,) they never proceeded against any of the persons who were in their power, though they patiently attended and importuned a trial above a year after their accusation: for they well knew, there must be then a more exact and strict weighing of the proofs; and that the persons accused could not only vindicate themselves from the aspersions which were laid upon them, but could recriminate upon their grand prosecutors with such charges, as they would not so easily be freed from; and this was the reason, that, even during the heat and noise of the accusation, they received very civil offices, visits, and addressees, from the chief of those who were trusted with the prosecution.

The sending that letter of Mr. Peircy's to the house of commons; or rather, the procuring that letter to be writ, (in which such insinuations were made, to the prejudice of the king and queen,) was the first visible instance of the defection of the earl of Northumberland towards his majesty's service; which wrought several ill effects in the minds of many: for, as the earl then had the most esteemed and unblemished reputation, in court and country, of any person of his rank throughout the kingdom; so they who knew him well, discerned, that the greatness of that reputation was but an effect of the singular grace and favour shewed to him by his majesty; who, immediately upon the death of his father, had taken this earl (being then less than thirty years of age) into his immediate and eminent care; first made him a privy-counsellor; then knight of the order of the garter; then (that he might apt him by degrees for the greatest trust and employments) sent him admiral into the narrow seas, of a royal navy; and, after a summer spent in that exercise, made him lord high admiral of England; and, to the very minute of which we speak, prosecuted him with all manner and demonstration of respect and kindness; and (as I heard his majesty himself say) "courted him" as his mistress, and conversed with him as his "friend, without the least interruption or intermission of all possible favour and kindness." And therefore many, who observed this great earl purchase this opportunity of diserving the king, at the price of his brother's honour, and of his own gratitude, concluded, that he had some notable temptation in conscience, and that the court was much worse than it was believed to be.

The truth is, that after his brother's being accused of high treason; and then, upon his hurt in Sussex, coming directly to Northumberland-house to shelter himself; the earl being in great trouble how to send him away beyond the seas after his wound was recovered, advised with a confident friend then in power, whose affection to him he doubted not, and who, innocently enough, brought Mr. Pym into the council, who overwitted them both, by frankly consenting, "that Mr. Peircy should escape into France," which was all the care the earl had; but then obliged him, "first to draw such a letter from him, as might "be applied as an evidence of the reality of the "plot, after he was escaped;" and in this manner the letter was procured: which made a lasting quarrel between the two brothers; and made the earl more at the disposal of those persons whom he had trusted so far, than he had been before.

After the act for the continuance of the parliament, the house of commons took much more upon them, in point of their privileges, than they had done; and more undervalued the concurrence of the peers; and though that act added nothing to, nor extended their jurisdiction: which jurisdiction the wisdom of former times kept from being limited or defined, there being no danger of excess; and it being more agreeable to the nature of the supreme court to have an unlimited jurisdiction. But now that it could not be dissolved without their consent, (the apprehension and fear whereof had always before kept them within the bounds of modesty,) they called any power they pleased to assume to themselves, "a branch of "their privilege;" and any opposing or questioning that power, "a breach of their privileges: "which all men were bound to defend by their "late protestation; and they were the only proper "judges of their own privileges."

Hereupon, they called whom they pleased delinquents; received complaints of all kinds, and committed to prison whom they pleased: which had been never done, nor attempted, before this parliament; except in some such apparent breach, as the arresting a privileged person, or the like: and, as if theirs had swallowed up all other privileges, of peers, and [the] king himself, upon the lords rejecting a bill sent up to them, "to compel all "persons" (without distinction of quality, and without distinction of punishment or proceeding, upon their refusal) "to take the late protestation;" and two lords of great estimation (the earl of Southampton, and the lord Roberts) having refused to take the same; the house of commons, in great fury, and with many expressions of contempt, by a vote declared, "that the protestation "made by them was fit to be taken by every "person, that was well affected in religion, and to "the good of the commonwealth; and therefore, "that what person soever should not take the protestation, was unfit to bear office in the church "or commonwealth;" and directed farther, "that "that vote should be printed, and that the knights "and burgesses should send down copies of it to "the several places for which they served:" which was the most unparalleled breach of privilege, and the highest and most insolent affront to the lords, to the king, and to the justice of the kingdom, and the most destructive to parliaments, that any age had been guilty of. And yet, when some of the peers nobly resented it, on the behalf of the peerage, and the liberty of the subject, and pressed resolutely for reparation, means was found out to engage the king to interpose his royal mediation with those lords, to the end they might quietly pass by that public violation and indignity, without further insisting on it.

All this time the two armies were continued at that vast charge, many men whispering (but so that it might be spoken of) "that the Scots would not retire till the bill against episcopacy were passed:" whereupon the king sent them word, about the beginning of July, "that he desired all speed might be used for the disbanding both armies; for the better and more orderly doing whereof, he had constituted the earl of Holland general of his army," (the earl of Northumberland, by reason of his indisposition in health, or some other reason, having laid down his commission,) "and intended forthwith to send him down thither: that his majesty himself, according to [a] former resolution, and promise made to his subjects of Scotland, meant to visit that his native kingdom, for the better perfecting the peace there; and appointed the day (about fourteen days after) he resolved to begin his progress; and therefore wished them, against that time, to prepare and finish any such acts, as they desired might receive his majesty's approbation, for the good of the kingdom, if there yet remained any thing to be asked of him." Notwithstanding which message, they spent most of their time upon the bill for extirpation of bishops, deans, and chapters; without finishing either the act of pacification between the two nations, or giving order for the disbanding the army.

It was wondered at by many, and sure was a great misfortune to the king, that he chose not rather at that time (though the business was only to disband) to constitute the earl of Essex general of his army, than the earl of Holland; for (besides that it would have been an act of much more grace and satisfaction to the people, and to the soldier) his majesty having lately given him so great an earnest of his trust, as the making him chamberlain of his house, ought in policy to have pursued that work, by any seasonable accumulation of favour, till he had made him his perfect creature; which had been very easy, if skillfully attempted: for his pride and ambition, which were not accompanied with any habit of ill nature, were very capable of obligations; and he had a faithfulness and constancy in his nature, which had kept him always religious in matter of trust: then, he was almost a declared enemy to the Scottish nation, and would have been very punctual in all formalities and decencies, which had any relation to his master's honour, or the honour of the nation. In a word, he might have been imposed upon in his understanding, but could not have been corrupted by hopes or fears what the two houses could have done to him: and was then more the idol of the people, than in truth the idolater of them.

Whereas, by making the earl of Holland general, he much disobliged the other, who expected it, and to whom it had been in a manner offered; and made him apprehend some distrust in the king towards him; and that his former favour in his office had been conferred on him, rather because no man else had been able to bear the envy of displacing the earl of Pembroke, than that his own merit and service was valued. Then the person, upon whom he conferred that honour, had formerly disappointed him, and often incurred his displeasure, and wore some marks of it; and was of no other interest or reputation with the party which could do mischief, than as a person so obnoxious to them, in the misexecuting his great and terrible office of chief justice in eyre, by which he had vexed and oppressed most counties in England, and the most considerable persons in those counties; and in other particulars; that they knew he durst not offend them, and would purchase their protection and good opinion at any price: as it fell out; for within few days after the king was gone through that army, in his way to Scotland, he wrote a letter, which was communicated to both houses, in which he mystically expressed "some new design to have been set on foot for corrupting the army;" for which there was never after the least colour given; but served then to heighten the old jealousies, and to bespeak a misunderstanding for whatsoever should be proposed on his majesty's behalf during his absence.

After their great end was obtained in the execution and death of the earl of Strafford, all men believed, that they would be very forward in dismissing the Scottish army, and disbanding the other, which cost the kingdom so vast a sum of money every month; and they had already voted a brotherly assistance to the Scots of three hundred thousand pounds, for the service they had performed; and an act was already prepared for the raising the sum: but they had yet no mind to part with their beloved brethren.

The commissioners who treated with the Scots had agreed, "that the king should be present in his parliament at Edinburgh, by such a day in July, to pass the act for pacification between the two kingdoms, and such other acts as his parliament there should propose to him;" and his majesty prepared to begin his progress, soon enough to be in Scotland by the time; and they resolved on all sides, "that the one army should be drawn out of the kingdom, and the other totally disbanded, before the king should arrive in the northern parts, for many reasons." As they had lost all confidence in the affections of the English army, so there were many jealousies arisen among the Scots, both in their army, and amongst their greatest counsellors: notwithstanding all which, instead of making haste to the disbanding, they published much jealousy and dissatisfaction to remain with them of the court; "there were some evil counsellors still about the king, who obstructed many gracious acts, which would otherwise flow from his goodness and bounty towards his people; and made ill impressions in him of the parliament itself, and its proceedings."

Their design was to remove the duke of Richmond from the king, both because they had a mind to have his office of warden of the cinque-ports from him, that it might be conferred on the earl of Warwick; and as he was almost the only man of great quality and consideration about the king, who did not in the least degree stoop, or make love to them, but crossed them boldly in the house; and all other ways pursued his master's service with his utmost vigour and intentness of mind: they could not charge him with any thing like a crime, and therefore only intended by some vote to brand him, and make him odious; by which they presumed, they should at last make him willing to ransom himself by quitting that office: for which there was some underhand treaty, by persons who were solicitous to prevent farther inconveniences; and, as they found any thing like to succeed in that, they slackened or advanced that discourse of evil counsellors.

One day they were very warm upon the argument, and had a purpose to have named him directly, which they had hitherto forbore to do, when Mr. Hyde stood up, and said, "He did really believe that there yet remained some evil counsellors, who did much harm, about the king; and that it would be much better to name them, than to amuse the house so often with the general mention of them, as if we were afraid to name them:" he proposed, "that there might be a day appointed, on which, upon due reflections upon those who had been most notorious in doing mischief to the public, we might most probably find, who they were who trod still in the same paths, and might name them accordingly; and that for his part, if a day were appointed for that discovery, he would be ready to name one, who, by all the marks we could judge by, and by his former course of life, might very reasonably be believed to be an evil counsellor."

They were exceedingly apprehensive (as they had cause) that he meant the marquis of Hamilton, (who, for the reasons aforesaid, was very dear to them, (and thenceforward, though they desisted not from prosecuting the duke, till at last they had compelled him to quit the cinque-ports to the earl of Warwick, they no more urged the discovery of evil counsellors. And all the familiar friends of Mr. Hyde were importuned to move him, "not to endeavour to do any prejudice to the marquis of Hamilton;" and even the king himself was prevailed with to send to him to that purpose: so industrious was that people to preserve those whom for private ends they desired to preserve, as well as to destroy those who they desired should be destroyed.

When every body expected that nothing should be mentioned in the house but the despatch of the treaty of the pacification, by the commissioners on both sides; which was the only obstruction to the discharge of the armies, and which could be done in two days, if they pursued it; they called in a morning "for the bill" (that had so long before been brought in by sir Edward Deering) "for the extirpation of episcopacy," and gave it a second reading; and resolved, "that it should be committed to a committee of the [whole] house, and that it should be proceeded upon the next morning." It was a very long debate the next morning, after the speaker had left the chair, who should be in the chair for the committee; they who wished well to the bill having resolved "to put Mr. Hyde into the chair, that he might not give them trouble by frequent speaking, and so too much obstruct the expediting the bill;" they who were against the bill pressed and called loud for Mr. Crew to be in the chair: but in conclusion, Mr. Hyde was commanded to the chair; they who were enemies to the bill being divided in opinion, many believing, that he would obstruct the bill more in that place, than if he remained at liberty; and they found it to be true.

The first day the committee sat full seven hours, and determined, "that every day, as soon as the house was resumed, the chairman should report the several votes of that day to the house, which should determine them before it rose;" which was without any precedent, and very prejudicial to the grave transaction of the business: for, besides that it was a preengaging the house in its judgment, when the bill engrossed should be put to the question; it was so late every day before the house was resumed, (the speaker commonly leaving the chair about nine of the clock, and never resuming it till four in the afternoon,) that it was very thin; they only, who prosecuted the bill with impatience, remaining in the house, and the others, who abhorred it, growing weary of so tiresome an attendance, left the house at dinner-time, and afterwards followed their pleasures: so that the lord Falkland was wont to say, "that they who hated bishops, hated them worse than the devil; and that they who loved them, did not love them so well as their dinner."

However, the chairman perplexed them very much; for, besides that at the end of his report every day to the house, before the house put the question for the concurrence in the votes, he always enlarged himself against every one of them, and so spent them much time; when they were in the heat and passion of the debate, he often ensnared them in a question: so that when he reported to the house the work of the day, he did frequently report two or three votes directly contrary to each other, which, in the heat of their debate, they had unawares run into. And after near twenty days spent in that manner, they found themselves very little advanced towards a conclusion, and that they must review all that they had done; and the king being resolved to begin his journey for Scotland, they were forced to discontinue their beloved bill, and let it rest; sir Arthur Haslerig declaring in the house, "that he would never hereafter put an enemy into the chair:" nor had they ever after the courage to resume the consideration of the bill, till after the war was entered into.

The time being come, within two or three days, (according to his former declaration,) for the king's journey into Scotland, the house of commons thought it time to lay aside their disputes upon the church, which every day grew more involved, and to intend the perfecting the act of pacification, and the order for disbanding; both which were thought necessary to be despatched, before his majesty should begin his progress; and might have been long since done. On a sudden, the house of commons grew into a perplexed debate, concerning the king's journey into Scotland (which had been long before known, and solemnly promised by his majesty to the commissioners of Scotland; where preparation was made for his reception, and the parliament summoned there accordingly); expressed many dark and doubtful apprehensions of his safety, not without some glances, "that if his majesty were once with his army, he might possibly enter upon new counsels, before he consented to disband [it];" and in the end concluded, "to desire the lords to join with them in a request to the king, to defer his journey into Scotland, till the act of pacification was passed, the armies disbanded, and till such other acts were prepared, as should be thought necessary for the good of the kingdom;" without mentioning any time, against which those things should be ready: which, though it was an unreasonable request, yet most men having no mind he should go into Scotland, it was consented to by both houses; and thereupon an address was made to his majesty to that purpose: who returned his answer, "that he was sorry, the "houses, having had so long notice of his intention for that journey, (which could not but appear very necessary to them,) had neglected to prepare all such things, as were necessary to be despatched by him before he went; that, though his presence in Scotland was depended upon by such a day, and the disappointment might beget some prejudice to him, yet, he was content to satisfy their desires so far, as to defer his journey for fourteen days; within which time they might make all things ready that were of importance, and beyond which time it would not be possible for him to make any stay."

This time being gotten, they proceeded but slowly in the direction for disbanding, (though the earl of Holland was gone down to the army,) or in the act of the pacification; but continued their mention "of fears and jealousies of the peace of the kingdom; of an invasion from foreign parts; and an insurrection of the papists in England: for all which, they said, there was not yet sufficient provision, by the laws and constitution of the kingdom." And therefore one day, sir Arthur Haslerig (who, as was said before, was used by that party, like the dove out of the ark, to try what footing there was) preferred a bill "for the settling the militia of the kingdom, both by sea and land, in such persons as they should nominate;" with all those powers and jurisdictions, which have been since granted to the earl of Essex, or sir Thomas Fairfax, by land, or to the earl of Warwick, by sea. There were in the bill no names, but blanks to receive them, when the matter should be passed; though men were assured, that the earl of Essex was their confident by land, and the earl of Northumberland by sea: and yet the inclination to the earl of Warwick would have begot some disturbance, if the matter had come then to be pressed.

When the title of this bill was read, it gave so general an offence to the house, that it seemed inclined to throw it out, without suffering it to be read; not without some reproach to the person that brought it in, "as a matter of sedition;" till Mr. Saint-John, the king's solicitor, rose up, and spake to it, and (having, in truth, himself drawn the bill) said, "he thought that passion and dislike very unseasonable, before the bill was read; that it was the highest privilege of every member, that he might propose any law, or make any motion, which, in his conscience, he thought advantageous for the kingdom, or the place for which he served. For the matter, which by the title that bill seemed to comprehend, he was of opinion, that something was necessary to be done in it; for he was sure, that such power, as might be necessary for the security of the kingdom, over the militia, was not yet by law vested in any person; or in the crown itself: that they had lately by their votes blasted and condemned the power of lords lieutenants, and their deputies, which had been long exercised, and submitted to by the people; that, since that was determined, it was necessary to substitute such in their room, as might be able to suppress any insurrection, or resist an invasion: and therefore, that it was fit to hear the bill read; and if any fitting expedient were proposed in it to that purpose, to embrace it; otherwise, to think of a better. For the nomination of persons, it would not be seasonable to speak of it, till the power and jurisdiction were first settled and constituted:

"and then, if it seemed too great for any subject, it might be devolved upon the crown; which yet was not sufficiently possessed of a legal power to the purposes aforesaid."

Upon this discourse, by a person of the king's sworn council, the bill was read; but with so universal a dislike, that it was never called upon the second time, but slept, till long after the matter of it was digested in ordinances.

The peremptory day again drawing very near, for the king's journey into Scotland, and very little done towards the public, since the time they had prevailed with his majesty to suspend it, on a Saturday in the afternoon (the progress being to begin on Monday) they fell into unusual passion again against the king's going into Scotland: the which they thought of so great importance to be hindered, that they resolved (and prevailed with the lords to do the like) to sit the next day, being Sunday; which had never before been known, since the first institution of parliaments; and which they thought fit to excuse by a short declaration, that the people might not be thereby encouraged to profane the sabbath.

When they found the king constant to his former resolution, and that all they could allege could prevail no farther with him than, whereas he intended to go Monday after dinner, to stay till Tuesday morning, they very earnestly proposed, "that he would leave a commission with some persons, to pass such acts as should be prepared and pass both houses in his absence; and to make a custos regni, to supply the place of government till his return:" with many other extravagancies, which themselves understood not. But when they found that no such commission could be legally granted, to consent to any acts that were not consented to by both houses at the date of the commission; and that both the person and the power of a custos regni would be duly weighed, and would take up much consideration, if the king were willing to satisfy them; they were contented with a commission to the earl of Essex, of lieutenant-general of that side Trent: which his majesty having granted; and confirmed the act of pacification between the two kingdoms, (which in great haste was transacted in both houses, as if it had been only matter of form,) he took his journey from London towards Scotland toward the middle of August, leaving both houses sitting at Westminster.

The unexpected passion and importunity to hinder his majesty's journey into Scotland was not well understood; and the less, for that the governing party was divided upon it: some of them, with trouble equal to what they had at any time expressed, insisting upon his not going; others alleging, "that his majesty was so far engaged in it, that he could not in honour recede from it:" whilst the Scottish commissioners, who were often appealed and referred to in the debate, answered so mysteriously, as argued rather a convenience, and expectation of the journey itself, than any necessity in point of time. Neither was the ground of his majesty's so positive and unalterable resolution of going thither, sufficiently clear to standers by; who thought he might have transacted the business of that kingdom (where he could not reasonably expect any great reverence to his person) better at a distance; and that his presence might be more necessary in this.

But, as his majesty's impatience to see both armies disbanded, and this kingdom freed from the invasion, (both which he heartily desired,) and his desire to refresh himself, from the vexation which the two houses, or one of them, or some in one of them, daily gave him; hurried him to that expedition, without well weighing and preparing how to comport himself through it: so, no doubt, that opposition, and instance against it (besides the natural desire they had to remove the king from any fixed resolution) proceeded partly, to procure an excuse for the hasty passing the bill of pacification; which they had purposely retarded (foreseeing there were many particulars in it, that, if weighed, would never have been consented to) till they might be so straitened in time, that whoever objected against what was offered, might seem to hinder the disbanding, and to necessitate the king's longer stay: but principally hoping, that his majesty, rather than defer his journey, on which he was resolved, would consent to any unreasonable qualifying such person whom they should name, with power in his absence; except there were some real jealousy of the Scots at that time, and between the Scottish commissioners themselves, (as was conceived by some,) by reason of great addresses made to the king by the earl of Rothes, the principal and governing person of that nation, and some insinuation of favour from his majesty to him; so that they did in earnest desire to put off that journey, for fear of disturbance there.

The truth is, the king was well satisfied with the promises made to him by that earl; who desired to live in this court, and should have been shortly made gentleman of the bedchamber, and had himself a hope to marry a great and wealthy lady: and it is certain, the king expected, by his help and interest, to have found such a party in Scotland, as would have been more tender of his honour than they after expressed themselves; and did always impute the failing thereof to the absence of that earl, who being sick at the king's going from London, within six weeks after died. But others believed, he had been so far guilty of what had been done amiss, that he would neither have been able nor willing to preserve the foundation of that power, which could hardly have forgotten by what means it had been oppressed.

I must not omit here, the disbanding another army, about the same time; the circumstances whereof were very remarkable, and the cause of much trouble that ensued. The king perceiving that he was not now like to have any use of the new army in Ireland; at least not that use for which it was raised, (which was, to have visited Scotland,) and finding often mention, enviously and maliciously, made of that army in the house of commons; and having from thence (by the advice of the committee for Ireland) received some addresses for that purpose; resolved to disband them; and, to that end, signified his pleasure to the lords justices of Ireland, and to the earl of Ormond, his lieutenant-general of that army; directing withal (according to the last advice he had received from the earl of Strafford) "that any officers of the army should have free leave to transport what men he could get of that army, for the service of any prince in amity with this crown:" and shortly after, upon the earnest desire of don Alonso de Cardinas, ambassador from the king of Spain, his majesty consented, that four thousand soldiers of that army should be transported for the service of that king into Flanders; at the same time permitting as many as desired the same, to be transported for the service of the French king. This was no sooner known, but the house of commons interposed, with their accustomed confidence and distemper, "to beseech his majesty to revoke that license:" and, by impertinent and slight reasons, boldly urged and insisted on, as they did in every thing else, prevailed with the king "to inhibit the transporting any of those soldiers out of that kingdom, for the service of any prince whatsoever."

Many were of opinion that this activity in a business of which they had not the least connivance, proceeded from the instigation of the ambassador of the French king; who was very conversant with the principal persons of that faction, and no doubt fomented those humours out of which the public calamities were bred; and some said boldly, and an obscure person or two have since affirmed it, as upon their knowledge, "that Mr. Pym received five thousand pound from that French minister, to hinder that supply to Spain." Others believed, that it proceeded only from that proud and petulant spirit which possessed them, to lessen the reputation of the king; and to let the king of Spain and all other princes see the power they had, to oppose and cross his resolutions in the most pure acts of sovereignty. But I believe, though there might be a mixture of both the other reasons, the principal motive that induced them to that interposition, was the advice and desire of the committee from the parliament of Ireland, whose counsel was entirely followed in whatsoever concerned that kingdom; and who, no doubt, had then designed the rebellion that shortly after broke out, which could hardly have taken effect, if that body of men had been removed out of the kingdom, according to the king's direction. But of that more in its place.

As soon as the king began his journey for Scotland, all orders, and what else was necessary, were despatched for the disbanding; and a resolution taken, "to send a committee of lords and commons to attend his majesty (that is, to be a spy upon him) in Scotland, and to be present when the act of pacification should be transacted in that parliament, and to preserve the good intercourse and correspondence which was begun between the two nations:" but in truth, to lay the scene how the next year should be spent; and to bespeak new laws for this kingdom, by the copies of what should be consented to for that.

In this errand two lords, and four of the commons, were appointed to go; but for the two lords, the lord Howard of Escrick served [the] turn; who was naturally to be governed by Mr. Fiennes, and Mr. Hambden, who, together with sir William Armyn, made up the committee. Which being despatched, they thought it time to breathe a little, and to visit their counties, for whom they had done such notable service: and so, towards the latter end of August, (having first constituted a committee to sit during the recess for the despatch of any important occurrences, and qualifying them with power they could not depute; such a committee, and such a qualification, having never been before heard of in parliaments,) both houses adjourned themselves till the middle of October following, by which time they presumed the king would be returned from Scotland; having, from the time that they were first convened, which was about nine months, (longer time than ever parliament had before continued together in one session,) besides all their extraordinary acts of blood and power, procured the king's assent to these following important laws; by which, the kingdom might have received ample benefit and advantage.

"A bill for the triennial parliament:" which took up a long debate; there being many clauses, in case the crown [should] omit the sending out of writs, derogatory to majesty, and letting the reins too loose to the people: yet, since it was evident, that unspeakable inconveniences had befallen the kingdom by the long intermission of those conventions; and that that intermission could not have happened, if there had not been some neglect of what had been settled by former laws; and therefore there was some reason for those clauses, by which the crown could in no case suffer, but by its own default. It found an easy passage through both houses; and by his majesty (who was satisfied that such a frequency of meeting with his people, as once in three years, might be more convenient than prejudicial to his service; and believed, that, by his consenting to this act, the proceedings in this parliament would be more moderate) it had an equal reception, and was enacted by him the next day after it passed both houses.

"An act for the taking away the high commission court:" which comprehended much more than was generally intended. That jurisdiction was erected by a statute in the first year of queen Elizabeth, instead of a larger power which had been exercised under the pope's authority, then abolished; and, whilst it was exercised with moderation, was an excellent means to vindicate and preserve the dignity and peace of the church: though, from the beginning, it was not un murmured against by the non-conformable party of the kingdom.

But of late, it cannot be denied, that, by the great power of some bishops at court, it had much overflowed the banks which should have contained it; not only in meddling with things that in truth were not properly within their connasance; but extending their sentences and judgments, in matters triable before them, beyond that degree that was justifiable; and grew to have so great a contempt of the common law, and the professors of it, (which was a fatal unskilfulness in the bishops, who could never have suffered whilst the common law had been preserved,) that prohibitions from the supreme courts of law, which have, and must have, the superintendency over all inferior courts, were not only neglected, but the judges reprehended for granting them, (which without perjury they could not deny,) and the lawyers discountenanced for moving them, (which they were obliged in duty to do;) so that thereby the clergy made a whole nation, that is, almost a whole profession, if not their enemy, yet very undevoted to them.

Then, it was grown from an ecclesiastical court, for the reformation of manners, to a court of revenue, and imposed great fines upon those who were culpable before them; sometimes above the degree of the offence, had the jurisdiction of fining been unquestionable: which it was not. Which course of fining was much more frequent, and the fines heavier, after the king had granted all that revenue (whatsoever it should prove to be) to be employed for the reparation of St. Paul's church; which, though it were a glorious work, and worthy the piety of those who advanced it, and the greatness of his mind who principally intended it, made the grievance less popular.

By these means (besides the conflux and reputation of that part of the clergy which had formerly been obnoxious, and suppressed by the bishops: which I do not mention as any piece of their exorbitancy; for I do not know that ever any innocent clergyman suffered by any ecclesiastical censure; though, it may be, the guilty were more severely proceeded against, and with less politic circumstances, than the nature of that time required) that court had very few friends; and having many enemies, the proposition for abolishing it was easily hearkened to; of which the violent party easily taking notice, they who prepared the bill inserted clauses, that not only took away the high commission court, which was intended, but, upon the matter, the whole ecclesiastical jurisdiction; and, under pretence of reforming the great abuses by the oath ex officio, and excommunication, destroyed and cancelled all coercive power whatsoever in those courts, which was never intended: yet, in that hurry, it made a progress through both houses, and attended the royal assent. But, when his majesty understood the extent thereof, and how far the body of the bill exceeded the title; and that, instead of reformation, it was opening a door to the most scandalous offences, and leaving adultery and incest as unpunishable, as any other acts of good fellowship; he made a pause in the consenting to it, till both houses might review whether their remedy were proportionable to the disease.

Immediately the fire was kindled against the bishops, as the only obstacles to any reformation; with some passionate insinuations, "that, since they opposed a due regulation of their power, there would be no way but to cut them off root and branch." And thereupon some bishops themselves were again made instruments; and others, who pretended to take care of the church, persuaded the king, "for the bishops' sake, to confirm that bill:" whilst the designers were much pleased to find that logic prevail; little doubting, that when they had taken away their jurisdiction in the church, by that bill, and their dignity in the state, by removing them out of the house of peers, they should find it no hard matter to abolish their names and titles out of the kingdom; and to enjoy their goodly lands and revenues, which could only make the reformation perfect and complete. And in this manner that law was enacted.

"A bill for taking away the star-chamber court." The progress of which bill was this. The exorbitances of this court had been such (as hath been before touched) that there were very few persons of quality who had not suffered, or been perplexed, by the weight or fear of those censures and judgments. For, having extended their jurisdiction from riots, perjury, and the most notorious misdemeanours, to an asserting all proclamations, and orders of state; to the vindicating illegal commissions, and grants of monopolies, (all which were the chief groundworks of their late proceedings,) no man could hope to be longer free from the inquisition of that court, than he resolved to submit to those, and the like extraordinary courses. And therefore there was an entire inclination to limit and regulate the proceedings of that court: to which purpose, a bill was brought in, and twice read, and, according to custom, committed. It being returned after by the committee, and the amendments read; it was suddenly suggested, (by a person not at all inclined to confusion, or to the violent party that intended that confusion,) "that the remedies provided by that bill were not proportionable to the diseases; that the usurpations of that court were not less in the forms of their proceeding, than in the matter upon which they proceeded; insomuch that the course of the court (which is the rule of their judging) was so much corrupted, that the grievance was as much, in those cases of which they had a proper conscience, as by their excess in holding pleas of that, in which, in truth, they had no jurisdiction: and therefore he conceived, the proper and most natural cure for that mischief would be, utterly to abolish that court, which [it] was very difficult, if not impossible, to regulate; and, in place thereof, to erect and establish such a jurisdiction as might be thought necessary." Hereupon, the same bill was re-committed, with direction, "so far to alter the frame of it, as might serve utterly to take away and abolish that court:" which was accordingly done; and again brought to the house, and engrossed, and sent up to the lords. So that important bill was never read but once in the house of commons, and was never committed; which, I believe, was never before heard of in parliament.

It could not meet with any opposition in the house of peers: all who had been judges there having their several judgments hanging like meteors over their heads; and the rest, being either grieved or frightened by it: and so, being brought to his majesty, received his royal assent.

Thus fell that high court, a great branch of the prerogative; having been rather extended and confirmed, than founded, by the statute of the tenth year of king Henry the Seventh: for, no doubt, it had both a being and a jurisdiction before that time, though vulgarly it received date from thence; and, whilst it was gravely and moderately governed, was an excellent expedient to preserve the dignity of the king, the honour of his council, and the peace and security of the kingdom. But the taking it away was an act very popular; which, it may be, was not then more politic, than the reviving it may be thought hereafter, when the present distempers shall be expired.

"An act for the certainty of the meets, bounds, and limits of all the forests in England:" which was a great benefit and ease to the people; who had been so immoderately vexed by the justice in eyre's seat, (exercised with great rigour by the earl of Holland, and revived by Mr. Noy, when he was attorney general,) that few men could assure themselves their estates and houses might not be brought within the [jurisdiction of] some forest; the which if they were, it cost them great fines: and therefore, to ease them of their future fears, the king departed with his own unquestionable right (which would, a year before, have been purchased at the price of two hundred thousand pounds) without any murmur for severity.

"An act, that no clerk of the market of his majesty's house should execute his office in any part of the kingdom, but only within the verge of the court: and the execution of that office granted to mayors and bailiffs of towns corporate; and to the lords of liberties and franchises, and to their deputies." By which, the people through England were freed from many petty vexations and extortions, which the deputies and agents for that office (who commonly farmed the perquisites of that office, within several limits) exercised over them. And let no man say, that this was but an act of justice, for the redress of visible misdemeanours which his own officers were guilty of; and that his majesty parted with nothing of profit to himself, by that act: for the misdemeanours of any office may be prevented, and punished, and redressed, without the taking away, or suppressing, the office itself; which is an instance of power, and prerogative. And the other was used as an argument heretofore (which few have since approved) for the passing away most of the old rents of the crown, "that they yielded little profit to the crown, being always swallowed by the many officers incumbent to that service;" without considering, that even those many officers are of the essential honour and greatness of princes. But, as that computation was very erroneous in point of thrift, so it is much more scandalous in point of power; and he, that thinks the king gives away nothing that is worth the keeping, when he suffers an office, which keeps and maintains many officers, to be abolished and taken away, does not consider, that so much of his train is abated, and that he is less spoken of, and consequently less esteemed, in those places where that power formerly extended; nor observes, how much private men value themselves upon those lesser franchises and royalties, which especially keep up the power, distinction, and degrees of men.

"An act for the prevention of vexatious proceedings touching the order of knighthood:" by which, to expiate the trespasses which had been lately committed by the rigorous circumstances of proceeding upon that claim, the king parted with, and released to his people, a right and duty, as unquestionably due to him by the law, as any service he can lay claim to; and such, as the subject received the discharge of it, as a singular benefit and advantage to him.

"An act for the free making saltpetre and gunpowder within the kingdom:" which was a part of the prerogative; and not only considerable, as it restrained that precious and dangerous commodity from vulgar hands; but, as in truth it brought a considerable revenue to the crown; and more to those, whom the crown gratified and obliged by that license. The pretence for this exemption was, "the unjustifiable proceeding of those (or of inferior persons qualified by them) who had been trusted in that employment;" by whom, it cannot be denied, many men suffered: but the true reason was, that thereby they might be sure to have in readiness a good stock in that commodity, against the time their occasions should call upon them.

"An act against divers encroachments and oppressions in the stannary courts:" the logic of which act extended itself to all inferior courts, and manner of proceedings throughout the kingdom; though the full measure of that benefit seemed to be poured out upon the two counties of Cornwall and Devonshire; the people whereof had been so much oppressed by the jurisdiction of that court, (supported and extended with great passion and fury by the earl of Pembroke, the lord warden of those stannaries,) that both prohibitions, and habeas corpus's from the king's bench, had been disobeyed and neglected; not without some personal affront, and reproach to all the judges of that court: and therefore, it could not but be great ease of heart to those parts, to be freed from the exorbitancy of that oppression.

"An act, whereby all the proceedings in the business of ship-money were adjudged void, and disannulled; and the judgments, enrolments, and entries thereupon, vacated and cancelled:" which (how just and necessary soever) was a frank departure from a right, vindicated by a judgment in the exchequer-chamber, before all the judges in England; and therefore deserved a just acknowledgment; besides that, some clauses in that statute assert the subject's liberty and property, beyond what was done by the petition of right; which needed an additional establishment.

These acts of parliament, finished and enacted in the time we speak of; besides the quitting the long used right of imposing upon foreign trade, in the preamble of the bill for tonnage and poundage; and besides that fatal bill for the continuance of this parliament; will be hereafter acknowledged by an incorrupted posterity, to be everlasting monuments of a princely and fatherly affection to his people; and such an obligation of repose and trust from the king in the hearts of his subjects, that no expressions of piety, duty, and confidence, from them, could have been more than a sufficient return on their parts: which how they performed, is to follow in the next place.

END OF THE THIRD BOOK.

THE HISTORY OF THE REBELLION, &c.

BOOK IV.

WHEN the king came to York, which was about the middle of August, he found no part of either army disbanded; for, though orders had been issued to that purpose, yet the money, without which it could not be done, was not yet come to their hands; and because so great a sum could not be presently procured, as would satisfy both, an act of parliament had been passed, for the satisfaction of the principal officers of the king's army, by which they were promised payment, upon the public faith, in November following; till which time they were to respite it, and be contented that the common soldiers, and inferior officers, should be fully satisfied upon their disbanding.

During the time of the king's abode at York, which was not many days, the earl of Holland, lord general, made a suit to him for the making a baron; which, at that time, might have been worth to him ten thousand pounds. Whether the king apprehended the making an unfit man, who might disserve him in the house of peers; or whether he resolved to contain himself from enlarging that number, except upon an extraordinary relation to his own service, I know not: but he thought not fit, at that time, to gratify the earl: by which he took himself to be highly disobliged, (as the courtiers of that time took whatsoever was denied to them, as to be taken from them,) and having received some information, from sir Jacob Ashley and sir John Coniers, of some idle passages in the late tampering with the army to petition, which had not been before heard of; as soon as the king was gone towards Scotland (though his majesty hath since told me, "that he thought he had left the earl at parting in very good humour, and devotion to his service") he wrote a letter to the earl of Essex, to be communicated in parliament, "that he found there had been strange attempts made to pervert and corrupt the army, but, he doubted not, he should be able to prevent any mischief:" the whole sense being so mysterious, that it was no hard matter, after it was read in both houses, to persuade men, that it related to somewhat they had yet never heard; and being dated on the sixteenth day of August, which must be the time that the king was there, or newly gone, (for he took his journey from London on the tenth,) seemed to reflect on somewhat his majesty should have attempted. Hereupon their old fears are awakened, and new ones infused into the people; every man taking the liberty of making what interpretation they pleased of that which no man understood.

The papists were the most popular common-place, and the butt against whom all the arrows were directed; and so, upon this new fright, an order was made by both houses "for disarming all the papists in England:" upon which, and the like orders, though seldom any thing was after done, or no matter of moment, yet it served to keep up the fears and apprehensions in the people, of dangers and designs, and to disincline them from any reverence or affection to the queen, whom they began every day more implacably to hate, and consequently to disoblige. And, as upon those, and the like light occasions, they grew to a license of language, without the least respect of persons, of how venerable estimation soever; so they departed from any order or regularity in debate; or rules and measure in judging; the chief rulers amongst them first designing what they thought fit to be done, and the rest concluding any thing lawful, that they thought, in order to the doing or compassing the same: in which neither laws nor customs could be admitted to signify any thing against their sense.

I remember, about that time, in the providing money for the disbanding the armies, upon which they were marvellously solicitous, from the time that the king went towards the north, there arose a question, "Whether Wilmot, Ashburnham, and Pollard, should receive their pay due to them upon their several commands, lying under the charge of the plot, for bringing up, and corrupting the army;" very many passionately alleging, "that such men ought not to receive their pay, who had forfeited their trust:" yet there wanted not many who alleged, "that they had the security of an act of parliament for their payment, and that in justice it could not be detained from them; that, though they lay under the displeasure of the house, yet there was so far from a judgment, that there was not so much as a charge against them, but that they were at liberty under bail; and therefore they could not be said to have forfeited any thing that was their own." In this debate the house seemed equally divided, till one, who well knew what he said, told them, "that there could not be any reasonable pretence for detaining their due, as well for the reasons that had been given, as, that they were absolutely pardoned by the late act of oblivion, and pacification, between the two kingdoms:" the which was no sooner said, than many of those who were before inclined to the gentlemen, changed their opinions, and, without so much as calling to have the statute read, declared, "that they could have no benefit by that act of parliament, because then, the same might be as well applied to the archbishop of Canterbury." And so, without further weighing the law, or the reason, it was thought sufficient, not only to exclude them from that benefit, but to bar them from their money; lest they might be thought to be admitted to it for that reason, which might prove an advantage to another, to whom they had no inclination to be just. And no question, they had been overseen in the penning that statute; the words, in their true and genuine signification and extent, comprehending as well the archbishop of Canterbury, as those who at that time had no contempt of the security they reaped thereby.

Soon after the king went into Scotland, there being some motion "to adjourn the houses till after Michaelmas," which seemed to be generally inclined to, very many of both houses being willing to refresh themselves in the country, after so long absence from their homes, (the summer being far spent, and the plague increasing; of which some members had died: and others were in danger, having been in infected houses,) and conceiving, that there was no more to be done till the return of the king, save only the procuring money to finish the disbanding; went into the country: and others, who stayed in the town, were less solicitous to attend the public service; but betook themselves to those exercises and refreshments which were pleasanter to them: insomuch, as within twenty days after the king's remove, there were not above twenty lords, nor much above a hundred commoners, in both houses. But this was the advantage they looked for; those persons continuing (especially in the house of commons) to whose care and managery the whole reformation was committed. They now entered upon the consultation of the highest matters, both in church and state; and made attempts and entries upon those regalities and foundations, which have been since more evident in wider and more notorious breaches.

So when they assumed the power to control and reverse the license and power granted by the king to the Spanish ambassador, for transporting four thousand Irish soldiers upon the disbanding that army into Flanders, (as was before touched,) and to the French ambassador, for three thousand of the army disbanded here, for the service of that king; in debate whereof they used all license to look into the mysteries of state, and to weigh the interest of kingdoms, of which very few of them could be competent considerers, though they had been qualified by authority. In these irregular and undutiful contests, the French ambassador, whose business was to foment the jealousies between the king and people, had insinuated himself into that liberty of transporting men for his master's service, with no other design, than to be thereby enabled to contribute towards the affronting the king, by departing from it, to ingratiate the houses; and, therefore, having very particular intercourse and correspondence with the prime managers, as soon as upon their first addresses his majesty had signified his engagement to the two kings, and that he could not in honour recede from what he had promised, he voluntarily offered to acquit the king of that supply which concerned his master, if his majesty would likewise retract what was expected by the Spaniard; which gave them opportunity so importunately to press his majesty, who had no other counsel to consult with upon any despatches, but such as durst not contradict their overtures, (secretary Vane then waiting on him,) that he departed from his former resolutions and concessions; and so to common understanding disoblinded both crowns, with that disadvantage to himself, that both thereby found his want of power; and the Spaniard from thence (besides the inflammation of the correspondence with Portugal) took occasion to comply with those, who they found could do them hurt; whilst the French delighted themselves both with disappointing their enemy, and cozening their friends; to whom, in truth, they were more irreconcilable than to the other. Whether in that conjuncture of the affairs of Christendom, the resolution was well taken of supplying those two kings, or either of them, with soldiers at that time, or whether either kingdom could then well spare auxiliaries to another, I will not now consider; but the counsel being once taken, it was in view that the retracting of it by their advice, who naturally were not counsellors in those mysteries, and yet were very apt to extend and usurp the jurisdiction and right of advising, upon the least precedent of admission, would open a door to let in many bold desires, to the king's disadvantage.

From this liberty and success of advising what was fit to be done without the walls of the kingdom, with reference to the levies for France and Spain, they assumed the same freedom, of consulting and determining what was not fit, within the walls of the church; and finding their numbers to be so thin, that they might, by art or accident, prevail with the major part to be of their mind; and to gratify the more violent party of the reformers, (who, with great impatience, suffered themselves to be contained within any bounds or limits, by those who knew better how to conduct their business,) they entered upon debate of the Book of Common-Prayer, (which sure, at that time, was much revered throughout the kingdom,) and proposed, "in regard (they said) many things in it gave offence, at least umbrage, to tender consciences, that there might be liberty to disuse it:" which proposition was so ungracious, that, though it was made in a thin house, and pressed by those who were of the greatest power and authority, it was so far from being consented to, that by the major part (the house consisting then of about six score) it was voted, "that it should be justly and duly observed."

However, the next day, contrary to all rules and orders of parliament, very many being absent who had been active in that debate, they suspended that order; and resolved, "that the standing of the communion-table in all churches should be altered;" the rails (which in most places had been set up for the more decency) "should be pulled down; that the chancels should be levelled, and made even with all other parts of the church; and that no man should presume to bow at the name of Jesus," (which was enjoined by a canon, and of long usage in the church;) and having digested these godly resolutions into an order, they carried it up to the lords for their concurrence; promising themselves, that, from the small number which remained there, they should find no dissent. But the major part of the lords being much scandalized, that the house of commons should not only unseasonably, and irregularly, interpose in a matter of which they had not the least jurisdiction; but should presume to disturb the peace of the church, and interrupt the settled and legal government thereof, by such schismatical presumption, not only refused to join with them, but, instead thereof, directed an order, formerly made by the house of peers, (on the sixteenth of January before,) to be printed, to this effect: "that the divine service should be performed, as it is appointed by the acts of parliament of this realm; and that all such as shall disturb that wholesome order, shall be severely punished, according to the law;" and acquainted the commons therewith: who, nothing satisfied, pursued their former order; and, "commanding all the commons of England to submit to their direction, declared, that the order of the lords was made by the consent but of eleven lords, and that nine other lords did dissent from it; and, therefore, that no obedience should be given thereunto." Whereas the order had been made in full parliament, seven months before; and was seasonably ordered to be published, by the major part present, upon that important occasion. And such an arrainging the house of peers, for publishing an order in maintenance of the laws established, by those who had no authority to declare what the law was, nor a jurisdiction over those who should infringe the law, was so transcendent a presumption, and breach of privilege, that there was great expectation what the lords would do in their own vindication.

There was one clause in the act of pacification, "that there should be a public and solemn day of thanksgiving, for the peace between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland:" but no day being appointed for that act of indevotion, the lords and commons assumed the power to themselves of directing it; and, to that purpose, made an ordinance, as they called it, "that it should be observed on the seventh of September following, throughout the kingdom of England and dominion of Wales." Which was done accordingly; the factious ministers in all pulpits taking occasion then to magnify the parliament, and the Scots; and to infuse as much malignity into the people, against those who were not of that faction, as their wit and malice could suggest; the house of commons celebrating that day in the chapel at Lincoln's Inn; because the bishop of Lincoln, as dean of Westminster, had formed a prayer for that occasion, and enjoined it to be read on that day, in those churches [where he had jurisdiction]; which they liked not: both as it was formed, and formed by him; and so avoided [coming there].

After the solemnization of that day, and the making their declaration against the lords, about the order above mentioned, and the recommending some seditious, unconformable ministers, to be lecturers in churches about London, which the ministers were compelled to receive: when they had great apprehension, by their members leaving them, that they should not have forty remaining, (less than which number could not constitute a house of commons,) they consented to a recess; and on the ninth day of September, 1641, they adjourned themselves till the twentieth day of October following: either house irregularly (for the like had never before been practised) making a committee, to meet twice a week, and oftener, if they saw cause, during the recess, and to transact such business as they were authorized to do by their instructions.

The house of lords limited their committee (which consisted of the lords of Essex, Warwick, the lords Wharton, Kimbolton, and twelve more; but every three were as able to transact as the whole number) by their instructions, "only to open the letters which should come from the committee in Scotland, and to return answers to them; with power to recall that committee, when they thought fit; to send down monies to the armies; and to assist about their disbanding; and in removing the magazines from Berwick and Carlisle."

But the house of commons thought this power too narrow for their committee; and therefore against order too (for the power of the committees of both houses ought to have been equal) they qualified theirs (which consisted of Mr. Pym, Mr. Saint-John, Mr. Strode, sir Gilbert Gerrard, sir Henry Mildmay, sir Henry Vane, alderman Pennington, captain Venn, and others; every six having the authority of the whole) as well with [the] powers granted to the lords, as likewise, to go on in preparation of proceedings against such delinquents, as were voted or complained against in the house; and to receive any offers [of dis"covery] that they should make; to send to all "sheriffs, and justices of peace, upon information "of any riots, or tumults; to stir them up to their "duty in repressing them; and to report to their "house any failing in obedience to their sending; "to take the accounts of any accountants to his "majesty, in order to the preparations of his "majesty's revenue; to consider of framing and "constituting a West India company; and to consider the fishing, upon the coasts of England, "Scotland, and Ireland;" and many other extravagant particulars: which neither of both houses had to do with, but served to magnify the authority of that committee; and to draw resort and reverence to them from almost all sorts of men.

The houses being thus adjourned, the committee of the commons appointed Mr. Pym to sit in their chair; who, forthwith, with his own hand, signed the printed declarations before mentioned, of the ninth of September; and caused them to be so read in all churches in London, and throughout the counties. Whereupon the seditious and factious persons caused the windows to be broken down in churches; broke down the rails, and removed the table, (which, in many churches, had stood in that manner ever since the reformation,) and committed many insolent and scandalous disorders. And when the minister, and the graver and more substantial sort of inhabitants, used any opposition, and resisted such their license, they were immediately required to attend the committee; and, if they could be neither persuaded nor threatened to submit, their attendance was continued from day to day, to their great charge and vexation. If any grave and learned minister refused to admit into his church a lecturer recommended by them, (and I am confident, there was not, from the beginning of this parliament, one orthodox or learned man recommended by them to any church in England,) he was presently required to attend upon the committee; and not discharged till the houses met again; and then likewise, if he escaped commitment, continued, to his intolerable loss and trouble: few men having the patience to endure that oppression, against which they knew not whither to appeal; and therefore in the end submitted to what they could not resist; and so all pulpits were supplied with their seditious and schismatical preachers.

The armies were at last disbanded: and, about the end of September, the earl of Holland, in great pomp, returned to his house at Kensington; where he was visited and caressed, with great application, by all the factious party: for he had now, whether upon the disobligation remembered before, of being denied the making a baron; or upon some information, of some sharp expressions used by the queen upon his letter; and the conscience of that letter: or the apprehensions of being questioned and prosecuted upon the enormities of his office of chief justice in eyre, and other transgressions, fully declared himself of their party. And that they might be the better prepared to keep up the prejudice to the king, and the keenness against the court, till the coming together of both houses; when they had reason to believe the observation of their crooked and indirect courses, and their visible, unwarrantable breaches, upon the church, and the religion established by law, would render men less devoted to them; his lordship furnished them with many informations of what had passed in the late army, which might be wrested to the king's disadvantage; told them whatsoever the king himself had said to him, when he looked upon him as a person true to him; and when, it is very probable, he was not much delighted with the proceedings at Westminster; and of all the particulars, which sir Jacob Ashley, and sir John Coniers, had informed him, when they took him to be of entire trust with his majesty, and wholly under that consideration, (whereupon they were afterwards examined, and compelled to testify that in public, which they had before imparted to him in the greatest secrecy;) and added to all this, whatever information he had received by the lady Carlisle, of words or actions, spoken or done by the queen, which might increase their jealousy and malice to her majesty. And himself (who had been always believed a creature of the queen's, and exceedingly obliged and protected by her immediate and single grace and favour, against the earl of Portland, the earl of Strafford, and the archbishop of Canterbury, in those high times when they had otherwise destroyed him) visited her majesty but once, from the time of his return out of the north, to the time of the king's return from Scotland, which was full six weeks. And yet, there were some men still at those private meetings at Kensington, who thought the queen's favour a likelier means for their preferment, than the interest of the others; and therefore always gave advertisement to her of what passed in that company: which information, for want of due care in the managery, and by reason of the unfaithfulness of her nearest servants, commonly produced somewhat, of which the other side made greater advantage, than she could do by the knowledge of their counsels and resolutions.

The short recess of the parliament, though it was not much above the space of a month, was yet a great refreshment to those who had sat near a full year, mornings and afternoons, with little or no intermission; and in that warm region, where thunder and lightning was made. Some very unwarrantable proceedings, by the committee that sat during the recess, or Mr. Pym, who sat in the chair of that committee, and issued out those orders concerning the church, gave so much offence and scandal, that the members were like to meet together with more courage, and less inclinations to novelties, than they had parted with. But there were several accidents fell out, some from very little, and some from very great causes, which, though they may not seem precisely pertinent to this present discourse, had that influence upon the nature and spirits of men, and upon the actions of that time, that, for the better understanding some particular passages, which will appear pertinent, it will be even necessary, briefly, and it shall be but very briefly, to mention some of those, how foreign soever.

When the king went into Scotland; for the better preserving the correspondence between the two kingdoms, as was pretended; and to see all things performed, which were to be done in the parliament of Scotland, by the act of pacification; a small committee [as hath been before said] was appointed by the two houses, consisting of one lord and two commoners, to attend (as the phrase was) upon his majesty: but, in truth, to be a spy upon him; and to give the same assistance to the parliament there, upon any emergent occasion, as the Scottish commissioners had done here.

The person appointed by the lords, was the lord Howard of Escrick, a younger son of the house of Suffolk; who, in the time of the duke of Buckingham, married a niece of his; and having his whole dependence upon him, and being absolutely governed by him, was by him made a baron: but that dependence being at an end, his wife dead, and he without any virtue to promote himself, he withdrew himself from following the court, and, shortly after, from wishing it well; and had now delivered himself up, body and soul, to be disposed of by that party, which appeared most averse, and obnoxious, to the court and the government: and only in that confidence was designed to that employment; and to be entirely disposed and governed by the two members, who were joined with him by the house of commons, and they were, sir Philip Stapleton and Mr. Hambden.

The latter hath been mentioned before, as a man of great parts of understanding, and of great dexterity in nature and manners; and he must upon all occasions still be mentioned as a person of great utility, and equal to any employment or trust, good or bad, which he was inclined to undertake.

The other, sir Philip Stapleton, was a proper man, of a fair extraction; but, being a branch of a younger family, inherited but a moderate estate, about five hundred pounds the year, in Yorkshire; and, according to the custom of that country, [had] spent his time in those delights which horses and dogs administer. Being returned to serve in parliament, he concurred with his neighbours, Hotham and Cholmondeley; being much younger than they, and governed by them in the prosecution of the earl of Strafford; and so was easily received into the company and familiarity of that whole party which took that work to heart; and in a short time appeared a man of vigour in body and mind; and to be rather without good breeding, than not capable of it; and so he quickly outgrew his friends and countrymen in the confidence of those who governed: and they looked upon him, as worth the getting entirely to them; and not averse from being gotten; and so joined him with Mr. Hambden in this their first employment (and the first, that ever a parliament had of that kind) to be initiated under so great a master; whose instruction he was very capable of.

There had been, even from the time the Scottish army entered into England, many factions and jealousies amongst the principal persons of that nation; but none so much taken notice of, as that between the two earls, of Montrose, and Argyle. The former took himself to have deserved as much as any man, in contributing more, and appearing sooner, in their first approach towards rebellion; as indeed he was a man of the best quality, who did so soon discover himself; and, it may be, he did it the sooner, in opposition to Argyle; who being then of the king's council, he doubted not, would be of his party. The people looked upon them both, as young men of unlimited ambition; and used to say, "that they were like Cæsar and Pompey, the one would endure no superior, and the other would have no equal." True it is, that from the time that Argyle declared himself against the king (which was immediately after the first pacification) Montrose appeared with less vigour for the covenant; and had, by underhand and secret insinuations, made proffer of his service to the king. But now, after his majesty's arrival in Scotland, by the introduction of Mr. William Murray of the bedchamber, he came privately to the king; and informed him of many particulars, from the beginning of the rebellion; and, "that the "marquis of Hamilton was no less faulty, and "false towards his majesty, than Argyle;" and offered "to make proof of all in the parliament;" but rather desired, "to kill them both;" which he frankly undertook to do; but the king, abhorring that expedient, for his own security, advised, "that the proofs might be prepared for the parliament." When suddenly, on a Sunday morning, the city of Edinburgh was in arms; and Hamilton and Argyle both gone out of the town to their own houses; where they stood upon their guards; declaring publicly, "that they had withdrawn "themselves, because they knew that there was a "design to assassinate them; and chose rather to "absent themselves, than by standing upon their "defence in Edinburgh (which they could well "have done) to hazard the public peace and the "security of the parliament; which thundered on "their behalf."

The committee at Edinburgh despatched away an express to London, with a dark and perplexed account, in the morning that the two lords had left the city; with many doubtful expressions, "what the end of it would be;" not without some dark insinuations, as if the design might look farther than Scotland. And these letters were brought to London, the day before the houses were to come together, after the recess; all that party taking pains to persuade others, "that it "could not but be a design to assassinate more "men than those lords at Edinburgh."

And the morning the houses were to meet, Mr. Hyde being walking in Westminster-hall, with the earl of Holland and the earl of Essex, both the earls seemed wonderfully concerned at it; and to believe, "that other men were in danger of the "like assaults:" the other not thinking the apprehension worthy of them, told them merrily, "that "he knew well what opinions they both had of "those two lords, a year or two before, and he "wondered how they became so altered:" to which they answered smiling, "that the times and the "court was much altered since." And the houses were no sooner sat, but the report being made in the house of commons, and the committee's letter from Scotland being read, a motion was made, "to send to the house of peers, that the earl of "Essex, who was left by the king, general on this "side Trent, might be desired to appoint such a "guard, as he thought competent for the security "of the parliament, constantly to attend while the "houses sat;" which was done accordingly; and continued, till they thought fit to have other guards. All which was done to amuse the people, as if the parliament was in danger: when in Scotland all things were quickly pacified; and ended in creating the marquis Hamilton a duke, and Argyle a marquis.

There was another accident happened a little before, of which the indisposition in Scotland was the effect, the death of the earl of Rothes, a man mentioned before, of the highest authority in the contriving and carrying on the rebellion in Scotland, and now the principal commissioner in England, and exceedingly courted by all the party which governed. Whether he found that he had raised a spirit that would not be so easily conjured down again, and yet would not be as entirely governed by him as it had been; or whether he desired from the beginning only to mend his own fortune, or was converted in his judgment that the action he was engaged in was not warrantable, certain it is, that he had not been long in England, before he liked both the kingdom and the court so well, that he was not willing to part with either. He was of a pleasant and jovial humour, without any of those constraints which the formality of that time made that party subject themselves to; and he played his game so dexterously, that he was well assured upon a fair composition that the Scots' army should return home well paid, and that they should be contented with the mischief they had already done, without fomenting the distempers in England. He was to marry a noble lady of a great and ample fortune and wealth, and should likewise be made a gentleman of the king's bed-chamber, and a privy-counsellor; and upon these advantages made his condition in this kingdom as pleasant as he could; and in order thereunto, he resolved to preserve the king's power as high as he could in all his dominions. When any extraordinary accidents attend those private contracts, men naturally are very free in their censures, and so his sudden falling into a sickness, and from a great vigour of body, in the flower of his age, (for he was little more than thirty,) into a weakness, which was not usual, nor could the physicians discover the ground of it, administered much occasions of discourse; and that his countrymen too soon discovered his conversion. He was not able to attend upon his majesty to Scotland; where he was to have acted a great part; but he hoped to have been able to have followed him thither. His weakness increased so fast, that by the time the king was entered that kingdom, the earl died at Richmond, whither he retired for the benefit of the air; and his death put an end to all hopes of good quarter with that nation; and made him submit to all the uneasy and intolerable conditions there, they could impose upon him. Yet he returned from thence with some confidence that he should receive no more trouble from thence, the principal persons there having made him great acknowledgment, and greater professions; (for which he had given them all they could desire, and indeed all and more than he had to give;) and Lesley the general, whom he made earl of Leven, with precedence of all earls for his life, had told him voluntarily, and with an oath, that he would not only never serve against him, but would do him any service he should command, right or wrong.

There was a worse accident than all these, which fell out in the time of the king's stay in Scotland, and about the time of the two houses reconvening; which made a wonderful impression upon the minds of men; and proved of infinite disadvantage to the king's affairs, which were then recovering new life; and that was the rebellion in Ireland: which broke out about the middle of October, in all parts of the kingdom. Their design upon Dublin was miraculously discovered, the night before it was to be executed; and so the surprisal of that castle prevented; and the principal conspirators, who had the charge of it, apprehended.

In the other parts of the kingdom they observed the time appointed, not hearing of the misfortunes of their friends at Dublin. A general insurrection of the Irish spread itself over the whole country, in such an inhuman and barbarous manner, that there were forty or fifty thousand of the English protestants murdered, before they suspected themselves to be in any danger, or could provide for their defence, by drawing together into towns, or strong houses.

From Dublin, the lords justices, and council, despatched their letters by an express (the same man who had made the discovery, one O'Conelly, who had formerly been a servant to sir John Clotworthy) to London, to the earl of Leicester, then lord lieutenant of Ireland. From the parts of the north, and Ulster, an express was sent to the king himself, at Edinburgh; and the king's letters from thence, to the two houses, arrived within less than two days after the messenger from Dublin.

It was upon a Sunday night, that the letters from Dublin came to the earl of Leicester; who immediately caused the council to be summoned, and, as soon as it was met, informed them of the condition of Ireland; that is, so much as those letters contained: which were written, when little more was known than the discovery at Dublin; and what the conspirators had confessed upon their examinations. The house of peers had then adjourned itself to the Wednesday following; but the house of commons were to meet on the next day, Monday morning; and the council resolved, "that they would in a body go to the house of commons, as soon as it sat, and inform them of it;" which they did; notice being first given to the house, "that the lords of the council had some matters of importance to impart to them, and were above in the painted chamber ready to come to them:" whereupon chairs were set in the house for them to repose themselves, and the sergeant sent to conduct them. As soon as they entered the house, the speaker desired them to sit down; and then being covered, Littleton, lord keeper, told the speaker, "that the lord lieutenant of Ireland, having received letters from the lords justices and council there, had communicated them to the council; and since the house of peers was not then sitting, they had thought fit, for the importance of the letters, to impart them to that house;" and so referred the business to the lord lieutenant; who, without any enlargement, only read the letters he had received, and so the lords departed from the house.

There was a deep silence in the house, and a kind of consternation: most men's heads having been intoxicated, from their first meeting in parliament, with imaginations of plots, and treasonable designs, through the three kingdoms. The affair itself seemed to be out of their cognizance; and the communication of it served only to prepare their thoughts, what to do when more should be known; and when they should hear what the king thought fit to be done. And when the king's letters arrived, they were glad the news had come to him, when he had so good council about him to advise him what to do.

The king was not then informed of what had been discovered at Dublin: but the letters out of Ulster (which he sent to the parliament) gave him notice "of the general insurrection in the north; and of the inhuman murders committed there,

"upon a multitude of the protestants; and that sir Phelim O'Neil appeared as the general and commander in chief."

Upon which his majesty writ to the two houses, that he was satisfied that it was no rash insurrection, but a formed rebellion; which must be prosecuted with a sharp war; the conducting and prosecuting whereof he wholly committed to their care and wisdom, and depended upon them for the carrying it on; and that for the present he had caused a strong regiment of fifteen hundred foot, under good officers, to be transported out of Scotland into Ulster, for the relief of those parts; which were upon the matter wholly inhabited by Scots and Irish; there being fewer English [there], than in any part of Ireland.

This fell out to their wish; and thereupon they made a committee of both houses, "for the consideration of the affairs of Ireland, and providing for the supply of men, arms, and money, for the suppressing that rebellion;" the lord lieutenant of Ireland being one of the committee, which sat every morning in the painted chamber; and the lord lieutenant first communicated all the letters he received, to them to be consulted on, and to be thence reported to the two houses; which were hereby possessed of a huge power and dependence; all men applying themselves to them, that is, to the chief leaders, for their preferments in that war: the mischief whereof, though in the beginning little taken notice of, was afterwards felt by the king very sensibly.

These concurrent circumstances much altered and suppressed that good humour and spirit the houses were well disposed to meet with; and the angry men, who were disappointed of the preferments they expected, and had promised themselves, took all occasions, by their emissaries, to insinuate into the minds of the people, "that this rebellion in Ireland was contrived or fomented by the king, or, at least, by the queen, for the advancement of popery; and that the rebels published and declared, that they had the king's authority for all they did;" which calumny, though without the least shadow or colour of truth, made more impression upon the minds of sober and moderate men (who till then had much disliked the passionate proceedings of the parliament) than could be then imagined, or can yet be believed. So great a prejudice, or want of reverence, was universally contracted against the court, especially against the queen, whose power and activity was thought too great.

Shortly after the beginning of the parliament, there had been a committee appointed, "to prepare and draw up a general remonstrance of the state of the kingdom, and the particular grievances it had sustained;" but it scarce ever met, or was ever after mentioned. But now, the houses no sooner met after their recess, than Mr. Strode (one of the fiercest men of the party, and of the party only for his fierceness) moved, "that that committee might be revived, and ordered to meet;" for which, of course, a time and place was appointed: by which men easily discerned, that nothing of their fury was abated, and the less, in that they found their credit every day lessened in the house, by the opposition and contradiction they sustained. And men being thus disquieted; and knowing little; and so doubting much; every day produced a new discovery, of some new treason and plot against the kingdom. One day, "a letter from beyond seas, of great forces prepared to invade England;" then, "some attempt upon the life of Mr. Pym;" and no occasion omitted to speak of the evil council about the king; when scarce a counsellor durst come near him, or be suspected to hear from him; then an order must be framed to the marquis of Hertford, (governor to the prince,) to require him to take all care of his highness' person, and a motion that the king might be desired to make no privy-counsellor but such as the two houses might approve of, and many other such extravagancies, which, though they seemed then but the murmurings of inconsiderable persons, were artificially vented to try the pulse of the house, and whether they were sufficiently inflamed with the new discoveries.

After some days, a new bill was presented to the house of commons, "for the taking away the bishops' votes in parliament; and for disabling them to exercise any temporal office in the kingdom:" against which was objected, "that it was contrary to the course and order of parliament, that any bill that had been rejected should be again preferred the same session; and therefore that it ought not to be so much as read:" to which nothing was replied but noise; and "that this bill varied in some clauses from the former; and that the good of the kingdom absolutely depended upon it:" and so, by majority of voices, it was ordered to be read; and afterwards, without any equal opposition, passed the house, and was transmitted to the lords: the greatest argument being, "that their intermeddling with temporal affairs was inconsistent with, and destructive to, the exercise of their spiritual function." Whilst their reformation, both in Scotland and this kingdom, was driven on by no men so much as those of the clergy, who were their instruments. As, without doubt, the archbishop of Canterbury had never so great an influence upon the counsels at court, as Dr. Burgess and Mr. Marshall had then upon the houses; neither did all the bishops of Scotland together so much meddle in temporal affairs, as Mr. Henderson had done.

There being at this time the bishoprics of Worcester, Lincoln, Exeter, Chichester, and Bristol, void by death, or translation; the king, during the time of his being in Scotland, collated to those sees, Dr. Prideaux, the regius professor of divinity in Oxford; Dr. Winniff, dean of St. Paul's; Dr. Brownerigg, master of Catherine-hall in Cambridge; Dr. Henry King, dean of Litchfield; and Dr. Westfield, of Great St. Bartholomew's, London; all of great eminency in the church; frequent preachers; and not a man, to whom the faults of the then governing clergy were imputed, or against whom the least objection could be made.

As soon as the house of commons heard of this designation of his majesty's, (having then newly the second time sent up to the house of peers their bill to remove bishops from thence,) they were much troubled, that, at a time when they resolved to take away the old, the king should presume to make new bishops, and create so many voices to oppose the other; and therefore they moved very earnestly, "that the lords might be moved to join with them, in sending to the king, to make no new bishops till the controversy should be ended about the government of the church:" which appeared so unreasonable, that the wisest of them who wished it, apprehended no possibility, that the lords would join with them; or, if they did, that the king would be prevailed with. However, being glad to find their companions had so much mettle, after a long debate, the major part carried it, "that a committee should be appointed to draw up reasons to give the lords, to concur with them in that desire to the king:" but, after that, moved that stone no further.

In all debates of this nature, where the law, reason, and common sense, were in a diameter opposite to what they proposed, they suffered those who differed from them in opinion, and purposes, to say what they thought fit in opposition; and then, without vouchsafing to endeavour their satisfaction, called importunately for the question; well knowing that they had a plurality of voices to concur with them, in whatsoever they desired. I remember, in this last business, when it was voted that a committee should be named to draw up reasons, the committee being to be named, many of those who had during the debate positively argued against the thing, were called upon to be of that committee; and, amongst these, the lord Falkland, and Mr. Hyde, who stood up, and "desired to be excused from that service, where they could be of no use; having given so many reasons against it, that they could not apprehend any could be given for it; therefore they thought the work would be better done, if those, who had satisfied themselves with the reasonableness of what they wished, would undertake the converting and disposing of other men." There was a gentleman who sat by, (Mr. Bond of Dorchester; very severe, and resolved, against the church and the court,) [who,] with much passion and trouble of mind, said to them, "For God's sake be of the committee; you know none of our side can give reasons;" which made those that overheard him smile, though he spake it suddenly, and upon observation that their leaders were not then in the house. Otherwise, it cannot be denied, those who conducted them, and were the contrivers of the mischief, were men of great parts, and unspeakable industry; and their silence in some debates proceeded partly from pride, that it might appear their reputation and interest had an influence upon the sense of the house, against any rhetoric or logic: but principally from the policy they were obliged to use; for though they could have given a pregnant reason for the most extravagant overture they ever made, and evinced it, that it was the proper way to their end; but it being not yet time to discover their purposes, (how apparent soever they were to discerning men,) they were necessarily to give no reasons at all; or such as were not in truth the true ones.

This stratagem failing, of stopping the creation of the new bishops, they endeavour by all means to hasten the house of peers to despatch the work before them, before they should be qualified (their elections, confirmations, and consecrations, and other ceremonies, spending much time) to increase the number of the opposers; and for the better doing thereof, with great confidence, they demand of the lords, "that no recusant lord, or bishop, might have a vote in the passing that act: the last being parties; and the other not supposed competent judges on the behalf of the kingdom." But, when they found that logic could not prevail, (the demand being indeed so scandalous, that the house of peers, if they had not been fatally sotted, must have resented it as a high presumption, and insolent breach of privilege,) with more formality and colour, though as unreasonably, they pressed, "that those thirteen bishops, whom they had before impeached, for making the late canons; and upon whom their lordships themselves had passed notable votes," (such in truth as were fitter for accusers than judges, unparliamentary and unprecedented,) "might be sequestered from the house, till they should be brought to judgment." And for this, without any shame, they found lawyers in their house, who, prostituting the dignity and learning of their profession, to the cheap and vile affectation of popular applause, were not ashamed to aver custom and law for their senseless proposition. But the house of peers was not yet deluded enough, or terrified, (though too many amongst them paid an implicit devotion to the house of commons,) to comply in this unreasonable demand.

And here I cannot but with grief and wonder remember the virulency and animosity expressed upon all occasions, from many of good knowledge in the excellent and wise profession of the common law, towards the church and churchmen; taking all opportunities, uncharitably, to improve mistakes into crimes; and, unreasonably, to transfer and impute the follies and faults of particular men (swollen with ambition or corrupted with avarice) to the malignity of their order and function; and so whet and sharpen the edge of the law, to wound the church in its jurisdiction; and at last to cut it up by the roots, and demolish its foundation. It cannot be denied, that the peevish and petulant spirits of some clergymen have taken great pains to irreconcile that profession to them; and others as unskilfully (finding that in former times, when the religion of the state was a vital part of its policy, many churchmen were employed eminently in the civil government of the kingdom) imputed their wanting those ornaments their predecessors wore, to the power and prevalency of the lawyers; some principal men whereof, in all times, they could not but remember as avowed enemies of the church: and so believed the straitening and confining their profession must naturally extend and enlarge their own jurisdiction. Thence proceeded their bold and unwarrantable opposing and protesting against prohibitions, and other proceedings at law, on the behalf of ecclesiastical courts; and the procuring some orders and privileges from the king, on the behalf of that faculty; even with an exclusion of the other: as the archbishop of Canterbury prevailed with the king to direct, "that half the masters of the chancery should be always civil lawyers;" and to declare, "that no others, of what condition soever, should serve him as masters of request." Which was a great mistake: for, besides the stopping prohibitions was an envious breach upon the justice of the kingdom; which, at some time or other, will still be too hard for the strongest opposers and oppressors of it: I could never yet know, why the doctors of the civil laws were more of kin to the bishops, or the church, than the common lawyers were. To say that their places were in their disposal, as chancellors, commissaries, and the like; and, therefore, that their persons were more like to be at their disposal too, at least, to pay them greater reverence, concludes nothing: for they had all opportunity enough, and I think equal to oblige and create a dependence from the other profession; and I am persuaded, the stewardships to bishops, and of the lands of the church, which were to be managed by the rules of the common law, were not much inferior in profit to all the chancellorships in England. And for their affection and respect to their patrons, I believe, experience hath now manifested, that though many of the common lawyers have much indiscretion, injustice, and malice to repent of towards the church, the professors of the civil law have not been less active, to their skill and power, in the unnatural destruction of their mother; and then, where their policy may consist with justice, it will be no ill measure in making friendship, to look into the power of doing hurt and doing good, as well as into the faculty of judging; and it was apparent, that the civil law in this kingdom could neither help or hurt the church in any exigent, it being neither of reputation enough to advance it, or power to oppress it; whereas the professors of the other had always, by their interests, experience, abilities, and reputation, so great an influence upon the civil state, upon court and country, that they were notable friends or enemies; and then the dependence of the church was entirely upon that law, all their inheritance and estates (except their minute tithes) being only determinable by those rules; and by which they have seldom received eminent injustice. And truly, I have never yet spoken with one clergyman, who hath had the experience of both litigations, that hath not ingenuously confessed, "he had rather, in the respect of his trouble, charge, and satisfaction to his understanding, have three suits depending in Westminster-hall, than one in the arches, or any ecclesiastical court."

The particulars above mentioned were, I confess, to vulgar minds, great provocations and temptations to revenge; and, therefore, I do not at all wonder, that, in the great herd of the common lawyers, many pragmatistical spirits, whose thoughts and observations have been contracted to the narrow limits of the few books of that profession, or within the narrower circle of the bar-oratory, should side with the others, in the womanish art of inveighing against persons, when they should be reforming things: and that some, by degrees, having found the benefit of being of that opinion, (for we all remember, when papist and puritan lawyers got more money than their neighbours, for the opinions they had; not which they delivered,) grew, at last, to have fits of conscience in earnest; and to believe, that a parity in the church was necessary to religion, and not like to produce a parity in the state; the suspicion of which would quickly have wrought upon their divinity.

But, that learned and unbiassed (I mean unprovoked) men, in that science, who knew the frame and constitution of the kingdom, and that the bishops were no less the representative body of the clergy, than the house of commons was of the people; and, consequently, that the depriving them of voice in parliament, was a violence, and removing landmarks, and not a shaking (which might settle again) but dissolving foundations; which must leave the building unsafe for habitation: [that such men,] who knew the ecclesiastical and civil state was so wrought and interwoven together, and, in truth, so incorporated in each other, that like Hippocrates' twins, they cannot but laugh and cry together; and that the professors of the law were never at so great a height, as even in this time that they so unjustly envied the greatness of the church: and, lastly, [that they,] who might well know, that the great and unwieldy body of the clergy, consisting of such different tempers, humours, inclinations, and abilities, and which inevitably will have so strong an influence upon the natures and affections of the people, could never be regulated and governed by any magistrates, but of themselves; nor by any rules, but such power which the bishops exercised; whom (besides all arguments of piety, and submission to antiquity) experience of that blessed time since the reformation, not to be paralleled in any nation under heaven, declared to be the most happy managers of that power, whatsoever rankness and excrescence had proceeded from some branches: I say, that these knowing and discerning men (for such I must confess there have been) should believe it possible for them to flourish, and that the law itself would have the same respect and veneration from the people, when the well disposed fabric of the church should be rent asunder, (which, without their activity and skill in confusion, could never have been compassed,) hath been to me an instance of the Divine anger against the pride of both, in suffering them to be the fatal engines to break one another: which could very hardly have been oppressed by any other strength or power than their own.

And I cannot but say, to the professors of that great and admirable mystery, the law, (upon which no man looks with more affection, reverence, and submission,) who seem now, by the fury and iniquity of the time, to stand upon the ground they have won, and to be masters of the field; and, it may be, wear some of the trophies and spoils they have ravished from the oppressed; that they have yet but sharpened weapons for others to wound themselves; and that their own eloquence shall be applied to their own destruction. And, therefore, if they have either piety to repent and redeem the ill that they have wrought, or policy to preserve their own condition from contempt, and themselves from being slaves to the most abject of the people, they will wind up the church and the law into one bottom; and, by a firm combination and steady pursuit, endeavour to fix both to the same pinnacle, from whence they have been so violently ravished.

By this time the king was as weary of Scotland, as he had been impatient to go thither; finding all things proposed to him, as to a vanquished person, without consideration of his honour, or interest; and having not one counsellor about him, but the duke of Lenox, (who from the beginning carried himself by the most exact rules of honour, gratitude, and fidelity to him,) and very few followers, who had either affection to his person, or respect of his honour.

That which should have been an act of oblivion, was made a defence and justification of whatsoever they had done: their first tumults, and erecting their tables in opposition [to], and at last suppressing, both courts of justice and session; and the acts and orders of those tables, declared to be "the effects of their duty to his majesty; and according to the law of the land:" and so all those, who according to their allegiance had opposed and resisted them on the behalf of his majesty, and [were] qualified by his majesty's commissions, [were] adjudged criminal; and the only persons excepted from pardon, and exempted from the benefit of that oblivion.

The seditious acts of the assembly, which had expelled all bishops, and the canonical clergy, from being members of that assembly; and declared themselves to have a power "to inflict the censures of the church upon his majesty himself;" were declared "to be lawful, and according to the constitution of the kingdom; and the government of the church by archbishops and bishops, declared to be against the word of God, and an enemy to the propagation of the true reformed protestant religion; and therefore to be utterly abolished; and their lands given to the king, his heirs, and successors."

In consideration of the king's necessary absence from that his native kingdom, it was thought fit, "that the full and absolute government thereof should be committed to the lords of the secret council; who were likewise made conservators of the peace of the two kingdoms, during the intervals of parliaments;" and those lords and conservators "were then, and still, to be named by parliament, which was once in three years to assemble upon a day certain, without any summons from the king, if he neglected to publish such summons; and, upon the same reason, all great officers, as chancellor, treasurer, secretary, and the rest, nominated by parliament; and in the interval by the lords of the secret council;" without so much as being concerned in his majesty's approbation.

All which acts, and whatsoever else they were pleased to present to him, concerning church or state, the king confirmed; and thereby made the lord Lowden, who had been the principal manager of the rebellion, chancellor of Scotland; and created him likewise an earl; and conferred the other great offices, as he was directed: then he made the earl of Argyll (for he was still trusted with conferring of honours) marquis; their great general, Lesley, earl of Leven; and their lieutenant-general, earl of Calendar; and conferred other honours, according to the capacity and ability they had had in doing him mischief: and, lastly, (leaving all his own party to live, for he had procured a pardon for them from the parliament, upon condition "they came not near the king's presence; nor received any benefit from him, without their approbation,") he gave all the lands of the church, which had been devolved to him by their ruin, and whatsoever he had else to give, in that kingdom, to those who had discovered it not to be in good hands before: so that he seemed to have made that progress into Scotland, only that he might make a perfect deed of gift of that kingdom; which he could never have done, so absolutely, without going thither. And so, having nothing more to do there, he began his journey towards England about the middle of November.

It is not to be doubted, in consideration of those extravagant concessions, they made as extravagant promises to the king; that, by their loyal and dutiful comportment, his majesty should find no diminution of his power; that he should have the entire obedience of that nation, to preserve his full rights and regalities in England; and to reduce Ireland: the earl of Leven telling him, (as marquis Hamilton assured me, in his hearing,) "that he would not only never more serve against him, but that whenever his majesty would require his service, he should have it, without ever asking what the cause was;" and many of them whispering in his ear, and assuring him, "that as soon as the troubles of the late storm could be perfectly calmed, they would reverse and repeal whatsoever was now unreasonably extorted from him." And his majesty having never received any profit from Scotland, or other benefit than the reputation of a kingdom in his title, cared the less for what he parted with there: and, it may be, being resolved they should be no more charge to him in his court, (for sure he was then perfectly irreconciled to the whole nation,) he believed he should save more in this kingdom, than he had given in that; and he made no scruple, but that they were so full fed now, that they would not stir from home again, till the temper and affection of his people here should be better disposed for their reception.

But his majesty never considered, or not soon enough, that they could not reasonably hope to keep what they had so ill got, but by the same arts by which they were such gainers; and there cannot be a surer evidence of the continuance of an enemy, than the having received injuries from him, of a nature that do not use to be forgiven. Neither did he sufficiently weigh the unspeakable encouragement, and, in some particulars, the reasonable pretence the factious party here would have, from the prosperous wickedness of those there. And, it is certain, their number from thence increased wonderfully; the enemies of the church presuming their work was more than half done, when the king himself had declared, (for his consent to that act they would easily make appear to be such,) "that the government by archbishops, and bishops, was against the word of God, and the propagation of religion." Many concluding the king would at last yield to any thing, put themselves in company of the boldest and most positive askers; and some, who in their hearts abhorred what the Scots had done, yet disdaining to be overwitted by them; and that they should get more for themselves, and receive a greater argument of the king's trust, than we of this nation; out of pure malice to them, resolved to do the same things with them; and so joined and concurred in any exorbitances. All which the king too late discovered, by the entertainment he received upon his return.

About the time the news came of the king's being to begin his journey from Scotland upon a day appointed; and that he had settled all things in that kingdom to the general satisfaction; the committee for preparing the remonstrance offered their report to the house; which caused the draught they offered to be read. It contained a very bitter representation of all the illegal things which had been done, from the first hour of the king's coming to the crown, to that minute; with all those sharp reflections which could be made, upon the king himself, the queen, and council; and published all the unreasonable jealousies of the present government, of the introducing popery; and all other particulars, which might disturb the minds of the people; which were enough discomposed.

saying, "that it was very unnecessary, and unreasonable; unnecessary, all those grievances being already fully redressed; and the liberty and property of the subject being as well secured for the future, as could possibly be done: and then that it was very unseasonable, after the king had gratified them, with granting every thing which they had desired of him; and after so long absence, in the settling the disorders in another kingdom, which he had happily composed; to be now welcomed home with such a volume of reproaches, for what others had done amiss, and which he himself had reformed." Notwithstanding all which, all the other party appeared passionately concerned that it might not be rejected; and enlarged themselves with as high expressions against the government, as at first; with many insinuations, "that we were in danger of being deprived of all the good acts which we had gained, if great care and vigilance was not used, to disappoint some counsels which were still entertained;" making doubtful glances and reflections upon the rebellion in Ireland, (with which they perceived many good men were easily amused,) and in the end prevailed, "that a day should be appointed, when the house should be resolved into a grand committee, and the remonstrance to be then retaken into consideration;" and in the mean time they employed all their credit and interest with particular men, to persuade them, "that the passing that remonstrance was most necessary, for the preservation and maintenance of all those good laws which they had already made;" giving several reasons to several persons, according to their natures and inclinations; assuring many, "that they intended it only for the mortification of the court, and manifestation that that malignant party, which appeared to be growing up in the house, could not prevail;" and then "that it should remain still in the clerk's hands, and never be published."

And by these, and the like arts, they promised themselves, that they should easily carry it: so that the day it was to be resumed, they entertained the house all the morning with other debates, and towards noon called for the remonstrance; and it being urged by some, "that it was too late to enter upon it, with much difficulty they consented, that it should be entered upon the next morning at nine of the clock; and every clause should be debated, the speaker in the chair;" for they would not have the house resolved into a committee, which they believed would spend too much time. Oliver Cromwell (who, at that time, was little taken notice of) asked the lord Falkland, "Why he would have it put off, for that day would quickly have determined it?" He answered, "There would not have been time enough, for sure it would take some debate." The other replied, "A very sorry one:" they supposing, by the computation they had made, that very few would oppose it.

But he quickly found he was mistaken: for the next morning, the debate being entered upon about nine of the clock in the morning, it continued all that day; and candles being called for when it grew dark, (neither side being very desirous to adjourn it till the next day; though it was evident, very many withdrew themselves out of pure faintness and disability to attend the conclusion,) the debate continued, till after it was twelve of the clock, with much passion; and the house being then divided, upon the passing or not passing it, it was carried for the affirmative, by nine voices, and no more: and as soon as it was declared, Mr. Hambden moved, "that there might be an order entered for the present printing it;" which produced a sharper debate than the former. It appeared then, that they did not intend to send it up to the house of peers for their concurrence; but that it was upon the matter an appeal to the people; and to infuse jealousies into their minds. It had never been the intention to publish any debates, or determinations of the house, which were not regularly first transmitted to the house of peers; nor was it thought, in truth, that the house had authority to give warrant for the printing of any thing; all which was offered by Mr. Hyde, with some warmth, as soon as the motion was made for the printing it; and he said, "he did believe the printing it in that manner was not lawful; and he feared it would produce mischievous effects; and therefore desired the leave of the house, that if the question should be put, and carried in the affirmative, that he might have liberty to enter his protestation;" which he no sooner said, than Jeffery Palmer (a man of great reputation, and much esteemed in the house) stood up, and made the same motion for himself, "that he might likewise protest." When immediately together many afterwards, without distinction, and in some disorder, cried out, "They did protest:" so that there was after scarce any quiet and regular debate. But the house by degrees being quieted, they all consented, about two of the clock in the morning, to adjourn till two of the clock the next afternoon. And as they went out of the house, the lord Falkland asked Oliver Cromwell, "whether there had been a debate?" to which he answered, "that he would take his word another time;" and whispered him in the ear, with some asseveration, "that if the remonstrance had been rejected, he would have sold all he had the next morning, and never have seen England more; and he knew there were many other honest men of the same resolution." So near was the poor kingdom at that time to its deliverance.

And however they got this victory, they did not in a long time recover the spirits they lost, and the agony they had sustained, whilst it was in suspense; and they discerned well enough, that the house had not, at that time, half its members; though they had provided, that not a man of their party was absent; and that they had even then carried it by the hour of the night, which drove away a greater number of old and infirm opposers, than would have made those of the negative superior in number: so that they had little hope, in a fuller house, to prevail in any of their unjust designs, except they found some other expedient, by hopes or fears, to work upon the affections of the several members.

In order to which, they spent most part of the next day in their private consultations, how to chastise some of those who most offended them the day before; and resolved in the first place, not to suffer that precedent to be introduced into the house, "that men should protest against the sense of the house:" which, it is true, had not been used in the house of commons. And this subject was the more grateful to them, because they should hereby take revenge upon Mr. Hyde, whom they perfectly hated above any man; and to whose activity they imputed the trouble they had sustained the day before; and he was the first who made the protestation, that is, asked leave to do it; which produced the other subsequent clamour, that was indeed in some disorder. But here they differed amongst themselves; all the leading violent men, who bore the greatest sway, were most glad of the occasion, as it gave them opportunity to be rid of Mr. Hyde, which they passionately desired; but sir John Hotham, Cholmondeley, and Stapleton (who never severed, and had a numerous train which attended their motions) remembered the service Mr. Hyde had done against the court of York, (the overthrowing whereof was their peculiar glory,) and would not consent that they should question him; but were ready to concur with them in the prosecution of any other of the protesters; whereof there was number enough. This made so great difference amongst them, that for the present they agreed no further, than "that they would that afternoon only provide, that the next morning they would fall upon the matter;" and that then they might consult together at night, what person they would sacrifice.

And so about three of the clock, when the house met, Mr. Pym "lamented the disorder of the night before, which, he said, might probably have engaged the house in blood, and proceeded principally [from] the offering a protestation, which had been never before offered in that house, and was a transgression that ought to be severely examined, that mischief hereafter might not result from that precedent: and therefore proposed, that the house would the next morning enter upon that examination; and in the mean time, men might recollect themselves, and they, who used to take notes, might peruse their memorials; that the persons who were the chief causers of the disorder might be named, and defend themselves the best they could;" and with this resolution the house arose; the vexation of the night before being very visible in the looks and countenance of many. And that night's deliberation, nor all the artifice or importunity that could be used, could not remove the obstinate northern men from their resolution: and they declared positively, "that, if they prosecuted Mr. Hyde, they, and all their friends, would engage in his defence:" but the others would not incur the danger or inconvenience of such a schism; and so they unanimously agreed upon a third person, whom they would accuse.

The next morning they first enlarged upon the offence itself; "of the mischief it had like to have produced, and of the mischief it would unavoidably produce, if the custom or liberty of it was ever introduced; that it was the first time it had ever been offered in that house; and that care ought to be taken, that it should be the last; by the severe judgment of the house, upon those persons who had begun the presumption."

Mr. Hyde, who had then known nothing of the private consultation, and had many reasons to believe himself to be designed, stood up (notwithstanding some signs made to him at a distance by his northern friends, which he understood not) and said, "It concerned him to justify what he had done, being the first man who mentioned the protestation:" upon which there was a general noise and clamour "to withdraw;" (and as great "to speak:" upon which he proceeded, and said, "He was not old enough to know the ancient customs of that house; but, that he well knew, it was a very ancient custom in the house of peers; and leave was never denied to any man, who asked that he might protest, and enter his dissent, against any judgment of the house, to which he would not be understood to have given his consent: that he did not understand any reason, why a commoner should not have the same liberty, if he desired not to be involved in any vote, which he thought might possibly be inconvenient to him. That he had not offered his protestation against the remonstrance, though he had opposed [it] all he could, because it remained still within those walls; that he had only desired leave to protest against the printing it; which, he thought, was not in many respects lawful for them to do; and might prove very pernicious to the public peace.")

They were very much offended with all he said, and his confidence in speaking; and Mr. Strode could not contain himself from saying, "that that gentleman had confessed that he had first proposed the protestation; and, therefore, desired he might withdraw;" which many others likewise called for: till sir John Hotham appeared with some warmth against it; and young Hotham, his son, accused Jeffery Palmer "of giving the cause of disorder, by saying, I do protest, without asking the leave of the house, and encouraging [others] to cry out every man, I do protest:" whereupon they all fell into that noise and confusion; and so, without much more discourse, Mr. Palmer was called upon "to explain;" which as he was about to do, Mr. Hyde (who loved him much, and had rather have suffered himself, than that he should) spake to the orders of the house; and said, "that it was against the orders and practice of the house, that any man should be called upon to explain, for any thing he said in the house two days before; when it could not be presumed, that his own memory could recollect all the words he had used; or that any body else could charge him with them; and appealed to the house, whether there was any precedent of the like." And there is no doubt, there never had been; and it was very irregular. But they were too positively resolved not to be diverted; and, after two hours' debate, himself desiring, "that, to save the house further trouble, he might answer, and withdraw;" which he did. When it drew towards night, after many hours' debate, it was ordered, "that he should be committed to the Tower;" the angry men pressing, with all their power, "that he might be expelled the house;" having borne him a long grudge, for the civility he shewed in the prosecution of the earl of Strafford; that is, that he had not used the same reproachful language which the others had done: but they were at last glad to compound for his bare commitment to the Tower: from whence he was within few days enlarged, and returned again to the house. And in the close of that day, and the rising of the house, without much opposition, they obtained an order for the printing their remonstrance.

That remonstrance, after many clauses and unbecoming expressions were cast out, contained, "that there had been, from the beginning of his majesty's reign, a malignant and pernicious de“sign, of subverting the fundamental laws and principles of government, upon which the religion and justice of the kingdom was established: that the actors and promoters thereof were the jesuited papists; the bishops and corrupt part of the clergy; and such counsellors and courtiers, as had engaged themselves to further the interests of some foreign princes, or states, to the prejudice of the king and state at home; all which had endeavoured to raise differences and discontents betwixt the king and his people, upon questions of prerogative and liberty; to suppress the purity of religion, and such men as were best affected to it, as the greatest impediment to that change which they thought to introduce; to cherish and maintain those opinions in religion, which brought ours nearest and most agreeable to the papists; and to continue, multiply, and enlarge the differences between the protestants themselves, distinguishing between protestants and puritans, by introducing and countenancing such opinions and ceremonies, as were fittest for accommodation with popery; that so, of papists, Arminians, and libertines, they might compose a body fit to act such counsels and resolutions, as were most conducive to their own ends: and, lastly, to disaffect the king to parliaments, by slanders and false imputations, and so putting him upon other ways of supply, as of more advantage than the ordinary course of subsidies, which brought infinite loss to king and people, and caused the distractions which ensued.”

They remembered “the breach of the parliament at Oxford, in the first year of his majesty’s reign; and reproached his majesty with the fruitless voyage to Cadiz, at his first coming to the crown; the loss of Rochelle, by first suppressing their fleet with his own royal ships, by which the protestant religion in France infinitely suffered; the making a war with France precipitately, and a peace with Spain, without their consent, and so deserting the cause of the palatinate; and with a design to bring in German horse, to force the kingdom, by rigour, to submit to such arbitrary contributions, as should be required of them.”

They remembered him “of charging the kingdom by billeting of soldiers, and by raising coat and conduct money for those soldiers, in the second and third years of his reign; of his dissolving the parliament in his second year, after their declaration of an intent to grant five subsidies; and the exacting those five subsidies afterwards by a commission of loan; upon the refusal whereof, divers gentlemen and others were imprisoned, whereof some died, by the diseases they contracted in that imprisonment; of great sums raised by privy-seals; and of an attempt to set the excise on foot.”

They remembered “the dissolution of the parliament in the fourth year of his reign, and the untrue and scandalous declarations thereupon; the imprisoning divers members of that parliament after the dissolution, and detaining them close prisoners for words spoken in parliament; sentencing and fining them for those words; one of which died in prison, for want of ordinary refreshment, whose blood (they said) still cried for vengeance.”

They reproached his majesty “with injustice,

“oppression, and violence, which, after the breach of that parliament, broke in upon them, without any restraint or moderation; with the great sums of money he had exacted throughout the kingdom for default of knighthood, in the fourth year of his reign; with the receiving tonnage and poundage from the death of king James; and raising the book of rates, and laying new impositions upon trade; with the enlargement of forests, and compositions thereupon; the engrossing gunpowder, and suffering none to buy it without license; with all the most odious monopolies of soap, wine, salt, leather, sea-coal, and the rest,” (which had been granted from his majesty’s first coming to the crown, and some of them before,) “with the new tax of ship-money, and the ill-guarding the seas, and leaving the merchant naked to the violence of the Turkish pirates, notwithstanding that extraordinary and extravagant supply; with the vexations upon pretence of nuisances in building, and thereupon raising great sums of money for licenses to build; and of depopulation, that men might pay fines to continue the same misdemeanour; with the seizing the merchants’ money in the mint; and an abominable project of making brass money.”

They repeated “the extravagant censures of the star-chamber, whereby the subject had been oppressed by fines, imprisonments, stigmatizings, mutilations, whippings, pillories, gags, confinements, banishments; the severe and illegal proceedings of the council-table, and other new-erected judicatories; and the suspensions, excommunications, and deprivations of learned and pious ministers, by the high commission court; which grew to that excess of sharpness and severity, that they said it was not much less than the Romish inquisition.”

They reproached the king “with the liturgy and canons sent into Scotland, as an attempt upon the protestant religion; with the forcing that nation to raise an army in their own defence, and raising an army against them; with the pacification, and breach of that pacification; that he called a parliament after, in hope to corrupt it, and make it countenance the war with Scotland; which when he found it would not do, he dissolved it, and then committed members to prison; and compelled men to lend money against their wills; and imprisoned such as refused.”

They mentioned “the synod held by the bishops after the end of the parliament, and the canons and oath made by them; the raising the armies, here and in Ireland, against the Scots; and the liberal collection and contribution from the clergy, and the catholics, towards that war; all the favours that had been done to the papists; the reception and entertainment of signior Con, and the comte Rozetti, by the queen, from Rome; and some ministers sent by her majesty thither.”

In a word, they left not any error or misfortune in government, or any passionate exercise of power, unmentioned and unpressed; with the sharpest and most pathetic expressions to affect the people, that the general observation of the wisest, or the particular animosity of the most disoblged, or ill-affected person, could suggest, to the disadvantage of the king, from the death of his father, to the unhappy beginning of the present parliament.

Then they magnified their own services: "that having found the kingdom groaning under these difficulties, which seemed to be insuperable, they had, by the Divine Providence, overcome them all; that they [had] abolished ship-money, and all monopolies; and (which was the root of all those evils) had taken away that arbitrary power of taxing the subject, which was pretended to be in the king: that the living grievances, the evil counsellors, were so quelled, by the justice done upon the earl of Strafford; the flight of the lord Finch, and secretary Windebank; the accusation and imprisonment of the archbishop of Canterbury, and other delinquents; that it was not like to be only an ease to the present times, but a preservation to the future."

[They] reckoned "all the good laws, and the benefit the people received by those laws; spake of many good designs they had for the good of the kingdom;" but then complained "of oppositions, and obstructions, and difficulties, with which they were encountered, and which still lay in their way, with some strength, and much obstinacy; that there was a malignant party took heart again, that preferred some of their own agents and factors to degrees of honour, and to places of trust and employment. That they had endeavoured to work in his majesty ill impressions and opinions of their proceedings; as if they had done altogether their own work, and not his; and had obtained many things from him prejudicial to the crown, in respect of prerogative and profit. To wipe out which slander, they said, all they had done was for his majesty, his greatness, honour, and support: that, when they gave five and twenty thousand pounds a month, for the relief of the northern counties, in the support of the Scottish army, it was given to the king, for that he was bound to protect his subjects; and that, when they undertook the charge of the army, which cost above fifty thousand pounds a month, it was given to the king, for that it was his majesty's army, and the commanders and soldiers under contract with him; and that, when they undertook to pay their brethren of Scotland three hundred thousand pounds, it was to repair the damages and losses they had sustained by his majesty and his ministers; and that these particulars amounted to above eleven hundred thousand pounds."

Then they negligently and perfunctorily passed over his majesty's graces and favours, "as being little more than in justice he was obliged to grant, and of inconsiderable loss and damage to himself; and promised the good people shortly ease in the matter of protections, (by which the debts from parliament-men, and their followers, and dependents, were not recoverable,) and speedily to pass a bill to that purpose."

Then they inveighed against the malignant party, that had sought "to cause jealousies between them and their brethren of Scotland; and that had such a party of bishops and popish lords in the house of peers, as hindered the proceedings of divers good bills, passed in the commons' house, concerning sundry great abuses and corruptions both in church and state," (when, at that time, the house of peers had only refused to concur with them in two bills, that of the protestation; and, the taking away the votes of bishops out of the house of peers,) "that had attempted to disaffect and discontent his majesty's late army, and to bring it up against the parliament, and city of London; that had raised the rebellion in Ireland; and, if not by their wisdom prevented, had brought the like misery and confusion in this kingdom."

Then they declared, "that they meant to have a general synod of the most grave, pious, learned, and judicious divines of this island;" (when at that time there was not one orthodox divine of England in reputation with them;) "assisted by some from foreign parts, professing the same religion, who should consider of all things necessary for the peace and good government of the church; and present the result of their consultations to the parliament, to be there allowed and confirmed: that they would provide a competent maintenance for conscientious and preaching ministers throughout the kingdom: that they intended to reform and purge the fountains of learning, the two universities; that the streams flowing from thence might be clear and pure, and an honour and comfort to the whole land: that his majesty should be petitioned by both houses, to employ such counsellors, ambassadors, and other ministers, in managing his business at home and abroad, as the parliament might have cause to confide in; without which, they could not give his majesty such supplies for his own support, or such assistance for the protestant party beyond the seas, as was desired."

Withal they declared, "that the commons might have cause, often, justly to take exceptions at some men for being counsellors, and yet not charge those men with crimes; for that there are grounds of diffidence, which lie not in proof; and others, which though they may be proved, yet are not legally criminal; as to be a known favourer of papists; or to have been very forward in defending or countenancing some great offenders, questioned in parliament; or to speak contemptuously of either house of parliament, or parliamentary proceedings; or such as are suspected to get counsellors' places, or any other of trust concerning public employment, for money: that all good courses may be taken, to unite the two kingdoms of England and Scotland; to be mutually aiding and assisting one another, for the common good of the island, and the honour of both:" with some other particulars of this nature.

I know not how those men have already answered it to their own consciences; or how they will answer it to Him who can discern their consciences; who, having assumed their country's trust, and, it may be, with great earnestness laboured to procure that trust, by their supine laziness, negligence, and absence, were the first inlets to these inundations; and so contributed to those licenses which have overwhelmed us. For, by this means, a handful of men, much inferior in the beginning, in number and interest, came to give laws to the major part; and to shew that three diligent persons are a greater number in arithmetic, as well as a more significant number in logic, than ten unconcerned, they, by plurality of voices, in the end, converted or reduced the whole body to their opinions. It is true, men of activity and faction, in any design, have many advantages, that a composed and settled council, though industrious enough, usually have not; and some, that gallant men cannot give themselves leave to entertain: for, besides their through considering and forming their counsels before they begin to execute them, they contract a habit of ill nature and uningenuity necessary to their affairs, and the temper of those upon whom they are to work, that liberal-minded men would not persuade themselves to entertain, even for the prevention of all the mischief the others intend. And whosoever observed the ill arts, [by which] these men used to prevail upon the people in general; their absurd, ridiculous lying, to win the affections, and corrupt the understandings, of the weak; and the bold scandals, to confirm the wilful; the boundless promises they presented to the ambitious; and their gross, abject flatteries, and applications, to the vulgar-spirited; would hardly give himself leave to use those weapons, for the preservation of the three kingdoms.

The king besides had at that time a greater disadvantage (besides the concurrence of ill and extraordinary accidents) than himself, or any of his progenitors, had ever had before; having no servant of the house of commons, of interest, ability, and reputation, and of faithfulness and affection to his service: sir Thomas Jermyn, who was very honest to him, and of good abilities, through his indisposition of health, and trouble of mind for his son's misfortune, having left the house, and the court, and being retired into the country; and sir Harry Vane (who was the other only privy-counsellor) having committed those faults to the king, he knew could not be forgiven; and those faults to the country, could not be forgotten; gave himself entirely to the disposition of his new masters: and Mr. Saint-John, who at the beginning was made his solicitor general, [and] thereby had obliged himself, by a particular oath, "to defend his majesty's rights, and in no case to be of counsel, or give advice, to the prejudice of the king, and the crown;" was the chief instrument to devise and contrive all the propositions and acts of undutifulness towards him. So that, whilst these men, and their consorts, with the greatest deliberation, consulted, and disposed themselves to compass confusion; they, who out of the most abstracted sense of loyalty to the king, and duty to their country, severed from any relations to the king, or hopes from the court, preserved their own innocence, and endeavoured to uphold the good old frame of government, received neither countenance nor conduct from those who were naturally to have taken care of that province. And sure the raging and fanatic distempers of the house of commons (to which all other distempers are to be imputed) must most properly be attributed to the want of good ministers of the crown in that assembly, who being unawed by any guilt of their own, could have watched other men's; and informed, encouraged, and governed those, who stood well inclined to the public peace.

To which purpose, if that stratagem (though none of the best) of winning men by places, had been practised, as soon as the resolution was taken at York to call a parliament, (in which, it was apparent, dangerous attempts would be made; and that the court could not be able to resist those attempts,) and if Mr. Pym, Mr. Hambden, and Mr. Hollis, had been then preferred with Mr. Saint-John, before they were desperately embarked in their desperate designs, and had innocence enough about them, to trust the king, and be trusted by him; having yet contracted no personal animosities against him; it is very possible, that they might either have been made instruments to have done good service; or at least been restrained from endeavouring to subvert the royal building, for supporting whereof they were placed as principal pillars.

But the rule the king gave himself, (very reasonable at another time,) that they should first do service, and compass this or that thing for him, before they should receive favour, was then very unseasonable: since, besides that they could not in truth do him that service without the qualification, it could not be expected they would desert that side, by the power of which they were sure to make themselves considerable, without an unquestionable mark of interest in the other, by which they were to keep up their power and reputation: and so, whilst the king expected they should manifest their inclinations to his service, by their temper and moderation in those proceedings that most offended him; and they endeavoured, by doing all the hurt they could, to make evident the power they had to do him good; he grew so far disobliged and provoked, that he could not in honour gratify them; and they so obnoxious and guilty, that they could not think themselves secure in his favour: and thence, according to the policy and method of injustice, combined to oppress that power they had injured; and to raise a security for themselves, by disenabling the king to question their transgressions.

Notwithstanding all these contrivances to lessen the reputation of the court, (to which many other particulars contributed, which will be touched upon,) the city of London made great preparations to receive the king. Gourney, the lord mayor, was a man of wisdom and courage, and who expressed great indignation, to see the city so corrupted, by the ill artifices of factious persons; and therefore attended upon his majesty, at his entrance into the city, with all the lustre and good countenance it could shew; and as great professions of duty as it could make, or the king expect. And on Thursday, the five and twentieth of November, the king entered into London; where he was received with the greatest acclamations of joy, that had been known upon any occasion; and after a most magnificent entertainment, by sir Richard Gourney, lord mayor, at the guildhall; where the king, queen, prince, and the whole court of lords and ladies, were feasted; he was attended by the whole city to Whitehall, where he lodged that night; when the earl of Essex resigned his commission of general on this side Trent; which had been granted for the security of the kingdom, at his majesty's going into the north.

The next day, the king went to Hampton-court; and as soon as he came thither, took away the seals from sir Henry Vane, (having before taken his staff of treasurer of the [household] from him, and conferred it upon the lord Savile, in lieu of the presidentship of the north; which he should have had, if both houses had not declared that commission to be illegal;) then he appointed the guards that were kept at Westminster, for the security of the two houses, ever since the news out of Scotland, to be dismissed; and shortly after published a proclamation, "for obedience to be given to the laws established, for the exercise of religion."

These proceedings of his majesty much troubled them; and the entertainment given to him by the city of London, in which their entire confidence was, much dejected them; and made them apprehend, their friends there were not so powerful as they expected. However, they seemed to abate nothing of their mettle; and, shortly after his return, resolved to present their remonstrance, lately framed, to him, together with a petition; in which they complained "of a malignant party, which prevailed so far, as to bring divers of their instruments to be of his privy-council; and in other employments of trust and nearness about his majesty, the prince, and the rest of his children: to which malignant party, amongst other wickedness, they imputed the insurrection of the papists in Ireland; and therefore, for the suppressing that wicked and malignant party, they besought his majesty, that he would concur with his people, in a parliamentary way, for the depriving the bishops of their votes in parliament," (when at that time the bill to that purpose had not passed the house of peers,) "and abridging their immoderate power over the clergy: [and] for the removing unnecessary ceremonies, by which divers weak consciences had been scrupled; that he would remove from his council such persons as persisted to favour any of those pressures wherewith the people had been grieved; and that he would for the future employ such persons in the public affairs, and take such to be near him in places of trust, as his parliament might have cause to confide in; and that he would reject and refuse all mediation and solicitation to the contrary, how powerful and near soever; that he would forbear to alienate any of the forfeited and escheated lands in Ireland, which should accrue to the crown, by reason of this rebellion. Which desires of theirs being graciously fulfilled by his majesty, (they said,) they would apply themselves to such courses and counsels, as should support his royal estate with honour and plenty at home, with power and reputation abroad; and by their loyal affection and service lay a sure and lasting foundation of the greatness and prosperity of his majesty, and his royal posterity in future times."

This petition, together with the remonstrance, was presented at Hampton-court, on the first day of December; and within few days after, both the petition and remonstrance were by order printed, and with great industry published throughout the kingdom. Albeit the king, at the receipt thereof, desired and forbade them to publish either, till he should send his answer: which he did shortly after, expressing,

"How sensible he was of that disrespect: reprehending them for the unparliamentariness of their remonstrance; in point whereof," he said, "he would reserve himself to take such course, as he should think fit, in prudence and honour." But to their petition, he told them, "that if they would make that wicked and malignant party, whereof they complained, known to his majesty, he would be as ready to suppress and punish it, as they could be to complain; that by those

"counsellors, whom he had exposed to trial, he had given sufficient testimony, that there was no man so near unto him, in place or affection, whom he would not leave to the justice of the law, if they should bring sufficient proofs, and a particular charge against him: in the mean time, he wished them to forbear such general aspersions, as, since they named none in particular, might reflect upon all his council; that, for the choice of his counsellors, and ministers of state, it was the natural liberty all freemen have, and the undoubted right of the crown, to call such to his secret council, and public employment, as he should think fit; yet he would be careful to make election of such, as should have given good testimonies of their abilities and integrity, and against whom there [could] be no just cause of exception; that for the depriving the bishops of their votes in parliament, they should consider, that their right was grounded upon the fundamental law of the kingdom, and constitution of parliament."

"For what concerned religion, church government, and the removing unnecessary ceremonies, if the parliament should advise him to call a national synod, he should consider of it, and give them due satisfaction therein; declaring his resolution to maintain the doctrine and discipline established by law, as well against all invasions of popery, as from the irreverence of schismatics and separatists; wherewith, of late, this kingdom and this city abounds, to the great dishonour and hazard both of church and state; for the suppression of whom, his majesty required their timely and active assistance."

"To their desire concerning Ireland, he told them, he much doubted whether it were seasonable to declare resolutions of that nature, before the events of the war were seen: however, he thanked them for their advice; and conjured them to use all possible diligence and expedition in advancing the supplies thither; the insolence and cruelty of the rebels daily increasing."

The graciousness and temper of this answer made no impression on them; but they proceeded in their usual manner; framing and encouraging, underhand, those whispers, by which the rebellion in Ireland might be understood to receive some extraordinary countenance from the court of England, the scandal whereof, they knew, would quickly fall upon the queen.

And the diligence and dexterity of the lord mayor caused an address to be prepared to his majesty from the court of aldermen; which was sent by the two sheriffs, and two others of that body; by which his majesty was humbly desired to reside at "Whitehall:" which angered the governing party as much as the ceremonious reception had done. The petition was graciously received; all the aldermen knighted; and the court, within a day or two, removed to Whitehall.

The letters out of Ireland were very importunate for relief, of men, money, and provisions; the rebels very much increasing, and taking courage, from the slow proceeding here for their suppression: which indeed was not advanced equal to men's expectations; though the king, upon his first coming to the houses after his return from Scotland, with great earnestness recommended it to them. Only the propositions made from Scotland, "for the sending ten thousand men from "thence into Ulster, to be paid by the parliament," were consented to; whereby some soldiers were despatched thither, to defend their own plantation; and did in truth, at our charge, as much oppress the English that were there, as the rebels could have done; and had upon the matter the sole government of that province committed to them, the chief towns and garrisons, which were kept by English, being delivered into their hands. The lieutenant himself, the earl of Leicester, (who was now grown gracious to the managers,) made not that haste to his charge some men thought necessary; pretending "that the rebels had yet some apprehensions and terror of his coming thither with great forces, and provisions of all kinds; but that if they should hear he were landed, with so small a strength as was yet raised, and in no better equipage than he was yet able to go in, they would take courage and would oppress him, before more succours could come; by reason, that those who yet stood upon their guard, and publicly sided not with the rebels, (till, by the resistance and opposition they found prepared for them, they might guess who was like to prevail,) would then freely declare, and join with the rest."

The slow levies of men was imputed to the difficulty of getting volunteers; their numbers, who had commissions, upon beating their drums, rising very inconsiderably: and therefore they prepared a bill for pressing; which quickly passed the commons' house, and was sent up to the lords. It cannot be supposed, that there could be then a scarcity of men, or that it could be hard, within three months after the disbanding the northern army, to gather together as many men as they had occasion to use: but their business was to get power, not men; and therefore this stratagem was used, to transfer the power of impressing men from the king to themselves; and to get the king, that he might be now able to raise men for Ireland, to disenable himself from pressing upon any other occasion. For, in the preamble of this bill, which they sent up to the lords, (as they had done before in the first act for tonnage and poundage,) they declared, "that the king had in no case, or upon any occasion, but the invasion from a foreign power, authority to press the freeborn subject; which could not consist with the freedom and liberty of his person."

This doctrine was new to the lords, and contrary to the usage and custom of all times; and seemed a great diminution of that regal power, which was necessary for the preservation of his own subjects, and assistance of his allies; which in many cases he was bound to yield. And the attorney general took the courage "to desire the lords," (as he should often have done in other cases,) "that he might be heard on the king's behalf, before they consented to a clause so prejudicial to the king's prerogative." This necessary stop was no sooner made, than the commons laid aside the consideration of Ireland; ordered their committee "to meet no more about that business;" the levies, which were then making of volunteers, stood still; and they declared, "that the loss of Ireland must be imputed to the lords." On the other side, the lords too well understood that logic, to be moved by it; and were rather sensible of the inconveniences they had incurred by their former compliance, than inclined to repeat the same error.

In the mean time, letters came every day from Ireland, passionately bemoaning their condition; and multitudes of men, women, and children, who were despoiled of their estates, and forced into this kingdom for want of bread, spake more lamentably than the letters. In this strait, they knew not what to do; for whatever discourse they pleased themselves with, concerning the lords, it was evident the fault would lie at their own doors; besides that, his majesty might take that occasion, to take the whole business out of their hands, and manage it himself by his council; which would both lessen their reputation and interest, and indeed defeat much that they had projected.

Hereupon, Mr. Saint-John, the king's solicitor, (a man that might be trusted in every company,) went privately to his majesty; and seemed to him much troubled "at the interruption given by the commons; and to consent, that the preamble was unreasonable, and ought to be insisted [against] by the lords, on the behalf of his majesty's prerogative: however, he told him, since he thought it impossible to rectify the commons in their understandings, it would be a great blessing to his majesty, if he could offer an expedient to remove that rub, which must prove fatal to Ireland in a short time; and might grow to such a disunion between the two houses, as might much cloud the happiness of this kingdom; and, undoubtedly, could not but have a very popular influence upon both, when both sides would be forwarder to acknowledge his majesty's great wisdom and piety, than they could be now made to retract any thing that was erroneous in themselves;" and then "advised him to come to the houses; and to express his princely zeal for the relief of Ireland; and taking notice of the bill for pressing, depending with the lords, and the dispute raised, concerning that ancient and undoubted prerogative, to avoid further debate, to offer, that the bill should pass with a salvo jure, both for the king and people; leaving such debates to a time that might better bear it."

Which advice his majesty followed; and coming to the house, said the very words he had proposed to him. But now their business was done, (which truly, I think, no other way could have been compassed,) the divided lords and commons presently unite themselves in a petition to the king; "acknowledging his royal favour and protection to be a great blessing and security to them, for the enjoying and preserving all those private and public liberties and privileges which belong unto them; and whensoever any of those liberties or privileges should be invaded, they were bound, with humility and confidence, to resort to his princely justice for redress and satisfaction; because the rights and privileges of parliament were the birthright and inheritance, not only of themselves, but of the whole kingdom, wherein every one of his subjects was interested: that amongst the privileges of parliament, it was their ancient and undoubted right, that his majesty ought not to take notice of any matter in agitation and debate, in either house of parliament, but by their information and agreement; and that his majesty ought not to propound any condition, provision, or limitation, to any bill, or act, in debate or preparation, in either house of parliament; or to declare his consent or dis-

"sent, his approbation or dislike, of the same, before it be presented to him in due course of parliament. They declared, that all those privileges had been lately broken, to their great sorrow and grief, in that speech which his majesty had made to them; wherein he took notice of a bill for pressing of soldiers, not yet agreed upon; and offered a salvo jure, and provisional clause, to be added to it, before it was presented to him: and therefore they besought him, by his royal power to protect them, in those and the other privileges of his high court of parliament; and that he would not, for the time to come, break or interrupt them; and that, for the reparation of them in that their grievance and complaint, he would declare and make known the name of such person, by whose misinformation, and evil counsel, his majesty was induced to the same, that he might receive condign punishment. And this they did desire, and, as his greatest and most faithful council, did advise his majesty to perform, as a great advantage to him, by procuring and confirming a confidence and unity betwixt his majesty and his people," &c.

And having delivered this petition, they no more considered Ireland, till this manifest breach should be repaired; which they resolved nothing should do, but the passing the bill: and therefore, when the king offered them, by a message sent by the earl of Essex, "that he would take care, by commissions which he would grant, that ten thousand English volunteers should be speedily raised for the service of Ireland, if the houses would declare that they would pay them;" the overture was wholly rejected; they neither being willing that such a body of men should be raised by the king's direction, (which would probably be more at his devotion than they desired,) nor in any other way than they proposed: and so in the end (after other ill accidents intervening, which will be remembered in order) he was compelled to pass the bill for pressing, which they had prepared.

However, for all this, and the better, it may be, for all this, the king, upon his arrival at Whitehall, found both his houses of parliament of a much better temper than they had been; many having great indignation to see his majesty so ill treated by his own servants, and those who were most obliged to his bounty and magnificence; and likewise to discern how much ambition and private interest was covered under public pretences. They who were in truth zealous for the preservation of the law, the religion, and true interest of the nation, were solicitous to preserve the king's honour from any indignity, and his regal power from violation; and so always opposed those who trencched upon either, and who could compass their ends by no other means than by trampling upon both. So that, in truth, that which was called the king's party, in both houses, was made up of persons who were strangers, or without any obligation, to the court; of the best fortunes, and the best reputation, in their several countries where they were known; as having always appeared very zealous in the maintenance of their just rights, and opposed, as much as in them lay, all illegal and grievous impositions: whilst his own privy-council, (two or three only excepted,) and much the greater number of all his own servants, either publicly opposed, or privately betrayed him; and so much the more virulently abhorred all those who now appeared to carry on his service, because they presumed to undertake, at least to endeavour, (for they undertook nothing, nor looked for any thanks for their labour,) to do that which they ought to have done; and so they were upon this disadvantage, that whenever they pressed any thing in the house, which seemed immediately to advance the king's power and authority, some of the king's council, or his servants, most opposed it, under the notion "of being prejudicial to the king's interest:" whilst they who had used to govern and impose upon the house, made show of being more modest, and yet were more silent [insolent]; and endeavoured, by setting new counsels on foot, to entangle, and engage, and indeed to overreach the house; by cozening them into opinions which might hereafter be applicable to their ends, rather than to pursue their old designs, in hope to obtain in the end a success by their authority. The night of the remonstrance had humbled them in that point: and from that time, they rather contrived ways to silence those who opposed them, by traducing them abroad, and taking any advantage against them in the house, for any expressions they used in debate which might be misinterpreted; and so calling them to the bar, or committing them to the Tower: which did in truth strike such a terror into the minds of many, that they forbore to come to the house, rather than expose themselves to many uneasinesses there.

There was at this time, or thereabout, a debate started in the house, as if by mere chance, which produced many inconveniences after; and, if there had not been too many concurrent causes, might be thought the sole cause and ground of all the mischiefs which ensued. Upon some report, or discourse of some accident, which had happened upon or in the disbanding the late army, an obscure member moved, "That the house would enter upon the consideration, whether the militia of the kingdom was so settled by law, that a sudden force, or army, could be drawn together, for the defence of the kingdom, if it should be invaded, or to suppress an insurrection or rebellion, if it should be attempted."

The house kept a long silence after the motion, the newness of it amusing most men, and few in truth understanding the meaning of it; until one and another of the members, who were least taken notice of, seeming to be moved by the weight of what had been said, enlarged upon the same argument: and in the end it was proposed, "That a committee might be appointed, to consider of the present state of the militia, and the power of it; and to prepare such a bill for the settling it, as might provide for the public peace, and for the suppressing any foreign enemy, or domestic insurrection."

And hereupon they were inclined to nominate a committee, to prepare such a bill as should be thought necessary: upon which Mr. Hyde spake against the making any such committee; said, "There could be no doubt, that the power of the militia resided in the king, in whom the right of making war and peace was invested; that there had never yet appeared any defect of power, by which the kingdom had been in danger, and we might reasonably expect the same security for the future." With which the house seemed well satisfied and composed, and inclined to resume some other debate, until Saint-John, who was then the king's solicitor, and the only man in the house of his learned council, stood up, and said, "He could not suffer that debate, in which there had been so many weighty particularities mentioned, to be discontinued without some resolution: that he would be very glad there were that power in the king, (whose rights he was bound to defend,) as the gentleman who spake last seemed to imagine; which, for his part, he knew there was not; that the question was not about taking any power from the king, which was vested in him, (which was his duty always to oppose,) but to inquire, whether there be such a power in him, or any where else, as is necessary for the preservation of the king and the people, in many cases that may fall out; and if there be not, then to supply him with that power and authority;" and he said, "he did take upon him with confidence to say, that there was a defect of such power and authority:" he put them in mind, "how that power had been executed in the age in which we live; that the crown had granted commissions to great men, to be lord lieutenants of counties; and they to gentlemen of quality, to be their deputy lieutenants; and to colonels, and other officers, to conduct and list soldiers; and then he wished them to consider, what votes they had passed, of the illegality of all those commissions, and the unjustifiableness of all the proceedings which had [been] by virtue of those commissions; so that let the occasion or necessity be what it would, he did presume, no man would hereafter execute any such commission; and if there were any men so hardy, that nobody would obey them; and therefore desired them to consider, whether there be not a defect of power, and whether it ought not to be supplied."

It was now evident enough, that the debate had not begun by chance, but had been fully deliberated; and what use they would make, upon occasions, of those volumes of votes, they had often poured out upon all accidental debates; and no man durst take upon him to answer all that had been alleged, by saying, all those votes were of no validity; and that the king's right was, and would be, judged the same it had been before, notwithstanding those votes; which is very true: but this being urged by the king's own solicitor, they appointed him "to bring in and prepare such a bill as he thought necessary;" few men imagining that such a sworn officer would not be very careful and tender of all his master's prerogatives, which he was expressly sworn to defend.

Within few days after, he brought in a very short bill, in which was mentioned by way of preface, "That the power over the militia of the kingdom was not settled in any such manner, that the security of the kingdom was provided for, in case of invasion or insurrection, or such like accidents;" and then an enacting clause, "That henceforward the militia, and all the power thereof, should be vested in — &c." and then a large blank left for inserting names; and afterwards, the "absolute authority to execute — &c." The ill meaning whereof was easily understood; and with some warmth pressed, "That by this bill all the power would be taken out of the crown, and put into the hands of commissioners." To which the solicitor made answer, "That the bill took no power from any body who had it, but was provided to give power where it "was not; nor was there mention of any commissioners; but a blank was therefore left, that the house might fill it up as they thought fit, and put the power into such hands as they thought proper; which, for aught he knew, might be the king's; and he hoped it would be so."

And with this answer the bill was received, notwithstanding all opposition, and read; all those persons who had formerly been deputy lieutenants, and lay under the terror of that vote, presuming, that this settlement would provide for the indemnity of all that had passed before; and the rest, who might still be exposed to the same hazards, if they should be required to act upon the like occasions, concurring in the desire, that somewhat might be done for a general security; and they who had contrived it, were well enough contented that it was once read; not desiring to prosecute it, till some more favourable conjuncture should be offered: and so it rested.

About this time, the king not being well satisfied in the affection or fidelity of sir William Balfour, whom he had some years before, to the great and general scandal, and offence of the English nation, made lieutenant of the Tower; and finding that the seditious preachers every day prevailed in the city of London, and corrupted the affections and loyalty of the meaner people towards the government of church and state; resolved to put that place (which was looked upon as a bridge upon the city) into the hands of such a man upon whom he might rely: and yet, he was willing to be quit of the other, without any act of disobligation upon him; and therefore gave him three thousand pounds, ready money, which was raised by the sale of some of the queen's own jewels: and immediately caused colonel Lunsford to be sworn in his place, lieutenant of the Tower.

This was no sooner known, than the house of commons found themselves concerned in it; and upon pretence "that so excellent a person as sir William Balfour" (who in truth was very gracious to them, for the safe keeping the earl of Strafford) "could not be removed from that charge, but upon some eminent design against the city and the kingdom; and that the man who was appointed for his successor was a person of great license, and known only by some desperate acts; for which he had been formerly imprisoned by the state, and having made his escape, fled the kingdom: they desired the lords to join with them in a petition to the king, to put the Tower into better hands;" making such arguments against the person of the man, as before spoken of. The lords replied to them, "That it was an argument of that nature, they thought not themselves competent advisers in it; the custody of the Tower being solely at the king's disposal, who was only to judge of the fitness of the person for such a charge." But at the same time that they refused to join in a public desire to the king, they caused privately advice to be given to him, "that he should make choice of a fitter person, against whom no exceptions could be made." For indeed sir Thomas Lunsford was not then known enough, and of reputation equal to so envious a province; and thereupon, within two or three days at most, he resigned the place, and the king constituted sir John Byron in the place.

This gave them no satisfaction in the change, since it had no reference to their recommendation ; which they only looked after : but it gave them great delight, to see that the king's counsels were not so fixed, but their clamour might alter them ; and that doing hurt, being as desirable a degree of power [to some men] as doing good, and likely to gain them more proselytes, they had marred a man, though they could not make one. And without doubt, it was of great disadvantage to the king, that that counsel had not been formed with such deliberation, that there would need no alteration ; which could not be made, without a kind of recognition.

All this time the bill depended in the lords' house, "for the taking away the votes of bishops," and removing them from the house of peers ;" which was not like to make a more prosperous progress there, than it had six months before ; it being evident, that the jurisdiction of the peerage was invaded by the commons ; and therefore, that it was not reasonable to part with any of their supporters. But the virulence against them still increased ; and no churches frequented, but where they were preached against, as antichristian ; the presses swelled with the most virulent invectives against them ; and a sermon was preached at Westminster, and afterwards printed, under the title of The Protestation Protested, by the infamous Burton, whereby he declared, "That all men were obliged " by their late protestation, by what means soever, " to remove both bishops and the common prayer " book out of the church of England, as impious " and papistical : " whilst all the learned and orthodox divines of England were looked upon under the notion of scandalous ministers ; and if the meanest and most vicious parishioner they had could be brought to prefer a petition against either of them to the house of commons, (how false soever,) he was sure to be prosecuted as such.

In the end, a petition was published, in the name " of the apprentices, and those whose apprentice- " ships were lately expired," in and about the city of London ; and directed, "To the king's most excellent majesty in the parliament now assembled ; shewing, That they found by experience, both by " their own and masters' tradings, the beginning " of great mischiefs coming upon them, to nip them " in the bud, when they were first entering into the " world ; the cause of which they could attribute to " no others but the papists, and the prelates, and " that malignant party which adhered to them : " that they stood solemnly engaged, with their " utmost of their lives and fortunes, to defend his " sacred majesty and royal issue, together with the " rights and liberties of parliaments, against papists, and popish innovators ; such as archbishops, " bishops, and their dependents, appear to be. They " desired his majesty in parliament to take notice, " that notwithstanding the much unwearied pains " and industry of the house of commons, to sub- " due popery, and popish innovators ; neither is " popery yet subdued, nor prelates are yet re- " moved ; whereby many had taken encourage- " ments desperately to plot against the peace and " safety of his dominions : witness the most bar- " barous and inhuman cruelties perpetrated by the " papists in Ireland ; from whence (they said) a " new spring of fears and jealousies arose in them : " and therefore they desired, that the popish lords, " and other eminent and dangerous papists, in all " parts of the kingdom, might be looked unto,

" and secured ; the laws against priests and jesuits " fully executed ; and the prelacy rooted up : that " so the work of reformation might be prosperously " carried on ; their distracting fears removed ; that " the freedom of commerce and trade might pass " on more cheerfully, for the encouragement of the " petitioners," &c.

This, and such stuff, being printed, and scattered amongst the people ; multitudes of mean people flocked to Westminster-hall, and about the lords' house ; crying, as they went up and down, No bishops, no bishops, "that so they might carry on " the reformation."

I said before, that upon the king's return from Scotland, he discharged the guards that attended upon the houses. Whereupon the house of commons (for the lords refused to join with them) petitioned the king, "in regard of the fears they had " of some design from the papists, that they might " continue such a guard about them as they thought " fit."

To which his majesty answered, " That he was " confident they had no just cause of fear ; and " that they were as safe as himself and his chil- " dren : but, since they did avow such an appre- " hension of danger, that he would appoint a suf- " ficient guard for them." And thereupon directed the train-bands of Westminster and Middlesex (which consisted of the most substantial house- holders, and were under known officers) in fit numbers to attend.

This security was not liked ; and it was asked, Quis custodiet ipsos custodes --- ? And when the disorderly rabble, spake of now, first came down, they resisted them, and would not suffer them to disturb the houses ; and some of them, with great rudeness, pressing to the door of the house of peers, their lordships appointed the guard to be called up to remove them ; and the earl of Dorset, being then lord lieutenant of Middlesex, (the crowd oppressing him, and refusing to leave the room,) in some passion, called upon the guard "to give fire upon " them ;" whereupon the rabble, frightened, left the place, and hasted away.

The house of commons, much incensed that their friends should be so used, much inveighed against the earl of Dorset ; and talked " of accus- " ing him of high treason ;" at least, " of drawing " up some impeachment against him ;" for some judgment he had been party to in the star-chamber, or council-table : and so giving these hints of their displeasure, that he might have the more care hereafter to carry himself ; they concluded, that since they could not have such a guard as pleased them, they would have none at all : and so sent to the lords " for the discharge of the train-bands " that attended : " who willingly consented to it ; which was done accordingly : the house of commons declaring, " That it should be lawful for " every member to bring his own servants, to " attend at the door, armed with such weapons as " they thought fit."

It was quickly understood abroad, that the commons liked well the visitations of their neighbours : so that the people assembled in greater numbers than before, about the house of peers ; calling still out with one voice, No bishops, no popish lords : crowded and affronted such lords as came near them, and whom they knew affected not their ends, calling them rotten-hearted lords.

Hereupon the house of peers desired a conference with the commons; at which they complained of these tumults; and told them, "that such disorders would be an imputation upon the parliament, and make it be doubted, whether they had freedom; and so might happily become a blemish to those many good laws they had already passed, as well as prevent the making more: and therefore desired them, that they would, for the dignity of parliaments, join with them in a declaration, for the suppressing such tumults." This was reported to the commons; and as soon laid aside, "for the handling of other matters of more importance."

The tumults continued; and their insolences increased; insomuch, as many dissolute and profane people went into the abbey at Westminster, and would have pulled down the organs, and some ornaments of the church; but being resisted, and by force driven out, they threatened, "they would come with greater numbers, and pull down the church."

Hereupon the lords again sent to the house of commons, to join with them in their declaration; and many members of that house complained, "that they could not come with safety to the house; and that some of them had been assaulted, and very ill entreated, by those people that crowded about that door." But this could not be procured; the debate being still put off to some other time; after several speeches had been made in justification of them, and commendation of their affections: some saying, "they must not discourage their friends, this being a time they must make use of all friends;" Mr. Pym himself saying, "God forbid the house of commons should proceed, in any way, to dishearten people to obtain their just desires in such a way."

In the end, the lords required the advice of the judges, "what course was legally to be taken, to suppress and prevent those disorders;" and thereupon directed the lord keeper of the great seal, "to issue out a writ, upon the statute of Northampton, to the sheriff and justices, to appoint strong watches in such places as they judged most convenient, to hinder that unlawful confux of people to Westminster, to the disturbance of their consultations." Which writ issuing accordingly, the justices of the peace, in obedience thereunto, appointed the constables to attend at the water side, and places near about Westminster, with good watches, to hinder that tumultuous resort.

This was no sooner done, than the constables were sent for, and, after the view of their warrants, required to discharge their watches. And then the justices [were] convened, and examined; and albeit it appeared, that what they had done was in pursuance of a legal writ, directed to them under the great seal of England, by the advice of the lords in parliament, without so much as conferring with the lords upon that act of theirs, the setting such a watch was voted to be "a breach of privilege;" and one of the justices of the peace, who, according to his oath, had executed that writ, was committed to the Tower for that offence.

Upon this encouragement, all the factious and schismatical people about the city and suburbs assembled themselves together with great license; and would frequently, as well in the night as the day, convene themselves, by the sound of a bell, or other token, in the fields, or some convenient place, to consult, and receive orders from those by whom they were to be disposed. A meeting of this kind being about the time we speak of in Southwark, in a place where their arms and magazine for that borough was kept; the constable, being a sober man, and known to be an enemy to those acts of sedition, went amongst them, to observe what they did: he was no sooner espied, but he was reproached with disdainful words, beaten and dragged in so barbarous a manner, that he hardly escaped with his life. Complaint was made to the next justices; and oath of the truth of the complaint made: whereupon a writ was directed to the sheriff, to impanel a jury, according to the law, for the inquisition and examination of that riot.

This was complained of in the house of commons, as an act that concerned their privileges: for that it was pretended, "that meeting in Southwark had been by godly and well affected men, only to draw up and prepare a petition against bishops; and that the constable, being a friend to bishops, came amongst them to cross them, and to hinder men from subscribing that whole some petition." And upon this discourse, without any further examination, an order was made by that house, "that the under-sheriff of Surrey should be enjoined, not to suffer any proceedings to be made upon any inquisition, that might concern any persons who met together to subscribe a petition to be preferred to that house."

By this, and other means, all obstacles of the law being removed, and the people taught a way to assemble lawfully together, in how tumultuous a manner soever, and the Christmas holidays giving more leave and license to all kind of people, the concourse grew more numerous about Westminster; the people sometimes, in their passage between the city and Westminster, making a stand before Whitehall, and crying out, No bishops, no bishops, no popish lords, would say aloud, "that they would have no more porter's lodge, but would speak with the king when they pleased:" and, where they came near the two houses, took out papers from their pockets, and getting upon some place higher than the rest, would read the names of several persons, under the title of disaffected members of the house of commons; and called many lords, false, evil, and rotten-hearted lords. But their rage and fury against the bishops grew so high, that they threatened to pull down the lodgings where they lay; offered to force the doors of the abbey at Westminster, which were kept locked many days, and defended by a continual guard within; and assaulted the persons of some of the bishops in their coaches; and laid hands on the archbishop of York, in that manner, that, if he had not been seasonably rescued, it was believed they would have murdered him: so that all the bishops, and many other members, of both houses, withdrew themselves from attending in the houses, out of a real apprehension of endangering their lives.

These insurrections by this means were so countenanced, that no industry or dexterity of the lord mayor of London, sir Richard Gourney, could give any check to it [them]; but, instead thereof, himself (with great and very notable courage opposing all their fanatic humours, both in the court of aldermen, and at the common council) grew to be reckoned in the first form of the malignants, (which was the term they imposed upon all those they meant to render odious to the people,) inasmuch, as his house was no less threatened and disquieted by the tumults, than the house of lords: and when he apprehended some of those who were most notorious in the riot, and committed them to the custody of both the sheriffs of London in person, to be carried to Newgate, they were, by the power and strength of their companions, rescued from them in Cheapside, and the two sheriffs compelled to shift for their own safety. And when it was offered to be proved, by a member in the house of commons, that the wife of captain Venn, (having received a letter from her husband to that purpose,) who was one of the burgesses for London, and was known himself to lead those men, that came tumultuously down to Westminster, and Whitehall, at the time of the passing the bill of attainder of the earl of Strafford, had with great industry solicited many people to go down with their arms to Westminster, upon a day, (that was named,) when, she said, her husband had sent her word, that in the house of commons they were together by the ears, and that the worse party was like to get the better of the good party; and therefore her husband desired his friends to come with their arms to Westminster, to help the good party; and that thereupon very many in a short time went thither: they, who offered to make proof of the same, were appointed to attend many days; but, notwithstanding all the importunity that could be used, were never admitted to be heard.

All this time the king (who had been with great solemnity invited from [by] the city of London, and desired to make his residence nearer to them than Hampton-court) was at Whitehall, where, besides his ordinary retinue, and menial servants, many officers of the late disbanded army, who solicited their remainder of pay from the two houses, which was secured to them by act of parliament, and expected some farther employment in the war with Ireland, upon observation, and view of the insolence of the tumults, and the danger, that they might possibly bring to the court, offered themselves for a guard to his majesty's person; and were with more formality and ceremony entertained by him, than, upon a just computation of all distempers, was by many conceived seasonable. And from these officers, warm with indignation at the insolences of that vile rabble, which every day passed by the court, first words of great contempt, and then, those words commonly finding a return of equal scorn, blows were fastened upon some of the most pragmatical of the crew. This was looked upon by the house of commons like a levying war by the king, and much pity expressed by them, that the poor people should be so used, who came to them with petitions, (for some few of them had received some cuts and slashes, that had drawn blood,) and that made a great argument for reinforcing their numbers. And from those contestations, the two terms of roundhead and cavalier grew to be received in discourse, and were afterwards continued for the most succinct distinction of affections throughout the quarrel: they who were looked upon as servants to the king being then called cavaliers; and the other of the rabble contemned, and despised, under the names of round-heads.

The house of commons being at this time without any member, who, having relation to the king's service, would express any zeal for it, and could take upon him to say to others, whom he would trust, what the king desired, or to whom they who wished well could resort for advice and direction; so that whilst there was a strong conjunction and combination to disturb the government by depraving it, whatever was said or done to support it, was as if it were done by chance, and by the private dictates of the reason of private men; the king resolved to call the lord Falkland, and sir John Colepepper, who was knight of the shire for Kent, to his council; and to make the former secretary of state in the place of Vane, that had been kept vacant; and the latter chancellor of the exchequer, which office the lord Cottington had resigned, that Mr. Pym might be put into that office, when the lord Bedford should have been treasurer, as is mentioned before. They were both of great authority in the house; neither of them of any relation to the court; and therefore what they said made the more impression; and they were frequent speakers. The lord Falkland was wonderfully beloved by all who knew him, as a man of excellent parts, of a wit so sharp, and a nature so sincere, that nothing could be more lovely. The other was generally esteemed as a good speaker, being a man of an universal understanding, a quick comprehension, a wonderful memory, who commonly spake at the end of the debate; when he would recollect all that had been said of weight on all sides with great exactness, and express his own sense with much clearness, and such an application to the house, that no man more gathered a general concurrence to his opinion than he; which was the more notable, because his person, and manner of speaking, were ungracious enough; so that he prevailed only by the strength of his reason, which was enforced with confidence enough. His infirmities were known only to his nearest friends, or those who were admitted into his most intimate conversation.

The king knew them to be of good esteem in the house, and good affections to his service, and the quiet of the kingdom; and was more easily persuaded to bestow those preferments upon them, than the lord Falkland was to accept that which was designed to him. No man could be more surprised than he was, when the first insinuation was made to him of the king's purpose: he had never proposed any such thing to himself, nor had any veneration for the court, but only such a loyalty to the person of the king as the law required from him. And he had naturally a wonderful reverence for parliaments, as believing them most solicitous for justice, the violation whereof, in the least degree, he could not forgive any mortal power: and it was only his observation of the uningenuity and want of integrity in this [parliament], which lessened that reverence to it, and which had disposed him to cross and oppose their designs: he was so totally unacquainted with business, and the forms of it, that he did believe really he could not execute the office with any sufficiency. But there were two considerations that made most impression upon him; the one, lest the world should believe, that his own ambition had procured this promotion; and that he had therefore appeared signally in the house to oppose those proceedings, that he might thereby render himself gracious to the court: the other, lest the king should expect such a submission, and resignation of himself, and his own reason, and judgment, to his commands, as he should never give, or pretend to give; for he was so severe an adorer of truth, that he could as easily have given himself leave to steal as to dissemble; or to suffer any man to think that he would do any thing, which he resolved not to do; which he thought a more mischievous kind of lying, than a positive averring what could be most easily contradicted.

It was a very difficult task to Mr. Hyde, who had most credit with him, to persuade him to submit to this purpose of the king cheerfully, and with a just sense of the obligation, by promising, that in those parts of the office, which required most drudgery, he would help him the best he could, and would quickly inform him of all the necessary forms. But, above all, he prevailed with him, by enforcing the ill consequence of his refusal to take the office, which would be interpreted to his dislike of the court, and his opinion, that more would be required from him than he could honestly comply with, which would bring great prejudice to the king: on the other hand, the great benefit that probably would redound to the king, and the kingdom, by his accepting such a trust in such a general defection, by which he would have opportunity to give the king a truer information of his own condition, and the state of the kingdom, than it might be presumed had been given to him, and to prevent any counsels, or practice, which might more alienate the affections of the people from the government; and then, that by this relation he would be more able to do the king service in the house, where he was too well known to have it believed, that he attained to it by any unworthy means or application. And in the end, he was persuaded to submit to the king's good pleasure, though he could not prevail upon himself to do it with so good a grace, as might raise in the king any notable expectation of his departing from the severity of his own nature.

And so they [he and Colepepper] were both invested in those offices, to the no small displeasure of the governing party, which could not dissemble their indignation, that any of their members should presume to receive those preferments, which they had designed otherwise to have disposed of. They took all opportunities to express their dislike of them, and to oppose any thing they proposed to them. And within few days there came a letter out in print, pretended to be intercepted, as written from a Roman catholic to another of the same profession, in which he gives an account, "That they had at last, by the interest of their friends, procured those two noble persons" (who are mentioned before) "to be preferred to those offices, and that they were well assured that they would be ready to do them, and all their friends, all good offices." Sir John Colepepper thought fit to take notice of it in the house, and to make those professions of his religion, which he thought necessary. But the lord Falkland chose rather to condemn it, without taking any notice of the libel, well knowing that he was superior to those calumnies, as indeed he was; all of that profession knowing that he was most irreconcilable to their doctrine, though he was always civil to their persons. However grievous this preferment was to the angry part of the house, it was very grateful to all those, both within and without the house, who wished well to the king and to the kingdom.

The king at the same time resolved to remove

another officer, who did disserve him notoriously, and to prefer Mr. Hyde to that place; with which his gracious intentions his majesty acquainted him; but he positively refused it, and assured him, "That he should be able to do much more service in the condition he was in, than he should be, if that were improved by any preferment, that could be conferred upon him at that time;" and he added, "that he had the honour to have much friendship with the two persons, who were very seasonably advanced by his majesty, when his majesty's service in the house of commons did, in truth, want some countenance and support; and by his conversation with them, he should be so well instructed by them, that he should be more useful to his majesty, than if he were under a nearer relation and dependence." The king, with a very gracious countenance, told him, "that he perceived he must, for some time, defer the laying any obligation upon him: but bade him be assured he would find both a proper time, and a suitable preferment for him, which he should not refuse. In the mean time, he said, he knew well the friendship that was between the two persons, whom he had taken to his council, and him; which was not the least motive to him to make that choice; and that he would depend as much at least upon his advice, as upon either of theirs; and therefore wished that all three would confer together, how to conduct his service in the house, and to advise his friends how to carry themselves most to the advantage of it, and to give him constant advertisement of what had passed, and counsel when it was fit for him to do any thing; and declared, that he would do nothing, that in any degree concerned, or related to, his service in the house of commons, without their joint advice, and exact communication to them of all his own conceptions;" which, without doubt, his majesty did at that time steadfastly resolve, (though in very few days he did very fatally swerve from it,) and so giving him the liberty to repair to either of their majesties in the same place, whenever he thought fit, he was very graciously dismissed.

By what hath been said before, it appears, that the lord Digby was much trusted by the king, and he was of great familiarity and friendship with the other three, at least with two of them; for he was not a man of that exactness, as to be in the entire confidence of the lord Falkland, who looked upon his infirmities with more severity than the other two did; and he lived with more frankness towards those two, than he did towards the other: yet between those two there was a free conversation and kindness to each other. He was a man of very extraordinary parts by nature and art, and had surely as good and excellent an education as any man of that age in any country: a graceful and beautiful person; of great eloquence and becomingness in his discourse, (save that sometimes he seemed a little affected,) and of so universal a knowledge, that he never wanted subject for a discourse: he was equal to a very good part in the greatest affair, but the unfittest man alive to conduct it, having an ambition and vanity superior to all his other parts, and a confidence peculiar to himself, which sometimes intoxicated, and transported, and exposed him. He had from his youth, by the disobligations his family had undergone from the duke of Buckingham, and the great men who succeeded him, and some sharp reprehension himself had met with, which obliged him to a country life, contracted a prejudice and ill-will to the court; and so had in the beginning of the parliament engaged himself with that party which discovered most aversion from it, with a passion and animosity equal to their own, and therefore very acceptable to them. But when he was weary of their violent counsels, and withdrew himself from them with some circumstances which enough provoked them, and made a reconciliation, and mutual confidence in each other for the future, manifestly impossible; he made private and secret offers of his service to the king, to whom, in so general a defection of his servants, it could not but be very agreeable: and so his majesty being satisfied, both in the discoveries he made of what had passed, and in his professions for the future, removed him from the house of commons, where he had rendered himself marvellously ungracious, and called him by writ to the house of peers, where he did visibly advance the king's service, and quickly rendered himself grateful to all those who had not thought too well of him before, when he deserved less; and men were not only pleased with the assistance he gave upon all debates, by his judgment and vivacity, but looked upon him as one, who could derive the king's pleasure to them, and make a lively representation of their good demeanour to the king, which he was very luxuriant in promising to do, and officious enough in doing as much as was just.

He had been instrumental in promoting the three persons above mentioned to the king's favour; and had himself, in truth, so great an esteem of them, that he did very frequently, upon conference together, depart from his own inclinations and opinions, and concurred in theirs; and very few men of so great parts are, upon all occasions, more counsellable than he; so that he would seldom be in danger of running into great errors, if he would communicate and expose all his own thoughts and inclinations to such a disquisition; nor is he uninclined in his nature to such an entire communication in all things which he conceived to be difficult. But his fatal infirmity is, that he too often thinks difficult things very easy; and doth not consider possible consequences, when the proposition administers somewhat that is delightful to his fancy, and by pursuing whereof he imagines he shall reap some glory to himself, of which he is immoderately ambitious; so that, if the consultation be upon any action to be done, no man more implicitly enters into that debate, or more cheerfully resigns his own conceptions to a joint determination: but when it is once affirmatively resolved, (besides that he may possibly reserve some impertinent circumstance, as he thinks, the imparting whereof would change the nature of the thing,) if his fancy suggests to him any particular, which himself might perform in that action, upon the imagination that every body would approve it, if it were proposed to them, he chooses rather to do it, than to communicate, that he may have some signal part to himself in the transaction, in which no other person can claim a share.

And by this unhappy temper he did often involve himself in very unprosperous attempts. The king himself was the unfittest person alive to be served by such a counsellor, being too easily inclined to sudden enterprises, and as easily amazed when they were entered upon. And from this unhappy composition in the one, and the other, a very unhappy counsel was entered upon, and resolution taken, without the least communication with either of the three, [who] had been so lately admitted to an entire trust.

The bishops, who were, in this manner [before spoken of], driven and kept from the house of peers, and not very secure in their own, could not have the patience to attend the dissolution of this storm, which in wisdom they ought to have done: but considering right and reason too abstractly, and what in justice was due, not what in prudence was to be expected, suffered themselves implicitly to be guided by the archbishop of York, who was of a proud, restless, overweening spirit, to such an act of indiscretion, and disadvantage to themselves, that all their enemies could not have brought upon them. This bishop, as is said, was a man of a very imperious and fiery temper, Dr. Williams, who had been bishop of Lincoln, and keeper of the great seal of England in the time of king James. After his removal from that charge, he had lived splendidly in his diocese, and made himself very popular amongst those who had no reverence for the court; of which he would frequently, and in the presence of many, speak with too much freedom, and tell many stories of things and persons upon his own former experience; in which, being a man of great pride and vanity, he did not always confine himself to a precise veracity; and did often presume, in those unwary discourses, to mention the person of the king with too little reverence. He did affect to be thought an enemy to the archbishop of Canterbury; whose person he seemed exceedingly to contemn, and to be much displeased with those ceremonies and innovations, as they were then called, which were countenanced by the other; and had himself written and published in his own name, and by his own authority, a book against the using those ceremonies, in which there was much good learning, and too little gravity for a bishop. His passion and his levity gave every day great advantages to those who did not love him; and he provoked too many, not to have those advantages made use of: so that, after several informations against him in the star-chamber, he was sentenced for no less crimes than for perjury and subornation of perjury, and fined in a great sum of money to the king, and committed prisoner to the Tower, without the pity or compassion of any, but those, who, out of hatred to the government, were sorry that they were without so useful a champion; for he appeared to be a man of a very corrupt nature, whose passions could have transported him into the most unjustifiable actions.

He had a faculty of making relations of things done in his own presence, and discourses made to himself, or in his own hearing, with all the circumstances of answers and replies, and upon arguments of great moment; all which, upon examination, were still found to have nothing in them that was real, but to be the pure effect of his own invention. After he was sentenced in the star-chamber, some of his friends resorted to him, to lament and condole with him for his misfortune; and some of them seemed to wonder that, in an affair of such a nature, he had not found means to have made some submission and composition, that might have prevented the public hearing, which proved so much to his prejudice in point of reputation, as well as profit. He answered them with all the formality imaginable, "that they had reason indeed to wonder at him upon the event; but when they should know how he had governed himself, he believed they would cease to think him worthy of blame." And then related to them, "that as soon as publication had passed in his cause, and the books were taken out, he had desired his council (who were all able men, and some of them very eminent) in the vacation time, and they at most leisure, to meet together, and carefully to look over, and peruse all the evidence that was taken on both sides; and that then they would all attend him such a morning, which he appointed, upon their consent, at his own house at Westminster: that they came at the time appointed; and being then shut up in a room together, he asked them, whether they had sufficiently perused all the books, and were thoroughly informed of his case? To which they all answered, that they had not only read them all over together, but had severally, every man by himself, perused [them] again, and they believed they were all well informed of the whole. That he then told them, he had desired this conference with them, not only as his council, by whose opinion he meant to govern himself, but as his particular friends, who, he was sure, would give him their best advice, and persuade him to do every thing as they would do themselves, if they were in his condition. That he was now offered to make his peace at court, by such an humble submission to the king, as he was most inclined and ready to make; and which he would make the next day after his cause was heard, though he should be declared to be innocent, of which he could make no doubt: but that which troubled him for the present was, that the infamously of the charge against him, which had been often exposed, and enlarged upon in several motions, had been so much taken notice of through the kingdom, that it could not consist with his honour to divert the hearing, which would be imputed to his want of confidence in his innocence, since men did not suspect his courage, if he durst rely upon the other; but that he was resolved, as he said before, the next day after he should be vindicated from those odious aspersions, he would cast himself at the king's feet, with all the humility and submission, which the most guilty man could make profession of. It was in this point he desired their advice, to which he would, without adhering to his own inclination, entirely conform himself; and therefore desired them, singly in order, to give him their advice. He repeated the several and distinct discourse every man had made, in which he was so punctual, that he applied those phrases, and expressions, and manner of speech to the several men, which they were all taken notice of frequently to use; as many men have some peculiar words in discourse, which they are most delighted with, or by custom most addicted to: and in conclusion, that they were unanimous in their judgments, that he could not, with the preservation of his honour, and the opinion of his integrity, decline the public hearing; where he must be

"unquestionably declared innocent; there being no crime or misdemeanour proved against him in such a manner, as could make him liable to censure: they all commended his resolution of submitting to the king, as soon as he had made his innocence to appear; and they all advised him to pursue that method. This, he said, had swayed him; and made him decline the other expedient, that had been proposed to him."

This relation wrought upon those to whom it was made, to raise a prejudice in them against the justice of the cause, or the reputation of the council, as they were most inclined; whereas there was not indeed the least shadow of truth in the whole relation; except that there was such a meeting and conference, as was mentioned, and which had been consented to by the bishop, upon the joint desire and importunity of all the council; who, at that conference, unanimously advised and desired him, "to use all the means and friends he could, that the cause might not be brought to hearing; but that he should purchase his peace at any price; for that, if it were heard, he would be sentenced very grievously, and that there were many things proved against him, which would so much reflect upon his honour and reputation, and the more for being a bishop, that all his friends would abandon him, and be ever after ashamed to appear on his behalf." Which advice, with great passion and reproaches upon the several persons for their presumption and ignorance in matters so much above them, he utterly and scornfully rejected. Nor indeed was it possible, at that time, for him to have made his peace; for though, upon some former addresses and importunity on his behalf, by some persons of power, and place in the court, in which the queen herself had endeavoured to have done him good offices, the king was inclined to have saved him, being a bishop, from the infamy he must undergo by a public trial; yet the bishop's vanity had, in those conjunctures, so far transported him, that he had done all he could to have it insinuated, "that the court was ashamed of what they had done; and had prevailed with some of his powerful friends to persuade him to that composition:" upon which the king would never hear more any person, who moved on his behalf.

It had been once mentioned to him, whether by authority, or no, was not known, "that his peace should be made, if he would resign his bishopric, and deanery of Westminster," (for he held that in commendam), "and take a good bishopric in Ireland;" which he positively refused; and said, "he had much to do to defend himself against the archbishop here: but if he were in Ireland, there was a man (meaning the earl of Strafford) who would cut off his head within one month."

This bishop had been for some years in the Tower, by the sentence of the star-chamber, before this parliament met; when the lords, who were the most active and powerful, presently resolved to have him at liberty. Some had much kindness for him, not only as a known enemy to the archbishop of Canterbury, but as a supporter of those opinions, and those persons, which were against the church itself. And he was no sooner at liberty, and brought into the house, but, [as has been before mentioned,] he defended and seconded the lord Say, when he made an invective, with all the malice and bitterness imaginable, against the archbishop, then in prison; and when he had concluded, that bishop said, "that he had long known that noble lord, and had always believed him to be as well affected to the church as himself;" and so he continued to make all his address to that lord, and those of the same party. Being now in full liberty, and in some credit and reputation, he applied himself to the king; and made all possible professions of duty to his majesty, and zeal to the church; protesting "to have a perfect detestation of those persons, who appeared to have no affection or duty towards his majesty, and all evil intentions against the religion established; and that the civilities he had expressed towards them was only out of gratitude for the good will they had shewed to him; and especially that he might the better promote his majesty's service." And it being his turn shortly after, as dean of Westminster, to preach before the king, he took occasion to speak of the factious in religion; and mentioning the presbyterians, he said, "it was a government only fit for tailors and shoemakers, and the like, and not for noblemen and gentlemen:" which gave great scandal and offence to his great patrons; to whom he easily reconciled himself, by making them as merry with some sharp sayings of the court, and by performing more substantial offices for them.

When, upon the trial of the earl of Strafford, it was resolved to decline the judgment of the house [of peers], and to proceed by bill of attainder; and thereupon it was very unreasonably moved, "that the bishops might have no vote in the passing that act of parliament; because they pretended it was to have their hand in blood, which was against an old canon;" this bishop, without communicating with any of his brethren, very frankly declared his opinion, "that they ought not to be present;" and offered, not only in his own name, but for the rest of the bishops, "to withdraw always when that business was entered upon;" and so betrayed a fundamental right of the whole order; to the great prejudice of the king, and to the taking away the life of that person, who could not otherwise have suffered.

And shortly after, when the king declared, that he neither would, nor could in conscience, give his royal assent to that act of attainder; when the tumults came about the court with noise and clamour for justice; the lord Say desired the king to confer with his bishops for the satisfaction of his conscience; and desired him to speak with that bishop in the point. After much discourse together, and the king insisting upon many particulars, which might induce others to consent, but were known to himself to be false; and therefore he could never in conscience give his own consent to them; the bishop, amongst other arguments, told him, "that he must consider, that as he had a private capacity, and a public, so he had a public conscience, as well as a private; that though his private conscience, as a man, would not permit him to do an act contrary to his own understanding, judgment, and conscience; yet his public conscience, as a king, which obliged him to do all things for the good of his people, and to preserve his kingdom in peace for himself and his prosperity [posterity], would not only permit him to do that, but even oblige,

"and require him. That he saw in what commotion the people were; that his own life, and that of the queen's, and the royal issue, might probably be sacrificed to that fury; and it would be very strange, if his conscience should prefer the life of one single private person, how innocent soever, before all those other lives, and the preservation of the kingdom."

This was the argumentation of that unhappy casuist, who truly, it may be, did believe himself; for towards the end of the war, and when the king's power declined, he, being then an archbishop, did take a commission from the rebels to take a castle of the king's; in which there was a garrison, and which he did take by a long siege; because he might thereby, and by being himself governor there, the better enjoy the profits of his own estate, which lay thereabouts.

Notwithstanding all these great services he had performed for them, he grew every day more imperious; and after the king thought it necessary to make him archbishop of York, which, as the time then was, could not qualify him to do more harm, and might possibly dispose and oblige him to do more good; he carried himself so insolently, in the house and out of the house, to all persons, that he became much more odious universally, than ever the other archbishop had been; having sure more enemies than he, and no friends, of which the other had abundance. And the great hatred of this man's person and behaviour, was the greatest invitation to the house of commons so irregularly to receive that bill to remove the bishops; and was their only encouragement to hope, that the lords, who had rejected the former, would now pass, and consent to this second bill.

This was one of the bishops, who was most rudely treated by the rabble; who gathered themselves together about the house of peers, crying out, No bishops, no bishops: and whose person was assaulted, and robes torn from his back; upon which, in very just displeasure, he returned to his house, the deanery at Westminster; and sent for all the bishops who were then in the town, (it being within very few days of Christmas,) of which there were twelve or thirteen; and, in much passion, and with his natural indignation, he proposed, as absolutely necessary, "that they might unanimously and presently prepare a protestation, to send to the house, against the force that was used upon them; and against all the acts, which were, or should be done during the time that they should by force be kept from doing their duties in the house." And immediately, having pen and ink ready, himself prepared a protestation; which, being read to them, they all approved; depending upon his great experience in the rules of the house, where he had sat so many years, and in some parliaments in the place of speaker, whilst he was keeper of the great seal; and so presuming that he could commit no error in matter of form: and without further communication and advice, which both the importance of the subject, and the distemper of the time, did require; and that it might have been considered as well what was fit, as what was right; without further delay, than what was necessary for the fair writing, and engrossing the instrument they had prepared; they all set their hands to it. And then the archbishop went to Whitehall to the king, and presented the protestation to him; it being directed to his majesty, with an humble desire, that he would send it to the house of peers, since they could not present it themselves; and that he would command that it should be entered in the journal of the house. And his majesty casting his eye perfunctorily upon it, and believing it had been drawn by mature advice, no sooner received it, than he did deliver it to the lord keeper, who unfortunately happened to be likewise present, with his command that he should deliver it to the house as soon as it met; which was to be within two hours after. Which petition contained these words:

"To the king's most excellent majesty: and the lords and peers now assembled in parliament.

"The humble petition and protestation of all the bishops and prelates, now called by his majesty's writs to attend the parliament, and present about London and Westminster, for that service.

"That, whereas the petitioners are called up by several and respective writs, and under great penalties, to attend in parliament; and have a clear and indubitable right to vote in bills, and other matters whatsoever debatable in parliament, by the ancient customs, laws, and statutes of this realm; and ought to be protected by your majesty, quietly to attend, and prosecute that great service:

"They humbly remonstrate, and protest before God, your majesty, and the noble lords and peers now assembled in parliament; that as they have an indubitable right to sit and vote in the house of lords, so are they (if they may be protected from force and violence) most ready and willing to perform their duties accordingly; and that they do abominate all actions or opinions tending to popery, and the maintenance thereof; as also all propension and inclination to any malignant party, or any other side or party whatsoever, to the which their own reasons and consciences shall not move them to adhere.

"But, whereas they have been at several times violently menaced, affronted, and assaulted by multitudes of people, in their coming to perform their services in that honourable house; and lately chased away, and put in danger of their lives, and can find no redress, or protection, upon sundry complaints made to both houses in these particulars:

"They likewise humbly protest before your majesty, and the noble house of peers, that, saving to themselves all their rights and interests of sitting and voting in that house at other times, they dare not sit, or vote in the house of peers, until your majesty shall further secure them from all affronts, indignities, and dangers in the premises.

"Lastly, whereas their fears are not built upon fantasies and conceits, but upon such grounds and objects as may well terrify men of good resolutions, and much constancy; they do in all duty and humility protest, before your majesty, and the peers of that most honourable house of parliament, against all laws, orders, votes, resolutions, and determinations, as in themselves null, and of none effect, which in their absence, since the seven and twentieth of this instant month of December, 1641, have already passed; as likewise against all such, as shall hereafter pass in that most honourable house, during the time of "this their forced and violent absence from their said most honourable house; not denying, but if their absenting themselves were wilful and voluntary, that most honourable house might proceed in all these premises, their absence, or this their protestation, notwithstanding.

"And humbly beseeching your most excellent majesty to command the clerk of that house of peers to enter this their petition and protestation amongst his records;

"They will ever pray, &c."

It was great pity, that, though the archbishop's passion transported him, as it usually did; and his authority imposed upon the rest, who had no affection to his person, or reverence for his wisdom; his majesty did not take a little time to consider of it, before he put it out of his power to alter it, by putting it out of his hands. For it might easily have been discerned by those who were well acquainted with the humour, as well as the temper, of both houses, that some advantage and ill use would have been made of some expressions contained in it; and that it could produce no good effect. But the same motive and apprehension, that had precipitated the bishops to so hasty a resolution, (which was, that the house of peers would have made that use of the bishops being kept from the house, that they would in that time have passed the bill itself for taking away their votes,) had its effect likewise with the king; who had the same imagination, and therefore would lose no time in the transmission of it to the house; whereas the lords would never have made use of that very season, whilst the tumults still continued, for the passing an act of that importance; and the scandal, if not invalidity of it, would have been an unanswerable ground for the king to have refused his royal assent to it.

As soon as the protestation, which, no doubt, in the time before the house was to meet, had been communicated to those who were prepared to speak upon it, was delivered by the lord keeper, with his majesty's command, and read; the governing lords manifested a great satisfaction in it; some of them saying, "that there was digitus Dei to bring that to pass, which they could not otherwise have compassed;" and without ever declaring any judgment or opinion of their own upon it, which they ought to have done, the matter only having relation to themselves, and concerning their own members; they sent to desire a conference presently with the house of commons, upon a business of importance: and, at the conference, only read and delivered the protestation of the bishops to them; which, the lord keeper told them, he had received from the king's own hand, with a command to present it to the house [of peers]. The house of commons took very little time to consider of the matter, but, within half an hour, they sent up to the lords; and, without further examination, accused them all, who had subscribed the protestation, of high treason; and, by this means, they were all, the whole twelve of them, committed to prison; and remained in the Tower till the bill for the putting them out of the house was passed, which was not till many months after.

When the passion, rage, and fury of this time shall be forgotten, and posterity shall find, amongst the records of the supreme court of judicature, so many orders and resolutions in vindication of the liberty of the subject, against the imprisoning of any man, though by the king himself, without assigning such a crime as the law hath determined to be worthy of imprisonment; and in the same year, by this high court, shall find twelve bishops, members of this court, committed to prison for high treason, for the presenting this protestation; men will surely wonder at the spirit of that reformation: and even that clause of declaring all acts null, which had been, or should be, done in their absence, in defence of which no man then durst open his mouth, will be thought both good law and good logic; not that the presence of the bishops in that time was so essential, that no act should pass without them; which had given them a voice, upon the matter, as negative as the king's; and themselves, in their instrument, disclaimed the least pretence to such a qualification; but because a violence offered to the freedom of any one member, is a violation to all the rest: as if a council consist of threescore, and the door to that council be kept by armed men, and all such, whose opinions are not liked, kept out by force; no doubt the freedom of those within is infringed, and all their acts as void and null, as if they were locked in, and kept without meat till they altered their judgments.

And therefore you shall find in the journals of the most sober parliaments, that, upon any eminent breach of their privileges, as always upon the commitment of any member for anything said or done in the house, sometimes upon less occasions, that house, which apprehended the trespass, would sit mute, without debating, or handling any business, and then adjourn; and this hath been practised many days together, till they had redress or reparation. And their reason was, because their body was lame; and what was befallen one member, threatened the rest; and the consequence of one act might extend itself to many other, which were not in view; and this made their privileges of so tender and nice a temper, that they were not to be touched, or in the least degree trenching upon; and therefore that in so apparent an act of violence, when it is not more clear that they were committed to prison, than that they durst not then sit in the house, and when it was lawful [in the house of peers] for every dissenter in the most trivial debate, to enter his protestation against that sense he liked not, though he were single in his opinion; that it should not be lawful for those, who could not enter it themselves, to present this protestation to the king, to whom they were accountable under a penalty for their absence; and unlawful to that degree, that it should render them culpable of high treason; and so forfeit their honours, their lives, their fortunes, expose their names to perpetual infamy, and their wives and children to penury, and want of bread; will be looked upon as a determination of that injustice, impiety, and horror, as could not be believed without those deep marks and prints of confusion, that followed and attended that resolution.

And yet the indiscretion of those bishops, swayed by the pride and insolence of that antiprelatical archbishop, in applying that remedy at a time, when they saw all forms and rules of judgment impetuously declined; and the power of their adversaries so great, that the laws themselves submitted to their oppression; that they should, in such a storm, when the best pilot was at his prayers, and the card and compass lost, without the advice of one mariner, put themselves in such a cockboat, and to be severed from the good ship, gave that scandal and offence to all those who passionately desired to preserve their function, that they had no compassion, or regard of their persons, or what became of them; insomuch as in the whole debate in the house of commons, there was only one gentleman, who spake on their behalf, and said, "he did not believe they were guilty of high treason, but that they were stark mad; and therefore desired they might be sent to "Bedlam."

This high and extravagant way of proceeding brought no prejudice to the king; and though it made their tribunal more terrible to men who laboured under any guilt, yet it exceedingly lessened the reverence and veneration that generally was entertained for parliaments: and this last accusation and commitment of so many bishops at once, was looked upon by all sober men with indignation. For whatever indiscretion might be in the thing itself, though some expressions in the matter might be unskilful and unwarrantable, and the form of presenting and transmitting it irregular and unjustifiable, (for all which the house of peers might punish their own members, according to their discretion,) yet every man knew there could be no treason in it; and therefore the end of their commitment, and the use all men saw would be made of it, made it the more odious; and the members who were absent from both houses, which were three parts of four, and many of those who had been present, abhorred the proceedings, [and] attended the houses more diligently; so that the angry party, who were no more treated with, to abate their fury, would have been compelled to have given over all their designs for the alteration of the government both in church and state; if the volatile and unquiet spirit of the lord Digby had not prevailed with the king, contrary to his resolution, to have given them some advantage; and to depart from his purpose of doing nothing [without very mature deliberation].

Though sir William Balfour, who is mentioned before, (a Scotchman who had been many years lieutenant of the Tower of London, which had raised great murmur and repining in the whole English nation, which, as it had an unreasonable aversion to all that people, thought it a great reproach that so eminent a command should be conferred upon a stranger, which the whole city of London took most to heart,) had, from the beginning of this parliament, according to the natural custom of his country, forgot all his obligations to the king; and had made himself very gracious to those people, whose glory it was to be thought enemies to the court; and, whilst the earl of Strafford was his prisoner, did many offices not becoming the trust he had from the king, and ministered much of the jealousy, which they had of his majesty; upon which there had been a long resolution to remove him from that charge; but to do it with his own consent, that there might be no manifestation of displeasure; yet it was a very unseasonable conjuncture, which was taken to execute it in; paying him such a considerable sum of money as well pleased him; and this whole transaction was so secretly carried, that there was neither notice or suspicion of it, till it was heard, that sir Thomas Lunsford was sworn lieutenant of the Tower; a man, [who,] though of an ancient family in Sussex, was of a very small and decayed fortune, and of no good education; having been few years before compelled to fly the kingdom, to avoid the hand of justice for some riotous misdemeanour; by reason whereof he spent some time in the service of the king of France, where he got the reputation of a man of courage, and a good officer of foot; and in the beginning of the troubles here had some command in the king's army; but so much inferior to many others, and was so little known, except upon the disadvantage of an ill character, that, in the most dutiful time, the promotion would have appeared very ungrateful. He was utterly a stranger to the king, and therefore it was quickly understood to proceed from the single election of the lord Digby, to whom he was likewise very little known; who had in truth designed that office to his brother sir Lewis Dives, against whom there could have been no exception, but his relation: but he being not at that time in town, and the other having some secret reason (which was not a good one) to fill that place in the instant with a man who might be trusted; he suddenly resolved upon this gentleman, as one who would be faithful to him for the obligation, and execute any thing he should desire or direct; which was a reason, he might easily have foreseen, would provoke more powerful opposition; which error, as is said before, was repaired by the sudden change, and putting in sir John Byron; though it gave little satisfaction, and the less, by reason of another more inconvenient action, which changed the whole face of affairs, and caused this to be the more reflected upon.

In the afternoon of a day when the two houses sat, Herbert, the king's attorney, informed the house of peers, that he had somewhat to say to them from the king; and thereupon, having a paper in his hand, he said, that the king commanded him to accuse the lord Kimbolton, a member of that house, and five gentlemen, who were all members of the house of commons, of high treason; and that his majesty had himself delivered him in writing several articles, upon which he accused them; and thereupon he read in a paper these ensuing articles, by which the lord Kimbolton, Denzil Hollis, sir Arthur Haslerig, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hambden, and Mr. Strode, stood accused of high treason, for conspiring against the king and the parliament.

1. "That they have traitorously endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and government of this kingdom; and deprive the king of his regal power; and to place on his subjects an arbitrary and tyrannical power.

2. "That they have endeavoured, by many foul aspersions upon his majesty, and his government, to alienate the affections of his people, and to make his majesty odious to them.

3. "That they have endeavoured to draw his majesty's late army to disobedience to his ma“jesty's command, and to side with them in their traitorous design.

4. "That they have traitorously invaded, and encouraged a foreign power to invade his majesty's kingdom of England.

5. "That they have traitorously endeavoured to subvert the very rights and beings of parliament.

6. "That, for the completing of their traitorous designs, they have endeavoured, as far as in them lay, by force and terror to compel the parliament to join with them in their traitorous designs, and, to that end, have actually raised and countenanced tumults against the king and parliament.

7. "That they have traitorously conspired to levy, and actually have levied, war against the king."

The house of peers was somewhat appalled at this alarm; but took time to consider of it, till the next day, that they might see how their masters the commons would behave themselves; the lord Kimbolton being present in the house, and making great professions of his innocence; and no lord being so hardy to press for his commitment on the behalf of the king.

At the same time, a sergeant at arms demanded to be heard at the house of commons from the king; and being sent for to the bar, demanded the persons of the five members to be delivered to him in his majesty's name, his majesty having accused them of high treason. But the commons were not much surprised with the accident; for besides that they quickly knew what had passed with the lords, some servants of the king's, by especial warrant, had visited the lodgings of some of the accused members, and sealed up their studies and trunks; upon information whereof, before the sergeant came to the house, or public notice was taken of the accusation, an order was made by the commons; "That if any person whatsoever should come to the lodgings of any member of that house, and there offer to seal the doors, trunks, or papers of such members, or to seize upon their persons; that then such members should require the aid of the next constable, to keep such persons in safe custody, till the house should give further order: that if any person whatsoever should offer to arrest or detain any member of that house, without first acquainting that house therewith, and receiving further order from thence; that it should be lawful for such member to stand upon his guard, and make resistance, and [for] any person to assist him, according to the protestation taken to defend the privileges of parliament." And so, when the sergeant had delivered his message, he was no more called in; but a message sent to the king, "that the members should be forthcoming as soon as a legal charge should be preferred against them;" and so the house adjourned till the next day, every one of the accused persons taking a copy of that order, which was made for their security.

The next day in the afternoon, the king, attended only by his own guard, and some few gentlemen, who put themselves into their company in the way, came to the house of commons; and commanding all his attendants to wait at the door, and to give offence to no man; himself, with his nephew, the prince elector, went into the house, to the great amazement of all: and the speaker leaving the chair, the king went into it; and told the house, "he was sorry for that occasion of coming to them;

"that yesterday he had sent his sergeant at arms to apprehend some, that, by his command, were accused of high treason; whereunto he expected obedience, but instead thereof he had received a message. He declared to them, that no king of England had been ever, or should be, more careful to maintain their privileges, than he would be; but that in cases of treason no man had privilege; and therefore he came to see if any of those persons, whom he had accused, were there; for he was resolved to have them, wheresoever he should find them: and looking then about; and asking the speaker whether they were in the house, and he making no answer, he said, he perceived the birds were all flown, but expected they should be sent to him, as soon as they returned thither; and assured them in the word of a king, that he never intended any force, but would proceed against them in a fair and legal way;" and so returned to Whitehall.

The accused persons, upon information and intelligence what his majesty intended to do, how secretly soever it was carried at court, having withdrawn from the house about half an hour before the king came thither; the house, in great disorder, as soon as the king was gone, adjourned till the next day in the afternoon; the lords being in so great apprehension upon notice of the king's being at the house of commons, that the earl of Essex expressed a tender sense he had of the inconveniences which were like to ensue those divisions; and moved, "that the house of peers, as a work very proper for them, would interpose between the king and his people; and mediate to his majesty on the behalf of the persons accused;" for which he was reprehended by his friends, and afterwards laughed at himself, when he found how much a stronger defence they had, than the best mediation could prove on their behalf.

How secretly soever this affair was carried, it was evident that the king's [resolution of] coming to the house was discovered, by the members withdrawing themselves, and by a composedness, which appeared in the countenances of many, who used to be disturbed at less surprising occurrences; and though the purpose of accusing the members was only consulted between the king and the lord Digby; yet it was generally believed, that the king's purpose of going to the house was communicated to William Murray of the bed-chamber, with whom the lord Digby had great friendship; and that it was betrayed by him. And that lord, who had promised the king to move the house for the commitment of the lord Kimbolton, as soon as the attorney general should have accused him, (which if he had done would probably have raised a very hot dispute in the house, where many would have joined with him,) never spake the least word; but, on the contrary, seemed the most surprised and perplexed with the attorney's impeachment; and sitting at that time next to the lord Kimbolton, with whom he pretended to live with much friendship, he whispered him in the ear with some commotion, (as he had a rare talent in dissimulation,) "that the king was very mischievously advised; and that it should go very hard, but he would know whence that counsel proceeded; in order to which, and to prevent further mischief, he would go immediately to his majesty;" and so went out of the house.

Whereas he was the only person who gave the counsel, named the persons, and particularly named the lord Kimbolton, (against whom less could be said, than against many others, and who was more generally beloved,) and undertook to prove that he bade the rabble, when they were about the parliament-house, that they should go to Whitehall. And when he found the ill success of the impeachment in both houses, and how unsatisfied all were with the proceeding, he advised the king the next morning to go to the guildhall, and to inform the mayor and aldermen of the grounds of his proceeding; which will be mentioned anon. And that people might not believe, that there was any dejection of mind, or sorrow, for what was done; the same night, the same council caused a proclamation to be prepared for stopping the ports; that the accused persons might not escape out of the kingdom; and to forbid all persons to receive and harbour them: when it was well known, that they were all together in a house in the city, without any fear of their security. And all this was done without the least communication with any body, but the lord Digby, who advised it; and, it is very true, was so willing to take the utmost hazard upon himself, that he did offer the king, when he knew in what house they were together, with a select company of gentlemen, who would accompany him, whereof sir Thomas Lunsford was one, to seize upon them, and bring them away alive, or leave them dead in the place: but the king liked not such enterprises.

That night the persons accused removed themselves into their strong hold, the city: not that they durst not venture themselves at their old lodgings, for no man would have presumed to trouble them, but that the city might see, that they relied upon that place for a sanctuary of their privileges against violence and oppression; and so might put on an early concernment for them. And they were not disappointed; for, in spite of all the lord mayor could do to compose their distempers, (who, like a very wise and stout magistrate, bestirred himself,) the city was that whole night in arms; some people, designed to that purpose, running from one gate to another, and crying out, "that the cavaliers were coming to fire the city;" and some saying, "that the king himself was in the head of them."

The next morning, the king, being informed of much that had passed that night, according to the advice he had received, sent to the lord mayor to call a common council immediately; and about ten of the clock, himself, attended only by three or four lords, went to the guildhall; and in the room, where the people were assembled, told them, "he was very sorry to hear of the apprehensions they had entertained of danger; that he was come to them, to shew how much he relied upon their affections for his security and guard, having brought no other with him; that he had accused certain men of high treason, against whom he would proceed in a legal way; and therefore he presumed they would not shelter them in the city." And using many other very gracious expressions of his value of them, and telling one of the sheriffs, (who was of the two thought less inclined to his service,) "that he would dine with him," he departed without that applause and cheerfulness, which he might have expected from the extraordinary grace he vouchsafed to them; and in his passage through the city, the rude people flocking together, and crying out, "Privilege of parliament, privilege of parliament;" some of them pressing very near his own coach, and amongst the rest one calling out with a very loud voice, "To your tents, O Israel." However the king, though much mortified, continued his resolution, taking little notice of the distempers; and, having dined at the sheriff's, returned in the afternoon to Whitehall; and published, the next day, a proclamation for the apprehension of all those, whom he accused of high treason, forbidding any person to harbour them; the articles of their charge being likewise printed and dispersed.

When the house of commons next met, none of the accused members appearing, they had friends enough, who were well enough instructed to aggravate the late proceedings, and to put the house into a thousand jealousies and apprehensions, and every slight circumstance carried weight enough in it to disturb their minds. They took very little notice of the accusing the members; but the king's coming to the house, which had been never known before, and declaring, "that he would take them wherever he found them, was an evidence, that he meant himself to have brought a force into the house, to apprehend them, if they had been there;" was looked upon as the highest breach of privilege that could possibly be imagined. They who spake most passionately, and probably meant as maliciously, behaved themselves with modesty, and seemed only concerned in what concerned them all; and concluded, after many lamentations, "that they did not think themselves safe in that house, till the minds of men were better composed; that the city was full of apprehensions, and was very zealous for their security; and therefore wished that they might adjourn the parliament to meet in some place in the city." But that was found not practicable; since it was not in their own power to do it, without the consent of the peers, and the concurrence of the king; who were both like rather to choose a place more distant from the city. And, with more reason, in the end they concluded, "that the house should adjourn itself for two or three days, and name a committee, which should sit both morning and afternoon in the city;" and all who came, to have voices: and Merchant-Tailors' hall was appointed for the place of their meeting; they who served for London undertaking, "that it should be ready against the next morning:" no man opposing or contradicting any thing that was said; they, who formerly used to appear for all the rights and authority which belonged to the king, not knowing what to say, and between grief and anger that the violent party had, by these late unskilful actions of the court, gotten great advantage, and recovered new spirits: and the three persons before named, without whose privy the king had promised that he would enter upon no new counsel, were so much displeased and dejected, that they were inclined never more to take upon them the care of any thing to be transacted in the house: finding already, that they could not avoid being looked upon as the authors of those counsels, to which they were so absolute strangers, and which they so perfectly detested.

And in truth, they had then withdrawn themselves from appearing often in the house, but upon the abstracted consideration of their duty and conscience, and of the present ill condition the king was in; who likewise felt within himself the trouble and agony which usually attends generous and magnanimous minds, upon their having committed errors, which expose them to censure and to damage. In fine, the house of commons adjourned for some days, to consult with their friends in the city; and the house of lords held so good correspondence with them, that they likewise adjourned to the same days they knew, by some intelligence, they intended to meet again. But the lords made no committee to sit in the city.

When the committee met the next morning at Merchant-Tailors' hall, where all who came were to have voices, and whither all did come at first, out of curiosity to observe what method they meant to proceed in, rather than expectation that they should be able to do any good there; they found a guard ready to attend them, of substantial citizens in arms, and a committee from the common council, to bid them welcome into the city; and to assure them, "that the city would take care, that they and all their members should be secured from violence; and to that purpose had appointed that guard to attend them, which should be always relieved twice a day, if they resolved to sit morning and afternoon;" and acquainted them further, "that the common council, in contemplation that they might stand in want of any thing, had likewise appointed a committee of so many aldermen, and such a number of the common council, which should always meet at a place named, at those hours, which that committee should appoint to meet at; to the end that, if any thing were to be required of the city, they might still know their pleasure, and take care that it should be obeyed." And thus they had provided for such a mutual communication and confederacy, that they might be sure always to be of one mind, and the one to help the other in the prosecution of those designs and expedients, which they should find necessary to their common end: the committee of the city consisting of the most eminent persons, aldermen and others, for their disaffection to the government of church and state.

At their first sitting, the committee began with the stating the manner of the king's coming to the house, and all he did there; the several members mentioning all that they would take upon them to remember of his majesty's doing or speaking, both as he came to the house, and after he was there; some of them being walking in Westminster-hall when the king walked through, and so came to the house with him, or near him; others reporting what they had heard some of the gentlemen, who attended his majesty, say, as they passed by; every idle word having its commentary; and the persons, whoever were named, being appointed to attend; they having power given them to send for all persons, and to examine them touching that affair. Nor had any man the courage to refuse to obey their summons; so that all those of the king's servants, who were sent for, appeared punctually at the hour that was assigned them; and were examined upon all questions, which any one of the committees would propose to them, whereof many were very impertinent, and of little respect to the king.

It was very well known where the accused persons were, all together in one house in Coleman-street, near the place where the committee sat; and whither persons trusted passed to and fro to communicate and receive directions; but it was not seasonable time for them yet to appear in public, and to come and sit with the committee, or to own the believing that they thought themselves safe from the violence and the assaults of the court; the power whereof they exceedingly contemned, whilst they seemed to apprehend it: nor was it yet time to model in what manner their friends in the city and the country should appear concerned for them; in preparing whereof no time was lost.

Against the time the house was to meet, the first adjournment not being for above two or three days, the committee had prepared matter enough for a report; a relation of all they had discovered upon their examinations, and such votes as they thought fit to offer upon the breach of their privilege; that they might thereby discover the affections of the house, of which they could not yet take any measure, since there had been no debate since those accidents, which could discover the general temper; which they well enough knew was not before to their advantage. In the mean time, they used all the ways they could to asperse those, who used to oppose them, as the contrivers of the late proceedings; and were willing they should know it; which they imagined would restrain them from taking the same liberty they had used to do.

And so at their meeting in the house, upon the report of the committee, they declared, "That the king's coming to the house, and demanding the persons of divers members thereof to be delivered unto him, was a high breach of the rights and privileges of parliament, and inconsistent with the liberty and freedom thereof: and therefore that they could not with the safety of their own persons, or the indemnity of the rights and privileges of parliament, sit there any longer, without a full vindication of so high a breach, and a sufficient guard, wherein they might confide; and for that reason did order, that their house should be again adjourned for four days; and that the committee should meet in the same place, to consider and resolve of all things, that might concern the good and safety of the city, and the kingdom; and particularly how their privileges might be vindicated, and their persons secured; and should have power to consult and advise with any person or persons, touching the premises." And this order and declaration being made, they adjourned; the last clause being intended to bring their members to them.

At the meeting of the house, the committee had informed them, first of the great civilities they had received from the city in all the particulars, that they might have order to return the thanks of the whole house, which they easily obtained; and, at their return, they took more examinations than they had formerly; by which they made a fuller relation of the king's coming to the house, and his carriage and words there. And because it was visible to all men, that the king was so far from bringing any force with him, which they desired should be believed, that he had only his guard of halberdiers, and fewer of them than used to go with him upon any ordinary motion; and that fewer of his gentlemen servants were then with him, than usually attended him when he went but to walk in the park; and had only their little swords; they were very punctual in mentioning any light or loose words, which had fallen from any man, that it might be believed that there was more in the matter. As they carefully inserted in their relation, that one of the waiters, as he walked very near his majesty through the hall, said, "he had a good pistol in his pocket;" and that another, as they were walking up the stairs towards the house of commons, called out, Fall on; from which they would have it believed, that there had been very bloody intentions.

Then they offered some votes to be offered to the house, in which they voted "the relation, which was made, to be true; and thereupon, that the king's coming to the house in that manner was the highest breach of the privilege of parliament that could be made; and that the arresting, or endeavouring to arrest, any member of parliament, was a high breach of their privilege; and that the person, who was so arrested, might lawfully rescue and redeem himself; and that all who were present, and saw the privilege of parliament so violated, might and ought to assist the injured person in his defence, and to procure his liberty with force." And these votes the house confirmed, when they were reported: though, in the debate, it was told them, "that they must take heed, that they did not, out of tenderness of their privilege, which was and must be very precious to every man, extend it further than the law would suffer it to be extended: that the house had always been very severe upon the breach of any of their privileges, and in the vindicating those members, who were injured; but that the disposing men to make themselves judges, and to rescue themselves or others, might be of evil consequence, and produce ill effects; at least if it should fall out to be, that the persons were arrested for treason, or felony, or breach of the peace; in either of which cases, there could be no privilege of parliament." This, though a known truth to any, who knew any thing of the law, was received with noise and clamour, and with wonderful evidence of dislike, and some faint contradictions, "that no such thing ought to be done whilst a parliament was sitting;" and then, falling upon the late action of the king, and the merit of those persons, and without much contradiction, which was found to be ungrateful, the house confirmed all that the committee had voted; and then adjourned again for some days, and ordered the committee to meet again in the city; which they did morning and afternoon, and prepared other votes of a brighter alloy, and more in the face of the king and the law, every day adding to the fury and fierceness of the precedent; and the house met and sat, only to confirm the votes which were passed by the committee, and to prosecute such matters as were by concert brought to them, by petition from the city; which was ready to advance any thing they were directed: and so, whilst the members yet kept themselves concealed, many particulars of great importance were transacted in those short sittings of the house.

The king about this time, having found the inconvenience and mischief to himself of having no servant of interest and reputation, and who took his business to heart, in the house of commons, had made the lord Falkland and sir John Colepepper, both members of that house, and of unblemished reputations and confessed abilities, of his privy-council; and the one, the lord Falkland, his principal secretary of state, and sir John Colepepper, chancellor of the exchequer; as is said before. And so, having now gotten two counsellors about him, who durst trust one another, and who were both fit to be trusted by him, which he had been without above a year past, to his and the kingdom's irreparable disadvantage; he thought fit to publish a declaration to all his subjects, in answer to the remonstrance he had lately received from the house of commons, and was dispersed throughout the kingdom. In which, without the least sharpness or return of that language he had received, he took notice "of the fears and jealousies," (for those were the new words, which served to justify all indispositions, and to excuse all disorders,) "which made impression in the minds of his people, with reference to their religion, their liberty, or their civil interests."

"For religion, he observed the fears to be of two sorts; either as ours here established might be invaded by the Romish party; or as it was accompanied with some ceremonies, at which some tender consciences really were, or pretended to be, scandalized. For the first, as there might be any suspicion of favour or inclination to the papists, he said, he was willing to declare to all the world, that, as he had been brought up from his childhood in, and practised that religion, which was established in the church of England; so he believed he could, having given a good part of his time and pains to the examination of the grounds of it, as it differed from that of Rome, maintain the same by unanswerable reasons; and hoped he should be ready to seal it by the effusion of his blood, if it should please God to call him to that sacrifice: and that nothing could be so acceptable to him, as any proposition, which might contribute to the advancement of it here, as [well as] the propagation of it abroad; being the greatest means to draw down a blessing from God upon himself, and this nation; and if this profession of his was wanting to his people, he thought himself extremely unfortunate, for that his constant practice in his own person had always been, without ostentation, as much to the evidence of his care and duty therein, as he could possibly tell how to express."

"For matters of ceremony, he said, he would, in tenderness to any number of his loving subjects, be willing to comply with the advice of his parliament, that some law should be made for the exemption of tender consciences from punishment or prosecution for such ceremonies; and in such cases, which by the judgment of most men are held to be matters indifferent, and of some to be absolutely unlawful. Provided that that case should be attempted, and pursued with that modesty, temper, and submission, that in the mean time the peace and quiet of the kingdom should not be disturbed, the decency and comeliness of God's service [not] discountenanced, nor the pious, sober, and devout actions of those reverend persons, who were the first labourers in the blessed reformation, or of that time, be scandalized and defamed. For, he said, he could not, without grief of heart, and

"without some tax upon himself and his ministers for the not execution of the laws, look upon the bold license of some men in printing of pamphlets, in preaching and printing of sermons so full of bitterness and malice against the present government, against the laws established; so full of sedition against his own person, and the peace of the kingdom; that he was many times amazed to consider by what eyes those things were seen, and by what ears they were heard."

"Concerning the civil liberties and interests of the subjects, he said, he should need say the less, having erected so many lasting monuments of his princely and fatherly care of his people, in those excellent laws passed by him this parliament; which, with very much content to himself, he said, he conceived to be so large and ample, that very many sober men had very little left to wish for of that kind. He told them, he very well understood the rights and particular advantages, he had departed from in many of the acts he had passed; and therefore he had reason to hope, as he had taken all occasions to render their condition most comfortable and happy; so they would, in grateful and dutiful relation, be always ready with equal tenderness and alacrity to advance his rights, and preserve his honour, upon which their own security and subsistence so much depended; and no particular should be presented unto him for the completing and establishing that security, to the which he would not with the same readiness contribute his best assistance. He said, if those resolutions were the effects of his present counsels, and he took God to witness that they were such, and that his subjects might confidently expect the benefit of them from him, certainly no ill design upon the public could accompany such resolutions; neither could there be great cause of suspicion of any persons preferred by him to degrees of honour, and places of trust and employment, since this parliament: and therefore, that amongst his misfortunes he reckoned it not the least, that, having not retained in his service, nor protected any one person, against whom the parliament had excepted, during the whole sitting of it; and having in all that time scarce vouchsafed to any man an instance of his favour or grace, but to such who were under some eminent character of estimation amongst the people, there should so soon be any misunderstanding or jealousy of their fidelity and uprightness; especially in a time, when he took all occasions to declare, that he conceived himself only capable of being served by honest men, and in honest ways."

"However, if he had been mistaken in such his election, the particular should no sooner be discovered to him, either by his own observation, or other certain information, than he would leave them to public justice, under the marks of his displeasure. If, notwithstanding this, any malignant party should take heart, and be willing to sacrifice the peace and happiness of their country to their own sinister ends and ambitions, under what pretence of religion and conscience soever; if they should endeavour to lessen his reputation and interest, and to weaken his lawful power and authority with his good subjects; if they should go about, by discountenancing the present laws, to loosen the bonds "of government, that all disorder and confusion might break in; he doubted not, but God in his good time would discover them; and the wisdom and courage of his high court of parliament join with him in their suppression and punishment.

"Having said all he could, to express the clearness and uprightness of his intentions, and done all he could to manifest those intentions, he said, he could not but confidently believe, all his good subjects would acknowledge his part to be fully performed, both in deeds past, and present resolutions to do what with justice might be required of him; and that their quiet and prosperity now depended wholly on themselves, and was in their own power, by yielding all obedience and due reverence to the law; which is the inheritance of every subject, and the only security he can have for his life, liberty, and estate; and the which being neglected or disesteemed, under what specious shows soever, a great measure of infelicity, if not an irreparable confusion, must without doubt fall upon them. And he doubted not, it would be the most acceptable declaration a king could make to his subjects, that he was not only resolved to observe the laws himself, but to maintain them against what opposition soever, though with the hazard of his being. He hoped the loyalty and good affections of all his subjects would concur with him in the constant preserving a good understanding between him and his people; and that their own interest, and compassion of the lamentable condition of the poor protestants in Ireland, would invite them to a fair intelligence and unity amongst themselves; that so they might, with one heart, intend the relieving and recovering that unhappy kingdom; where those barbarous rebels practised such inhuman and unheard of outrages upon the miserable people, that no Christian ear could hear without horror, or story parallel. He concluded with conjuring all his good subjects, of what degree or quality soever, by all the bonds of love, duty, and obedience, that are precious to good men, to join with him for the recovery of the peace of that kingdom, and the preservation of the peace of this; to remove all the doubts and fears which might interrupt their affection to him, and all their jealousies and apprehensions, which might lessen their charity to each other; and then, he said, if the sins of the nation had not prepared an inevitable judgment for all, God would make him a great and a glorious king over a free and a happy people."

Though this declaration had afterwards a very good influence upon the people to his majesty's advantage, yet for the present it gave no allay to their distempers. Their seditious ministers were despatched to inflame the neighbour counties, and all possible art was used to inflame the city of London; which prevailed so far, that, notwithstanding all the opposition the lord mayor of London, the recorder, and the gravest and most substantial aldermen could make, the major part of the common council prevailed to send a petition to the king, in the name of the mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of London; which was the next Sunday morning delivered to him, with great solemnity, at Whitehall, by a number chosen of that body; representing "the great dangers, fears, and distractions,

"the city then was in, by reason of the prevailing progress of the bloody rebels of Ireland; the putting out of persons of honour and trust from being constable and lieutenant of the Tower, especially in those times, and the preparations there lately made; the fortifying Whitehall with men and munition in an unusual manner; some of which men abused and wounded divers citizens passing by; the calling in divers cannoniers, and other assistance into the Tower; the discovery of divers fireworks in the hands of a papist, and the misunderstanding between his majesty and the parliament. That their fears were exceedingly increased by his majesty's late going into the house of commons, attended by a great multitude of armed men, for the apprehending of divers members of that house, to the endangering his own person, and the persons and privileges of that honourable assembly. That the effects of those fears tended not only to the overthrow of the whole trade of that city and kingdom, which they felt already in a deep measure, but threatened the utter ruin of the protestant religion, and the lives and liberties of all his subjects; and therefore they prayed his majesty, that, by the advice of his great council in parliament, the protestants in Ireland might be speedily relieved; the Tower put into the hands of persons of trust; that, by removal of doubtful and unknown persons from about Whitehall and Westminster, a known and approved guard might be appointed for the safety of his majesty and the parliament; and that the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the house of commons lately accused, might not be restrained of liberty, or otherwise proceeded against, than according to the privileges of parliament."

The king very well understood from what spirit this petition proceeded, and the inconvenience of giving so much countenance to it, as the very receiving it was, if he could have avoided it. But the torrent was too strong to be resisted by any direct strength he could raise against it; and therefore he resolved to endeavour to divide and reduce them, by the most gracious descending to their pretended fears and apprehensions; and the same day gave them this answer; "That, for the sad business of Ireland, he could not possibly express a greater sense than he had done, there being nothing left on his part unoffered, or undone. For the Tower, he wondered that, having removed a servant of trust from that charge, only to satisfy the fears of the city, and put in another of unquestionable reputation and known ability, the petitioners should still entertain those fears; and whatever preparation of strength was there made, was with as great an eye of safety and advantage to the city, as to his own person, and should be equally employed to both.

"For the fortifying Whitehall with men and munition in an unusual way, he doubted not, they had observed the strange provocation he had received to entertain that guard; that, by the disorderly and tumultuous conflux of people at Westminster and Whitehall, his great council was not only disquieted, but his own royal person in danger most seditious language being uttered even under his own windows. And if any citizens had been wounded, or ill treated, he was confidently assured, that it had hap-

"pended by their own evil and corrupt demean-
"ours. For the fireworks in the hands of a papist,
"he knew nothing, nor understood whom, or
"what they meant.

"For his going to the house of commons,
"when his attendants were no otherwise armed "than as gentlemen with swords, he was per"suaded, that if they knew the clear grounds,
"upon which those persons stood accused of high
"treason, and what would be proved against "them, with which they should be in due time "acquainted, and considered the gentle way he "took for their apprehension, (which he preferred
"before any course of violence, though that way
"had been very justifiable; since it was noto"riously known, that no privilege of parliament
"can extend to treason, felony, or breach of the "peace,) they would believe his going thither was "an act of grace and favour to that house, and "the most peaceable way of having that necessary
"service performed; there being such orders
"made for the resistance of what authority soever
"for their apprehension: and for the proceedings "against those persons, he ever intended the same "should be with all justice and favour, according "to the laws and statutes of the realm; to the
"which all innocent men would cheerfully submit.
"And that extraordinary way of satisfying a pe"tition of so unusual a nature, he said, he was "confident would be thought the greatest instance
"could be given of his clear intentions to his "subjects; and of the singular esteem he had of "the good affections of that city, which he hoped "in gratitude would never be wanting to his just "commands and service."

It was no wonder that they, who at such a time could be corrupted to frame and deliver such a petition, would not be reformed by such an answer. Neither will it be here unseasonable, to spend a little time in considering how the affections and tempers of so rich and opulent a city, which could naturally expect to prosper only by peace and agreement, were wrought upon and transported to that degree, as to be the only instruments of its own and the kingdom's destruction.

The city of London, as the metropolis of England, by the situation the most capable of trade, and by the most usual residence of the court, and the fixed station of the courts of justice for the public administration of justice throughout the kingdom, the chief seat of trade, was, by the successive countenance and favour of princes, strengthened with great charters and immunities, and was a corporation governed within itself; the mayor, recorder, aldermen, sheriffs, chosen by themselves; several companies incorporated within the great corporation; which, besides notable privileges, enjoyed lands and perquisites to a very great revenue. By the incredible increase of trade, which the distractions of other countries, and the peace of this, brought, and by the great license of resort thither, it was, since the access of the crown to the king, in riches, in people, in buildings, marvellously increased, inasmuch as the suburbs were almost equal to the city;
a reformation of which had been often in contemplation, never pursued, wise men foreseeing that such a fulness could not be there, without an emptiness in other places; and whilst so many persons of honour and estates were so delighted with the city, the government of the country must be neglected, besides the excess, and ill husbandry, that would be introduced thereby. But such foresight was interpreted a morosity, and too great an oppression upon the common liberty; and so, little was applied to prevent so growing a disease.

As it had these and many other advantages and helps to be rich, so it was looked upon too much of late time as a common stock not easy to be exhausted, and as a body not to be grieved by ordinary acts of injustice; and therefore, it was not only a resort, in all cases of necessity, for the sudden borrowing great sums of money, in which they were commonly too good merchants for the crown, but it was thought reasonable, upon any specious pretences, to void the security, that was at any time given for money so borrowed.

So after many questionings of their charter, which were ever removed by considerable sums of money, a grant made by the king in the beginning of his reign, (in consideration of great sums of money,) of good quantities of land in Ireland, and the city of Londonderry there, was avoided by a suit in the star-chamber; all the lands, after a vast expense in building and planting, resumed into the king's hands, and a fine of fifty thousand pounds imposed upon the city. Which sentence being pronounced after a long and public hearing, during which time they were often invited to a composition, both in respect of the substance, and the circumstances of proceeding, made a general impression in the minds of the citizens of all conditions, much to the disadvantage of the court; and though the king afterwards remitted to them the benefit of that sentence, they imputed that to the power of the parliament, and rather remembered how it had been taken from them, than by whom it was restored: so that, at the beginning of the parliament, the city was as ill affected to the court as the country was; and therefore chose such burgesses to sit there, as had either eminently opposed it, or accidentally been oppressed by it.

The chief government and superintendency of the city is in the mayor and aldermen; which, in that little kingdom, resembles the house of peers; and as subordinate the common council is the representative body thereof, like the house of commons, to order and agree to all taxes, rates, and such particulars belonging to the civil policy. The common council are chosen every year, so many for every parish, of the wisest and most substantial citizens, by the vestry and common convention of the people of that parish; and as the wealthiest and best reputed men were always chosen, so, though the election was once a year, it was scarce ever known, that any man once chosen was afterwards rejected or left out, except upon discovery of an enormous crime, or decaying in fortune to a bankrupt; otherwise, till he was called to be alderman, or died, he continued, and was every year returned of the common council.

After the beginning of this parliament, when they found by their experience in the case of the earl of Strafford, of what consequence the city might be to them, and afterwards found, by the courage of the present lord mayor, sir Richard Gourney, who cannot be too often nor too honourably mentioned, that it might be kept from being disposed by them; and that the men of wealth and ability, who at first had concurred with them, began now to discern that they meant to lead them

further than they had a mind to go; they directed their confidants, that at the election of the common councilmen by the concurrence and number of the meaner people, all such who were moderate men, and lovers of the present government, should be rejected; and in their places men of the most active and pragmatical heads, of how mean fortunes soever, should be elected: and by this means all that body consisted of upstart, factious, indigent companions, who were ready to receive all advertisements and directions from those who steered at Westminster, and as forward to encroach upon their superiors, the mayor and aldermen, as the other was upon the house of peers. And so this firebrand of privilege inflamed the city at that time.

That they might gratify the city in procuring a better answer than they had received from the king to their petition, and that they might more expose his majesty to their affronts, the house resumed the business of the Tower again, with the old reflections upon the remove of the former good lieutenant, and the putting in a rude person, and of a desperate fortune, that he might use such prisoners, as there was an intent to send thither, in such a manner as he should be directed; and that the person, who was since put in, had put the city into great apprehensions, by the observation that was made, that he took great store of provisions into the Tower, as if he made provision for a greater garrison, which raised great jealousies; and there was a petition brought, and delivered to the houses in the names of several merchants who used to trade to the mint; and they desired that there might be such a person made lieutenant of the Tower, "as they could confide in," (an expression that grew from that time to be much used,) without which no man would venture bullion into the mint, and by consequence no merchant would bring it into the kingdom. Whereas in truth there was no gentleman of the kingdom of a better reputation amongst all sorts of men, and there had been more bullion brought into the mint in the short time of his being lieutenant, than had been in many months before: and amongst those persons, which so solemnly delivered that petition, and had all subscribed it, there were very few who had ever sent any silver into the mint. However, the house entertained the complaint as very reasonable, and sent for a conference with the lords, with whom they prevailed to join with them in a desire to the king, "that he would remove sir John Byron from being lieutenant of the Tower;" which the king for some time refused to do, till they pressed it in another manner, which shall be mentioned anon.

The committee, that still continued to sit in London, intended no other business, but their own privileges; sent for, and examined, as hath been said, all men who had attended his majesty, or had been casually present in the hall, or at the door of the commons' house, when the king was there: and all such examinations, as testified any extravagant discourse uttered by any loose fellow, who had accidentally put himself into the company, though it appeared he had no relation to the king's service, were carefully entered, and published; but such as declared the king's strict command against any violence or disorder, and his positive charge, that no man should presume to follow him into the house of commons, (as full proof was made to them of those particulars,) were as carefully suppressed and concealed.

The sheriffs of London were directed to appoint a guard to attend the committee, whilst it should continue at Guildhall; and then to guard the houses when they should again sit at Westminster. The accused persons, who lodged all this time in the city, were brought to the committee with much state, and sat with them to devise some way to vindicate themselves.

Then a declaration was agreed upon by the commons only, in which was set forth, "that the chambers, studies, and trunks of Mr. Hollis, sir Arthur Haslerig, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hambden, and Mr. Strode, had been by colour of his majesty's warrant sealed up; which was not only against the privilege of parliament, but the common liberty of every subject; that the said members had been the same day demanded by a sergeant at arms to be delivered to him, that he might arrest them of high treason; that the next day his majesty came to the house in his own person, attended by a multitude of armed men, in a warlike manner, with halberds, swords, and pistols, who came up to the very door of the house, and placed themselves there, and in other places and passages near to the house, to the great terror and disturbance of the members then sitting; that his majesty, sitting in the speaker's chair, demanded the persons of those members to be delivered to him; which was a high breach of the rights and privileges of parliament, and inconsistent with the liberties and freedom thereof; that afterwards his majesty did issue forth several warrants to divers officers under his own hand, for the apprehension of their persons, which by law he could not do." And thereupon they declared, "that if any person should arrest Mr. Hollis, &c. or any other member of parliament, by pretence of any warrant issuing out from the king, he was guilty of the breach of the privilege of parliament, and a public enemy of the commonwealth; and that the arresting any member of parliament, by any warrant whatsoever, without consent of that house, whereof he is a member, is a breach of the privilege of parliament: and the person that shall so arrest him is declared a public enemy of the commonwealth."

They published, "that it did fully appear by several examinations, that many soldiers, papists and others, to the number of about five hundred, came with his majesty to the house of commons, armed; and that some of them, holding up their pistols cocked near the door of the house, which they kept open, said, I am a good marksman; I can hit right, I warrant you: and said, they would have the door open; and if any opposition was made, they made no question but they should maintain their party; and that some said, A pox take the house of commons; let them be hanged. And when the king returned from the house, they expressed great discontent, asking, when comes the word: that some of them being demanded what they thought the company intended to have done, answered, that questionless in the posture they were set, if the word had been given, they should have fallen upon the house of commons, and have cut all their throats: upon which they said they were of opinion, that the soldiers and papists coming in that manner

"with his majesty was to take away some of the members of the house; and if they should have found opposition, or denial, then to have fallen upon the house in a hostile manner."

And they did thereupon declare, "That the same was a traitorous design against the king and parliament. And whereas the persons accused had, with the approbation of the house, absented themselves from the service of the house, for avoiding the great and many inconveniences, which otherwise might have happened; since which time, a printed paper in the form of a proclamation had issued out for the apprehending and imprisoning them, suggesting, that through the conscience of their guilt they were absent and fled;" they did further declare, that the said printed paper was false, scandalous, and illegal; and that notwithstanding that printed paper, or any warrant issued out, or any other matter against them, they might and ought [to] attend the service of the house, and the committees then on foot; and that it was lawful for all persons whatsoever to lodge, harbour, or converse with them; and whosoever should be questioned for the same should be under the protection and privilege of parliament."

And they declared, "That the publishing the articles of high treason against the persons accused, was a high breach of the privilege of parliament, a great scandal to his majesty and his government, a seditious act, manifestly tending to the subversion of the peace of the kingdom, and an injury and dishonour to the members; that the privileges of parliament, and liberties of the subject, so violated and broken, could not be fully and sufficiently vindicated, unless the king would be graciously pleased to discover the names of those persons, who advised him to do the particular acts before mentioned, that they might receive condign punishment."

This strange declaration, so contrary to the known rules and judgments of law, and to the known practice and proceedings of parliament, was no sooner framed and agreed upon in the committee, than it was printed, and published throughout the city and kingdom, before it was confirmed by, or reported to the house; which is against the law, and an express statute in that case provided, that no act done at any committee should be divulged before the same be reported to the house.

The truth is, it cannot be expressed how great a change there appeared to be in the countenance and minds of all sorts of people, in town and country, upon these late proceedings of the king. They, who had before even lost their spirits, having lost their credit and reputation, except amongst the meanest people, who could never have been made use of by them, when the greater should forsake them; and so despairing of ever being able to compass their designs of malice, or ambition, (some of them were resuming their old resolutions of leaving the kingdom,) now again recovered greater courage than ever, and quickly found that their credit and reputation was as great as ever it had been; the court being reduced to a lower condition, and to more disesteem and neglect, than ever it had undergone. All that they had formerly said of plots and conspiracies against the parliament, which had before been laughed at, was now thought true and real; and all their fears and jealousies looked upon as the effects of their great wisdom and foresight. All that had been whispered of Ireland was now talked aloud and printed; as all other seditious pamphlets and libels were. The shops of the city generally shut up, as if an enemy were at their gates ready to enter, and to plunder them; and the people in all places at a gaze, as if they looked only for directions, and were then disposed to any undertaking.

On the other side, they who had, with the greatest courage and alacrity, opposed all their seditious practices, between grief and anger were confounded with the consideration of what had been done, and what was like to follow. They were far from thinking that the accused members had received much wrong; yet they thought it an unreasonable time to call them to account for it. That if any thing had been to be done of that kind, there should have been a better choice of the persons, there being many of the house, of more mischievous inclinations, and designs against the king's person and the government, and were more exposed to the public prejudice, than the lord Mandeville Kimbolton was; who was a civil and well natured man, and had rather kept ill company, than drank deep of that infection and poison, that had wrought upon many others. Then sir Arthur Haslerig and Mr. Strobe were persons of too low an account and esteem; and though their virulence and malice was as conspicuous and transcendent as any men's, yet their reputation and interest to do any mischief, otherwise than in concurring in it, was so small, that they gained credit and authority by being joined with the rest, who had indeed a great influence. However, if there was a resolution to proceed against those men, it would have been much better to have caused them to have been all severally arrested, and sent to the Tower, or to other prisons, which might have been very easily done before suspected, than to send in that manner to the houses with that formality, which would be liable to so many exceptions. At least, they ought so far to have imparted it to members in both houses, who might have been trusted, that in the instant of the accusation, when both houses were in that consternation, (as in a great consternation they were,) somewhat might have been pressed confidently towards the king's satisfaction; which would have produced some opposition and contradiction, which would have prevented that universal concurrence and dejection of spirit, which seized upon and possessed both houses.

But, above all, the anger and indignation was very great and general, that to all the other oversights and presumptions [was added] the exposing the dignity, and majesty, and safety of the king, in his coming in person, in that manner, to the house of commons; and in going the next day, as he did, to the guildhall, and to the lord mayor's, which drew such reproaches upon him to his face. All which was justly imputed to the lord Digby, who had before fewer true friends than he deserved, and had now almost the whole nation his enemies, being the most universally odious of any man in it.

When the house of commons had passed such votes from the committee at Merchant-Tailors' hall, as they thought necessary, and once more adjourned thither, the committee asked the advice of the house, whether the accused members might be present with them, (who had in truth directed and governed all their proceedings from the time they sat there :) which was not only approved, but those members required to attend the house the next day it was to sit, and so to continue the service of the house, which was then adjourned for three or four days, that the city might appear in such a posture, as should be thought convenient.

The noise was so great of the preparations made in the city to bring the accused members in triumph to the parliament, and that the whole militia would accompany them, whilst the seamen and mariners made an appearance in barges, and other vessels, upon the Thames to Westminster, [that] the king thought it convenient to remove again from Whitehall; and so on the tenth of January, which was the eve to the great festival, his majesty, the queen, and the royal children, went from Whitehall to Hampton-court, attended by some few of their own household servants, and thirty or forty of those officers, who had attended at Whitehall for security against the tumults.

Before his going, he sent to the earls of Essex and Holland to attend him in his journey; who were both by their places, the one being his chamberlain of his household, the other the prime gentleman of his bedchamber, obliged to that duty. The earl of Essex resolved to go; and to that purpose was making himself ready, when the earl of Holland came to him, and privately dissuaded him; assuring him, that if they two went, they should be both murdered at Hampton-court: whereupon they left the king to his small retinue and in a most disconsolate, perplexed condition, in more need of comfort and counsel, than they had ever known him; and, instead of attending their master in that exigent, they went together into the city, where the committee sat, where they were not the less welcome for being known to have been invited to have waited upon their majesties. They who wished the king best, were not sorry that he then withdrew from Whitehall; for the insolence, with which all that people were transported, and the animosity, which was infused into the hearts of the people in general against the court, and even against the person of the king, cannot be expressed.

Whilst the committee sat in London, the common council likewise met, [as hath been said,] to the end they might be ready to comply in any particulars should be desired from the city; and so the committee having resolved, "that the actions of the citizens of London, or of any other person whatsoever for the defence of the parliament, or the privileges thereof, or the preservation of the members thereof, were according to their duty, and to their late protestation, and the laws of this kingdom:" and if any person should arrest or trouble any of them for so doing, he was declared "to be a public enemy of the commonwealth:" and in the next place having resolved, "that that vote should be made known to the common council of the city of London," the accused members about two of the clock in the afternoon on the eleventh of January, being the next day after the king went to Hampton-court, came from their lodgings in the city to Westminster, guarded by the sheriffs, and trained-bands of London and Westminster, and attended by a conflux of many thousands of people besides, making a great clamour against bishops and popish lords, and of the privileges of parliament; some of them, as they passed by Whitehall, asking, with much contempt, "what was become of the king and his cavaliers? and whither he was gone?"

From London-bridge to Westminster, the Thames was guarded with above one hundred lighters and long-boats, laden with nablettes and murderers, and dressed up with waist-clothes and streamers, as ready for fight. And that the trained-bands of London might be under the command of a person fit to lead them, they granted a commission to captain Skippon, who was captain of the artillery-garden, to be major-general of the militia of the city of London; an office never before heard of, nor imagined that they had authority to constitute such an officer. The man had served very long in Holland, and from a common soldier had raised himself to the degree of a captain, and to the reputation of a good officer: he was a man of order and sobriety, and untainted with any of those vices, which the officers of that army were exercised in; and had newly given over that service upon some exceptions he had to it; and, coming to London, was by some friends preferred to that command in the artillery-garden, which was to teach the citizens the posture of their arms. He was altogether illiterate, and having been bred always in Holland, he brought disaffection enough with him from thence against the church of England, and so was much caressed and trusted by that party.

This man marched that day in the head of their army to the parliament-house; where the accused members were no sooner entered, than they magnified "the great kindness and affection they had found in the city, and their zeal to the parliament; and if their expressions of it, upon this extraordinary occasion, had been somewhat unusual, that the house was engaged in honour to protect and defend them from receiving any damage." Whereupon the sheriffs of London were called into the house of commons, and thanked by the speaker for their extraordinary care, and love expressed to the parliament; and told, "that they should have an ordinance of parliament for their indemnity, declaring that all their actions of respect and kindness, which they had shewed to the lords and commons in London, and their attending them to and at Westminster, was legal and justifiable." The masters and officers of ships were likewise called in, and most heartily thanked for their kindness; and sergeant-major-general Skippon appointed every day to attend at Westminster, with such a guard as he thought sufficient for the guard of the two houses. There was one circumstance not to be forgotten in the march of the city that day, when the show by water was little inferior to the other by land, that the pikemen had fastened to the tops of their pikes, and the rest in their hats, or their bosoms, printed papers of the protestation which had been taken, and enjoined by the house of commons the year before for the defence of the privilege of parliament; and many of them had the printed votes of the king's breaking their privileges in his coming to the house, and demanding their members.

As soon as the citizens and mariners were discharged, some Buckinghamshire men, who were said to be at [the] door, with a petition, and had indeed waited upon the triumph with a train of four thousand men, were called in ; who delivered their petition in the name of the inhabitants of the county of Buckingham, and said it was brought to the town by about six thousand men. " They commended the unwearied pains of the house of commons, for redress of the pressures they had lain under ; but complained that the success was not answerable, their endeavours being frustrated or retarded by a malignant faction of popish lords, bishops, and others ; and now of late, to take all that little hope, was left, from them, of a future reformation, the very being of the parliament was shaken, the privileges thereof broken in a desperate and unexampled manner, and the members thereof unassured of their lives, in whose safety, the safety of them and their posterity was involved. They held it therefore their duty, according to their late protestation, to defend and maintain the persons and privileges thereof, to the utmost power of their lives and estates ; to which purpose, they said, they were then come to make the humble tender of their service, and would remain in expectation of their commands and order ; to the execution whereof they would with all alacrity address themselves, ready to live by them, or to die at their feet, against whomsoever should in any sort illegally attempt upon them.

" They besought them therefore to assist the ardent prayers of the petitioners, that the popish lords and bishops might be forthwith ousted the house of peers ; that all privileges of parliament might be confirmed to them, and that all evil counsellors, the Achans of the commonwealth, might be given up to the hands of justice ; without all which, they said, they had not the least hope of Israel's peace, or to reap those glorious advantages, which the fourteen months seed-time of their unparalleled endeavours had given to their unsatisfied expectations."

When they had received thanks for their wonderful affection, and were told, that, " by the great care of the city of London, the parliament was sufficiently guarded and assured ; and therefore that they might depart to their houses till further occasion appeared, of which they should be sure to be informed ;" one of them said, " they had another petition, which they meant to prefer to the king ; but desired their advice, whether that house would vouchsafe to commend it, or whether they themselves should deliver it." For that, they received new thanks ; and were wished, that six or eight of them should present it to his majesty in the name of the rest ; for the house saw their wisdom and moderation such, that they presumed they of themselves were very able to manage that business.

When they had thus caressed the commons, they went to the house of lords with another petition, complaining " of the malignant faction, which rendered the endeavours of the house of commons unsuccessful," and said, " that in respect of that late attempt upon the honourable house of commons, they were come to offer their service, as resolved in their just defence to live and die. And therefore they did humbly pray, that that most honourable house would cooperate with the house of commons, in speedily perfecting the most necessary work of reformation, bringing to condign and unexampled punishment both

" wicked counsellors, and other plotters and delinquents ; and that the whole kingdom might be put into such a present posture of defence, that they might be safe both from all practices of the malignant party at home, and the endeavours of any ill-affected states abroad." The lords were as civil to them as the commons had been, and gave them great thanks. And from thence they went to find out the king with another petition ; in which they complained, " that Mr. Hambden, whom they had chosen knight of their shire, and in whom they had ever good cause to confide, was, to their great amazement, accused ; amongst others accused of high treason. They said, that having taken into their serious consideration the manner of their impeachment, they could not but conceive that it did oppugn the rights of parliament, to the maintenance whereof their protestation did bind them ; and they did believe, that the malice, which his and the others' zeal to his majesty's service, and the state, had contracted in the enemies of his majesty, the church, and the commonwealth, had occasioned that foul accusation, rather than any deserts of theirs ; and that through their sides the judgment and care of the petitioners and others were wounded, by whose choice they were presented to the house ; and therefore they did humbly desire his majesty, that Mr. Hambden, and the rest, who lay under the burden of that accusation, might enjoy the just privileges of parliament." So from this day we may reasonably date the levying of war in England ; whatsoever hath been since done being but the superstructures upon those foundations, which were then laid.

The members being in this manner placed again upon their thrones, and the king retired with his poor family to Hampton-court, they reviewed their votes, which had passed in the committee in the city, which they had caused every night to be printed without staying for the confirmation of the house ; and where they had any defect, as they thought, or in the interpretation of others, they supplied them with more strength and authority. So they provided and declared, " that no member of parliament should be arrested upon any pretence whatsoever." And because it had been insisted on, that they would not make any declaration so much against the known law, which allowed no privilege in the case of treason, felony, or breach of the peace, they now added, that " even in the case of treason no member ought or could be arrested, or proceeded against, without first informing the house, of which he was a member, of the charge and evidence against him, and receiving their leave and direction for the proceeding against him." And that men might hereafter be more wary how they were made instrumental in bringing any reproach upon them, they appointed a committee to prepare a charge against Herbert, the king's attorney-general, for presuming to accuse the members of high-treason ; which was made ready accordingly, and prosecuted with wonderful vigour, as will be remembered hereafter.

They resolved that the king should not enjoy much ease and quiet in his retreat ; and therefore every day sent some committee or other to him with petitions and expostulations : a committee of lords and commons attended him with a grievous complaint of the breach of privilege they had sustained by his coming to the house; and desired "that he would inform them who had given him that pernicious counsel, that such evil counsel might be brought to justice, and receive condign punishment." And when they found that the lord Digby, whom they generally believed to be the author and contriver of all that transaction, though they could have no evidence of it, had withdrawn himself from the court, and they well enough knew had transported himself beyond the seas, they brought witnesses to the bar, who affirmed, "that there were, on such a day, several officers, whereof the unbeloved Lunsford was one, assembled together at Kingston upon Thames near Hampton-court; and that the lord Digby came thither to them in a coach with six horses from Hampton-court, and conferred a long time with them, and then returned again thither." They were well satisfied with the evidence, and forthwith accused him to the house of peers of high treason, for the levying of war against the king and parliament; and a proclamation was shortly issued out for his apprehension, when all the town knew that he was safely arrived in Zealand; but they thought it fit to shew him how unsavoury a jest the sending out such proclamations was to be esteemed. They resumed the consideration of the lieutenant of the Tower; and upon new information that much provision was sent in thither every day, they sent for sir John Byron, who appeared at their bar, and gave so full answers to all the questions they asked of him, that they could not but dismiss him. However they sent again to the king to remove him, and put a fitter man into the place, and recommended sir John Coniers to him, as a man in whom they could confide; and because they did not speedily receive such an answer as they liked, they appointed their major-general Skippon to place such guards about the Tower, as might prevent the carrying in more provision of victual thither, than would serve for one day's consumption; notwithstanding which, his majesty would not consent to their desire.

All men were now in union in both houses: the lords had not yet recovered the courage to dissent in any one proposition made to them from the commons; and in that house no man durst presume to debate the matter of privilege, how far it extended, and in what cases it was of no moment, lest he might be thought to be privy to, and a counsellor of, that heinous breach, which had given them all this credit. In this consent and concurrence, all the votes, which had passed at the committee in London, and which had been by them communicated to the common council, and so divulged throughout the city and kingdom, were confirmed; and those who objected against any expressions, which were not warrantable, reprehended for laying a tax upon the discretion of the committee.

And in one day both houses agreed in and executed three acts of sovereignty, even of as high a nature as any they have since ventured upon; the first, "in commanding the sheriffs of London, by "and with the advice of their new sergeant-major-general Skippon, to place a guard upon, that is "to besiege the Tower of London, to hinder the "going in of any provisions, or going out of any "arms or ammunition;" the second, "in appointing sir John Hotham to go to Hull," which will be mentioned anon; the third, "in sending an "order to the governor of Portsmouth, that no "body should be admitted into that town and "fort, or suffered to pass from thence, or any "thing to be disposed of there, but by order from "the king signified by both houses of parliament."

After this, a message was resolved upon to be sent to the governor of the prince, "that he should "not suffer the prince to be transported out of the "kingdom, as he would answer the breach of trust "reposed in him concerning religion, and the "honour, safety, and peace of the three kingdoms;" and declaring, "that any person, who "should persuade or attend upon him in such "transportation, should be under the same censure." With these high acts of public concernment they joined the vindication of themselves from the late trespass from the king: and to that end caused the attorney-general to be publicly examined upon interrogatories, "whether he did "contrive, frame, or advise the articles of impeachment against the members that were accused? whether he knew the truth of them "upon his own knowledge, or by information? "whether he would undertake to make them good, "when he should be thereunto called? from whom "he received them, and by whose direction or "advice he did exhibit them? whether he had "any testimony or proof of them before the exhibiting?" And having received his answer, "that he had neither framed, nor advised them, "nor knew any thing of the truth of them, nor "could undertake to justify them; but that he "had received them from the king, and was by "him commanded to exhibit them;" they presently declared, "that he had broken the privilege of "parliament in preferring those articles, and that "the same was illegal, and he criminal for so "doing; and that a charge should be sent to the "lords, in the name of the house of commons, "against the attorney-general, to have satisfaction "for the great scandal and injury to the members "thereof, unless he did within five days bring in "his proof, and make good the articles against "them."

So that they had now raised to themselves an unquestionable stock of security, when they had declared, "that they might neither be apprehended "by a warrant under the king's own hand, nor "indeed by himself, nor accused by his attorney-general, except themselves were willing:" and they, who had concluded it most exactly just, that the house of peers must imprison their own members, as fast as they accused them of high treason, and, by that rule, had, within less than a week before, freed themselves of twelve bishops, who always opposed their desires, (and in a case, where every man's conscience absolved them of the guilt, of which they were charged,) thought it now unanswerable reason to evince the injustice of the king's proceedings; "because if a man should be "committed and imprisoned as soon as the king "accused him of high treason, the parliament "might be dissolved; since he might successively "accuse the whole body;" which logic, if they had not pleased to vote the contrary, would have run as well in their own case, and upon their own license of accusing, and more dangerously in respect of the house of peers, which might possibly indeed have been thereby dissolved, when by new elections that mischief would easily be prevented in the house of commons.

Though the king had removed himself out of the noise of Westminster, yet the effects of it followed him very close; for besides the Buckinghamshire petitioners, who alarmed him the same, or the next day after he came to Hampton-court, several of the same nature were every day presented to him, in the name of other counties of the kingdom; all which were printed, and scattered abroad with the declaration of the lord Digby's levying war at Kingston upon Thames, and the proclamation for apprehending him; all which being so industriously dispersed, and without any colour, or ground of danger, but only that the kingdom might be injured to the style of the two houses, and exercised in their commands against the time that they meant to be in earnest, gave the king reason to remove in few days from Hampton-court to his castle at Windsor, where he could be more secure from any sudden popular attempt; of which he had reason to be very apprehensive, when, after those high acts of sedition at London and Westminster were declared to be according to the laws of the land, and the protestation lately taken, that protestation was by a new order enjoined to be administered throughout the kingdom, and the names of all those who refused to take it, which there was reason to believe many would upon the new gloss, returned to the house of commons, who were as severe inquisitors as could be found any where.

From thence he sent a message to both houses, "That he took notice, that his proceedings against those persons, whom he had accused, (naming them,) were conceived by many to be illegal, and not agreeable to the privileges of the parliament; and that he was so desirous to give satisfaction to all men in all matters that might seem to have relation to privilege of parliament, that he would wave his former proceedings; and all doubts being by that means settled, when the minds of men were composed, he would proceed against them in an unquestionable way; and assured both houses, that upon all occasions he would be as careful of their privileges as of his life, or his crown. To which he added, that, in all his proceedings against those persons, he had never the least intention of violating the least privilege of parliament; and in case any doubt of breach of privilege remained, he would be willing to assert it by any reasonable way his parliament should advise him to; and therefore he desired them forthwith to lay by all jealousies, and apply themselves to the public and pressing affairs, and especially to those of Ireland, wherein the good of the kingdom, and the true religion, which should ever be his first care, were so highly and so nearly concerned. And he desired them, that his care of their privileges might increase their care of his lawful prerogative, which was so necessary to the mutual defence of each other, and both would be the foundation of a perpetual and perfect intelligence between his majesty and parliaments, and of the happiness and prosperity of his people."

But these messages were not such as they looked for; there was still left a courage for prosecution; and though the error in form seemed to be consented to, yet the substance and matter of the accusation might be still insisted on. And therefore they took no notice of them, but proceeded in inflaming all men with the sense of the breach of privilege; and finding the general mettle somewhat to abate, that they might keep up the apprehension of danger, and the estimation of their darling the city, they consult about adjourning both houses into London; but finding some danger of infringing the act of parliament, from whence some advantage might be taken to their prejudice, till that power might be cleared by a law, they were contented to adjourn their houses as they had done for some days, and to appoint committees, qualified with more power than the houses had, to meet in London; which, for the conveniency of the common council, who took up the guildhall, chose to sit in Grocers' hall.

It was wondered, having all places so much at their devotion, that they would remove from their more convenient seats at Westminster; where they might transact whatsoever they desired without interruption, and where they were only disturbed by their own direction. But the advantage they reaped by it was extraordinary; for, besides the fears they dispersed abroad, and the confidence they gave their own friends of the city by being with them, they were sure, for the most part, to have a committee to their own hearts' desire; for besides many out of laziness or indignation would not attend the service in so unnatural a place, very many, who troubled them most in their counsels, durst not in earnest go thither, for fear of uncivilly affronts, if not danger, their names being published in the tumults as disaffected persons; and [they] were those, indeed, which constituted the malignant party, which they prayed against: and they found it much easier to transact any thing contrived and framed by such a committee, than originally offered and debated in either house, before the mystery was understood by their proselytes, and when those, who too well understood it, did render their designs sometimes ineffectual.

The minds of men throughout the kingdom being now prepared to receive all their dictates with reverence, and to obey all their orders, and to believe that all their safety consisted in, and depended upon their authority, and there being few within the house, who had courage to oppose and contradict them, they sent to the lords to quicken them in the bill they had formerly sent to them concerning removing the bishops out of their house; which now, when there were so many of them removed into the Tower, they presumed would not meet with so great an opposition. In the house of commons they called to have the bill read, which had lain so long there, the same that had been brought in by Saint-John for the settling the militia of the kingdom; to which they now added "the putting all the forts, castles, and garrisons, into the hands of such persons, as they could confide in;" which was the expression they used, when they had a mind to remove any man from a place, of which he was justly possessed, "that they could not confide in him, which they thought to be reason enough to displace any man." When it had been with much ado accepted, and first read, there were few men who imagined it would ever receive further countenance: but now there were very few, who did not believe it to be a very necessary provision for the peace and safety of the kingdom. So great an impression had the late proceedings made upon them ; so that with little opposition it passed the commons, and was sent up to the lords.

Upon the disbanding the late army in the north, all the artillery, arms, and ammunition, that was provided for that service, had been by the king's command sent to Hull, where it still remained ; and his majesty intended it should be kept there, for a magazine upon all occasions. And he had a little before these late passages sent the earl of Newcastle thither, with a private commission, to be governor thereof, as soon as it should be fit to publish such a command ; and in the mean time by his own interest to draw in such of the country, as were necessary to guard the magazine. But nothing the king did in the most private manner, but was quickly known to those from whom it should most have been concealed. And so the earl of Newcastle was no sooner gone, but notice was taken of it ; and he had not been three days in Hull, before the house of peers sent for him, to attend the service of that house, which he had rarely used to do, being for the most part at Richmond attending upon the prince of Wales, whose governor he was. He made no haste to return upon the summons of the house, but sent to the king to know his pleasure ; who, not thinking matters yet ripe enough to make any such declaration, appointed him to come away ; upon which he appeared in the house, without being asked where he had been.

But both houses shortly after moved the king, " that the magazine at Hull might be removed to the Tower of London, which would be very necessary for the quieting the minds of that country, " and abating the fears and jealousies in the hearts " of very many, who did apprehend some design in " the keeping so much ammunition in those northern parts : " and his majesty not giving them a speedy answer, they sent down sir John Hotham, whose estate lay within three or four miles of Hull, and [he] had some command of the trained-bands, " to be governor thereof, and to draw in such " of the country as he thought fit for the security of " the place. " And though Hotham had concurred with them in all their violent ways, yet they well knew that he was not possessed with their principles in any degree, but was very well affected in his judgment to the government both in church and state, but had been first engaged by his particular malice against the earl of Strafford, and afterwards terrified by their votes against sheriffs and deputy lieutenants ; and therefore they sent his son, a member likewise of the house, and in whom they most confided, to assist him in that service, or rather to be a spy upon his father. And this was the first essay they made of their sovereign power of the militia and the forts, whilst their bill was yet depending, and was a sufficient manifestation what they intended to do, when it should be passed ; towards which they made all the haste they could, exercising the king's patience every day with some unsavoury message to him, upon their privileges, and requiring " vindication, and " reparation, and discovery of the persons who had " promoted that prosecution ; " and the council once a week attending upon his majesty at Windsor, though he could not consult with them upon what most concerned him.

In this sad condition was the king at Windsor, fallen in ten days from a height and greatness that his enemies feared, to such a lowness, that his own servants durst hardly avow the waiting on him. For though, it is true, the acts of the house of commons, and the tumults, were as great affronts to majesty, before this last act upon the members, as any that could be imagined possible to succeed, yet the house of peers was well disposed, and might have been managed with a little patience, to have blasted all the extravagances of the commons. And the truth is, the greatest extravagances appeared to the standers-by to be but the attempts of persons in despair, and the strong accents of men at the last gasp. And, without doubt, if the king could have had the patience to have sat still a spectator of the dissensions between the two houses, and encouraging the lords, who were firm to him, and putting those matters in issue, wherein the commons had invaded both his and the lords' privileges ; if he had commanded his council at law and the judges, to have proceeded by the strict rules of the law against seditious persons at large, for preaching and printing against the peace of the kingdom, and put the commons' house either to have been quiet, whilst their champions were exemplarily punished, (which would have put a speedy end to their license,) or to have appeared the champions for an infamous act against the law and the justice of the kingdom, their jurisdiction would in a short time have been brought within the due limits, and the stoutest factor for the violent party been glad to have compounded for an act of oblivion.

And I have heard from credible persons, that the chief of that faction afterwards confessed, that if that extraordinary accident had not happened to give them new credit and reputation, they were sinking under the weight of the expectation of those whom they had deluded, and the envy of those whom they had oppressed. I am sure, they who out of conscience, and loyalty to their king and country, diligently attended the public service, were strangely surprised at the matter and manner of that accusation ; and foresaw, from the minute, the infinite disadvantage it would bring to the king's affairs. Not that they thought the gentlemen accused, less guilty ; for their extreme dishonest arts in the house were so visible, that nothing could have been laid to their charge incredible : but the going through with it was a matter of so great difficulty and concernment, that every circumstance ought to have been fully deliberated, and the several parts dispensed into such hands, as would not have shaken in the execution. And the saying, that the king had not competent persons enough, whom he might trust in so important a secret, (which I believe was true,) is only an argument, that the thing was not to be attempted at all, than that it was to be attempted in that manner ; for whoever would have betrayed the trust, would be sure to find fault with it, when it was endeavoured without him, especially if it miscarried. The truth is, there was little reason to believe, that the house of peers would commit the lord Kimbolton upon the accusation of Mr. Attorney in that conjuncture of time ; and less that the house of commons would deliver up their members to the sergeant at arms, when they should be demanded ; which was an irregular thing, and implied unreasonably, that they had some power to keep them, who were desired to deliver them. Yet if the choice had been better made, and the several persons first apprehended, and put into distinct close custodies, that neither any body else should have heard from them, nor they one from another, all which had not been very difficult, the high spirit of both houses might possibly have been so dejected, that they might have been treated withal. But even that attempt had been too great for the solitary state the king was at that time in; which was most naturally to have been improved by standing upon his guard, and denying all that was in his power to deny, and in compelling his ministers to execute the law in those cases, that demonstrably concerned the public peace.

The committee at Grocers' hall, very exalted to find no opposition in any thing they desired from both houses, resolved to make what advantage they could of that season of their power; and therefore, not vouchsafing to return any answer to the king's messages of retraction, they concluded upon "a new remonstrance to be made of the state of the kingdom; in which they would present to the king's view the causes of the present evils and distractions, and propose to him, by way of advice, the remedies that in their opinion he was to apply to those evils.

"The causes they agreed to be, the evil council about the king and queen, disposing all occurrences of state, and abusing the king's power and authority to the prejudice of religion, the hazarding the public peace, and strengthening a malignant party in the kingdom; the influence which the priests and Jesuits had upon the affections and counsels of the queen, and the admission of her majesty to intermeddle with the great affairs of state, and with the disposing [of] places and preferments of the highest concernment in the kingdom; whereby those of great power and authority were engaged to favour such designs, as were infused into her majesty by those of that religion: the want of a due reformation of the church-government, and liturgy then used; the want of a preaching ministry, and a competent maintenance for them; the over strict pressing of divers ceremonies in the liturgy and rubrick, and the pressing other ceremonies not enjoined by law; the votes of the popish lords in the house of peers, which was a hinderance of the reformation, and a protection of the malignant party; the preferring such as had adhered to delinquents, and the displeasure shewed against those who had been used as witnesses in the prosecution of them; the breaches of the privileges of parliament; and the managing the great affairs of the realm in cabinet councils by men unknown, and not publicly trusted; the preferring men to degrees of honour and offices, and displacing others, in parliament time, and without the consent of that council; and many other particulars; to which they thought these remedies most natural, and proper to be applied.

"That all privy-counsellors, and others of trust and employment beyond the seas, should be removed from their places, and only such admitted, as should be recommended to the king by both houses of parliament; and that such counsellors and officers, as should be so displaced, and not again recommended, should not have access to

"the courts of the king and queen: that all priests, papists, and ill-affected persons, though professing the protestant religion, should be removed from the queen's person, and from having any office or employment under her, and that all her servants should take such an oath as should be devised by parliament; that he, or she, would not at any time, directly or indirectly, by him, or herself, or any other, move or petition, or solicit her majesty in any matter concerning the state and government of the kingdom, or concerning any favour or immunity to be conferred upon any papists, or for any honour, preferment, or employment of any person whatsoever.

"That the king would remove from about his own person, and the queen's, and from both their courts, Mr. William Murray, Mr. Porter, Mr. John Winter, and Mr. William Crofts, being all persons of evil fame, and disaffected to the public peace and prosperity of the kingdom, and instruments of jealousy and discontent between the king and the parliament, &c., that the king would not entertain any advice or mediation from the queen in matters of religion, or concerning the government of any of his dominions, or for the placing or displacing of any great officers, counsellors, ambassadors, or agents beyond the seas, or any of his servants attending his royal person, either in his bed-chamber, or privy-chamber, or attending the prince, or any of the royal issue after they shall attain to the age of five years.

"That the queen should take a solemn oath, in the presence of both houses of parliament, that she would not hereafter give any counsel, or use any mediation to the king, concerning the disposing of any offices or places above mentioned, or at all intermeddle in any of the affairs of state, or government of the kingdom: that all officers and counsellors, that should be employed in any of the places before mentioned, should take a solemn oath, that they had not made use of any power or mediation of the queen, directly or indirectly, for their preferment, or in obtaining any such place or employment: that the affairs of the kingdom should not be concluded or transacted by the advice of private men, or by any unknown or unsworn counsellors, but such matters as were fit for the council, by the privy-counsellors only; and such as were fit for the parliament, by the parliament only.

"That no person whatsoever, under the penalty of treason, should presume to solicit or further any proposition for the marriage of any of the king's children with any prince or person of the popish religion; and that no marriage for any of the king's children should be concluded with any prince or person whatsoever, without the consent and advice of both houses of parliament: that none of the king's children, except the princess Mary then affianced, should at any time go beyond the seas without the consent of both houses of parliament; and that no person, under penalty of high treason, should assist, or attend any of his majesty's children in any such voyage beyond the seas, without the like consent of both the houses of parliament.

"That no mass, or popish service, should be said in the courts of the king or queen, or in the house of any subject of the kingdom; and that more laws should be made against the papists;

"and all the priests which were condemned should be forthwith executed. That the votes of popish lords might be taken away; and a reformation [made] of the church-government and liturgy by the parliament; and that no penalty should be incurred for omission of any ceremony, till the reformation should be perfect: that all delinquents should be subject to such penalties and forfeitures as should be agreed on, and imposed by bill, in both houses of parliament: that such as should be declared in parliament to adhere to any delinquents, and had thereupon received any preferment from the king, should be removed from such preferment; and such as should be declared by both houses to have been employed and used against delinquents, and had thereupon fallen into the king's displeasure, and been put from their places, should be restored to their places, and his majesty's favour.

"That every person, who, being a member of the house of commons in that parliament, had been accused of any offence against that house, and, the accusation depending, had been called up to the house of lords in the quality of a peer, should by act of parliament be put out of that house; and that hereafter no member of the house of commons should without their consent be called up to be a peer, except in case of descent: that no person, which should hereafter be made a peer of the realm, should be admitted to have his seat, or vote in the house of peers, without the consent of both houses of parliament: that those members of the house of commons, who had this parliament been called to the house of peers, except in case of descent, should be excluded from giving their votes in the house of peers, unless both houses of parliament should assent thereunto: that no member of either house of parliament should be preferred or displaced, sitting the parliament, without the consent of that house, whereof he was a member: that such of either house as had been preferred to any place or office, during the parliament, might be put out of those offices and places.

"That the king would declare the names of those who advised him to the accusation of the members, and all the particulars that ensued upon that accusation; and that he would make public declaration and promise in parliament, never more to receive information from any man to the prejudice of any member of either house, for any thing done in that house, without discovering the name of such person who gave him such information."

These, and many other particulars of the like nature, were the results of that committee at Grocers' hall; which I insert here, being the proper time of their birth, that the world may see what their projections were in the infancy of their visible power and advantage, though they were not digested into avowed propositions till long after, as the effects of riper divisions, and fuller grown jealousies. For by that time they had shaped and formed these devices, they found the eyes of the people not to be so universally shut as they had been; and that the king's coming to the house of commons, or the accusing the members, was not more spoken of than the tumults, and the driving the king out of London, and not suffering him to be quiet at Hampton-court; then that the lords begun to take new courage, and though they were somewhat intoxicated with the matter of privilege, yet that they thought a trespass capable of reparation, and so were willing to receive any overture from the king to that purpose. They concluded therefore, "the time was not yet ripe to do all at once, till more men were engaged," and resolved, "with more patience to win their ground by inches."

The king continued at Windsor to expect the end, or the issue of this tempest; and finding that they hardly would take notice of his former messages, but proceeded in the high ways of destruction, for he had advertisement of their most secret combinations, resolved to send such a message to the two houses, whose united reputation was yet too great to struggle with, as might at least divide those, who desired the public peace, from the ministers of confusion: and so on the twentieth of January sent this proposition and message to them in writing, "for preventing those evils, which the manifold distractions threatened to the kingdom; that they would with all speed fall into a serious consideration of all those particulars, which they held necessary, as well for the upholding and maintaining the king's just and regal authority, and the settling his revenue, as for the present and future establishment of their privileges, the free and quiet enjoying of their estates and fortunes, the liberties of their persons, the security of the true religion now professed in the church of England, and the settling of ceremonies in such a manner, as might take away all just offence; which when they should have digested, and composed into one entire body, that so his majesty and themselves might be able to make the more clear judgment of them, it should then appear, by what his majesty would do, how far he had been from intending or designing any of those things, which the too great fears and jealousies of some persons seemed to apprehend; and how ready he would be to equal and exceed the greatest examples of the most indulgent princes in their acts of grace and favour to their people; so that, if all the present distractions, which so apparently threatened the ruin of the kingdom, did not, by the blessing of Almighty God, end in a happy and blessed accommodation, his majesty would then be ready to call heaven and earth, God and man, to witness, that it had not failed on his part."

This message was received by the lords with great signs of joy, insomuch that they desired the commons to join with them in returning their joint thanks to his majesty for his gracious offer, and to assure him, "that they would forthwith apply themselves to those considerations he proposed." However the next day they joined together in a petition to the king, "that he would, within very few days, send in his proofs, and proceed against the members he had accused of high treason, or declare them to be innocent, and himself to be ill advised;" to which he answered, "that he was ready to proceed against them; but, that there might be no new mistakes in the way, and form of the proceedings, he desired, that it might be first resolved, whether his majesty were bound in respect of privileges to proceed against them by impeachment in parliament, or whether he were at liberty to prefer an indictment at common law in the usual way, or whether he had his choice of either: before that was resolved, his "majesty thought it unusual and unfit to discover what proof he had against them; but then, he would give such speedy direction for prosecution, as might put a determination to the business."

This gave them new offence and trouble; and if the king's council had had the courage to have insisted upon the matter of law, and the lords would have given them reasonable countenance, they would have been much puzzled to have procured a resolution, that would have served their purposes to all parts, and been contented to have suspended their judgment, that so the king might have suspended his prosecution. For if the judges had been compelled to deliver their opinions in point of law, which they ought to have been, they could not have avoided the declaring, that by the known law, which had been confessed in all times and ages, no privilege of parliament could extend in the case of treason; but that every parliament-man was then in the condition of every other subject, and to be proceeded against accordingly. In the next place, as they would never have ventured themselves upon the house of peers under an impeachment, and thereby made them their judges, which indeed was incongruous, every subject being to be tried for his life per pares, and per legem terræ, to both which the lords and the impeachment [were] directly opposit; so they would less have trusted an indictment at law, and a well chosen sober jury, who had been bound to follow their evidence of fact, and were not judges of the law, which was severe in any conspiracy against the crown, or the persons of king or queen.

But having shut the doors against any mention of law, they made no scruple of resolving, and answering his majesty, "that they were first to see the evidence he had to prove the guilt, before they could give any direction for the manner of the prosecution, and proceeding;" which they grounded upon a maxim, they had established three or four days before, though never till then heard of; "that no member of parliament, for what offence soever, could be arrested, or proceeded against, but by the consent of that house, of which he was a member; and then, they said, they could not give or deny their consent by any other measure than the knowledge of the crime and proof, upon which such member stood accused." Which conclusion had been reasonable, if the assumption had been just; whereas the argument was to be inverted, that their consent was not to be asked, because they had no cognizance of the crime, of which their members were accused, nor were judges whether their accusation were valid in law, or sufficiently proved in fact.

It is not to be believed how many sober, well-minded men, who were real lovers of the peace of the kingdom, and had the known laws in full submission and reverence, were imposed upon, and had their understandings confounded, and so their wills perverted, by the mere mention of privilege of parliament; which, from the most defined, limited notion, was, by the dexterity of those boute-feus, and their under-agents of the law, and the supine sottishness of the people, rendered such a mystery, as could be only explained by themselves, and extended as far as they found necessary for their occasions, and was to be acknowledged a good reason for any thing that no other reason could be given for. "We are," say they, "and have been always confessed, the only judges of "our own privileges; and therefore whatsoever we declare to be our privilege, is such: otherwise whosoever determines that it is not so, makes himself judge of that, whereof the cognizance only belongs to us." And this sophistical riddle hath perplexed many, who, notwithstanding the desperate consequence they saw must result from such logic, taking the first proposition for true, which, being rightly understood, is so, have not been able to wind themselves out of the labyrinth of the conclusion: I say the proposition rightly understood: they are the only judges of their own privileges, that is, upon the breach of those privileges, which the law hath declared to be their own, and what punishment is to be inflicted upon such breach. But there can be no privilege, of which the law doth not take notice, and which is not pleadable by, and at law.

The truth and clearness of this will best appear by instance: if I am arrested by process out of any court, I am to plead in the court, that I am a member of parliament, and that, by the privilege of parliament, my person ought to be free from arrests. Upon this plea the judge is bound to discharge me; and if he does not, he is criminal, as for any other trespass against the law: but the punishing the person, who hath made this infringement, is not within his power, but proper to that jurisdiction, against which the contempt is; therefore that house, of which I am a member, upon complaint made of such an arrest, usually sends for the persons culpable, the party at whose suit the arrest is made, and the officers which executed it, and commits them to prison, till they make acknowledgment of their offence. But that house never sends, at least never did till this parliament, any order to the court, out of which the process issued, to stay the proceedings at law, because the privilege ought to be legally pleaded. So, after the dissolution of parliament, if I am arrested within the days of privilege, upon my plea of privilege the court discharges me; but then the party that arrests me escapes punishment till the next parliament, the judge having no more power to commit the man that sued or arrested me, than he hath to imprison a man for bringing an action at law, when he hath no good title; neither is he judge of the contempt.

Again: If a man brings an information, or an action of the case, for words spoken by me, and I plead, that the words were spoken by me in parliament, when I was a member there; and that it is against the privilege of parliament, that I should be impleaded in any other place, for the words I spake there; I ought to be discharged from this action or information, because this privilege is known, and pleadable at law: but that judge can neither punish nor examine the breach of privilege, nor censure the contempt. And this is the true and proper meaning of the old received axiom, that they are judges only of their own privileges.

And indeed these two, of freedom from arrests for their persons, (which originally hath not been of that latitude to make a parliament a sanctuary for bankrupts, where any person outlawed hath been declared incapable of being returned thither a member,) and of liberty of speech, were accounted their chiefest, if not their only privileges of parliament: for their other, of access to the king, and correspondence by conference with the lords, are rather of the essence of their councils, than privileges belonging to it. But that their being judges of their privileges should qualify them to make new privileges, or that their judgment should create them such, as it was a doctrine never before now heard of, so it could not but produce all those monstrous effects we have seen; when they have assumed to swallow all the rights and prerogative of the crown, the liberties and lands of the church, the power and jurisdiction of the peers, in a word, the religion, laws, and liberties of England, in the bottomless and insatiable gulph of their own privileges; and no doubt will determine this digression to be the most unparalleled and capital breach of those privileges, that had ever yet been attempted.

In the address, which the house of commons prepared for acknowledgment of the king's grace and favour in his message of the twentieth of January, they had desired, "that for a ground of their confidence, and removal of jealousies, that they might apply themselves to give his majesty satisfaction in the method he proposed, his majesty would presently put the Tower of London into the hands of such a person, as both houses should recommend to him:" in which the lords differed with them; as well for that the disposal of the custody thereof was the king's peculiar right and prerogative, as likewise that his majesty had committed the charge thereof to sir John Byron, a person of a very ancient family, an honourable extraction, good fortune, and as unblemished a reputation as any gentleman of England. The commons, much troubled that the lords should again take the courage to dissent from them in any thing, resolved to press the king upon their own score, and to get the recommendation of so great an officer to themselves.

And therefore on the six and twentieth day of January, they sent a petition to him in the name of the knights, citizens, and burgesses, of the commons' house assembled in parliament; in which they took notice "of the gracious message from his majesty of the twentieth instant, for which they returned most humble thanks, resolving to take it into speedy and serious consideration; and said, to enable them with security to discharge their duties therein, they had desired the house of peers to join with them in humbly beseeching his majesty to raise up unto them a sure ground of safety and confidence, by putting the Tower, and other principal forts of the kingdom, and the whole militia thereof, into the hands of such persons as his parliament might confide in, and as should be recommended unto him by both houses of parliament; that, all fears and jealousies being laid aside, they might with cheerfulness proceed to such resolutions, as they hoped [would] lay a sure foundation of honour, greatness, and glory to his majesty, and his royal posterity, and of happiness and prosperity unto his subjects, throughout all his dominions; wherein the house of peers had refused to join with them. But they, notwithstanding, no way discouraged, but confiding in his majesty's goodness to his people, did therefore make their humble address to him to beseech him, that the Tower of London, and other principal forts, and the whole militia of the kingdom, might be put into the hands of such persons as should be recommended to him by the house of commons; not doubting but they should receive a gracious and speedy answer to that their humble desire, without which, in all human reason, the great

"distractions of the kingdom must needs overwhelm it with misery and ruin."

The king was not troubled at the receipt of this petition, glad that, since they could not be brought to such a degree of reasonableness, as might make up all breaches, they would be so peremptorily unreasonable as might probably sever those from them, who were not as desperate as themselves; and he hoped, that when the people should observe that this grasping of the militia of the kingdom into their own hands, as an expedient for the composing their high-grown fears and jealousies, was no more than they desired the summer before, when sir Arthur Haslerig brought in his bill into the house of commons, which is before remembered, when that title of fears and jealousies was not discovered; and when the peers should observe, that the house of commons insolently demanded, by their own single suffrage, the deputing men to that prodigious trust, they would both conclude, that those immodest askers were not only fit to be denied, but reformed: yet believing that real and just fears would grow up, to discountenance and suppress those imaginary ones, his majesty vouchsafed a very soft and dispassionate answer to that petition; and told them, "that he hoped his gracious message would have produced some such overture, as, by offering what was fit on their parts to do, and by asking what was proper for him to grant, might have begot a mutual confidence in each other. Concerning the Tower of London, that he did not expect, having preferred a person of a known fortune, and unquestionable reputation, to that trust, that he should have been pressed to remove him without any particular charge objected against him: however, that if, upon due examination, any particular should be presented to him, whereby it might appear he was mistaken in his good opinion of that gentleman, and that he was unfit for the trust committed to him, he would make no scruple of discharging him; otherwise, he was obliged, in justice to himself, to preserve his own work, lest his favour and good opinion might prove a disadvantage and misfortune to his servants, without any other accusation; of which he hoped his house of commons would be so tender, as of a business, wherein his honour was much concerned, as, if they found no material exceptions against that person, they would rather endeavour to satisfy and reform the fears of other men, than, by complying with them, press his majesty to any thing, which did so much reflect upon his honour and justice.

"For the forts and castles of the kingdom, that he was resolved they should always be in such hands, and only in such, as the parliament might safely confide in; but the nomination of any persons to those places, being so principal and inseparable a flower of his crown, vested in him, and derived to him from his ancestors by the fundamental laws of the kingdom, he would reserve to himself; in bestowing whereof, as he would take care that no corrupt or sinister courses should prevail with him, so he was willing to declare, that he should not be induced to express that favour so soon to any persons, as to those whose good demeanour should be eminent in, or to his parliament. And if he then had, or should at any time, by misinformation, confer such a trust upon an undeserving person, he was, and "would always be, ready to leave him to the wisdom and justice of his parliament.

"For the militia of the kingdom, which by the law was subject to no command but of his majesty, and of authority lawfully derived from him, he said, when any particular course for ordering the same should be considered, and digested, and proposed to him, he would return such an answer as should be agreeable to his honour, and the safety of his people, he being resolved only to deny those things, the granting whereof would alter the fundamental laws, and endanger the very foundation, upon which the public happiness and welfare of his people was founded and constituted, and which would nourish a greater and more destructive jealousy between the crown and the subject, than any of those, which would seem to be taken away by such a satisfaction.

"He said, he was not willing to doubt, that his having granted more than ever king had granted, would persuade them to ask more than ever subjects had asked : but if they should acquaint him with the particular grounds of their doubts and their fears, he would very willingly apply remedies proportionable to those fears; for he called God to witness, that the preservation of the public peace, the law, and the liberty of the subject, was, and should always be, as much his care and his industry as of his own life, or the lives of his dearest children.

"And therefore he did conjure them by all the acts of favour they had received from him this parliament, by their hopes of future happiness in his majesty, and in one another, by their love of religion, and the peace of the kingdom, in which, he said, that of Ireland was included, that they would not be transported by jealousies, and apprehensions of possible dangers, to put themselves, or his majesty, into real and present inconveniences; but that they would speedily pursue the way proposed by his former message, which, in human reason, was the only way to compose the distractions of the kingdom, and, with God's blessing, would restore a great measure of felicity to king and people."

This answer being not only a denial, but such an expostulation as would render their counsels of less reverence to the people, if upon those reasons they should recede from what they had with that confidence, and disdain of the house of peers, demanded of the king; and therefore they resolved to set up their rest upon that stake, and to go through with it, or perish in the attempt. And, to this purpose, they again muster up their friends in the city, and send their emissaries abroad, to teach the people a new language. All petitions must now desire, "that the kingdom might be put into a posture of defence, and nothing else would serve to defend them from the many plots and conspiracies against them, or secure them from their own fears and jealousies." More petitions were presented to the house of commons by some citizens of London, in the name of those merchants, that usually traded to the mint with bullion; who pretended "that their fears and jealousies were so great, that they durst not carry their bullion to the Tower, being not satisfied with the present lieutenant of the Tower; and therefore desired that he might be removed;" and to that purpose;

whereas in truth there was at that time, and from the time that that gentleman was lieutenant, more bullion brought in to be coined, than in the same time for seven years before; neither was there one man of those who subscribed that petition, who ever brought pound weight of bullion to the mint in his life. So that these cheats were too gross to do their business by, and they were quickly supplied with more powerful arguments.

They had wholly undertaken the managing of the war in Ireland, and really, for many reasons, neither did use, nor desired to use, any great expedition in that work; yet having with great industry infused into the minds of the people at least a suspicion that the court favoured that rebellion, they always made use of the slowness in those proceedings to the king's disadvantage. About that time, they had desired the city to furnish them with one hundred thousand pounds, for the levying and accommodating forces to be sent into that kingdom, which gave the common council, where such loans were always transacted, opportunity to return their opinions, and advice upon the general state of affairs. They said, "they could lend no more money by reason of those obstructions, which threatened the peace of this kingdom, and had already rendered that even desperate: that the not passing the bill [against] pressing of soldiers, which still depended with the lords, upon those reasons formerly mentioned at large, put many men into fears, that there was some design rather to lose that kingdom, and to consume this in the loss of it, than to preserve either the one or the other; and that the rebels were grown so strong there, that they made account speedily to extirpate the British nation in that kingdom; and that they intended then, as they already bragged, to come over, and make this the seat of the war.

"That the not putting the forts into such hands, in whom the parliament might confide, the not settling the kingdom in a posture of defence, the not removing the present lieutenant of the Tower, and putting such a person into that place, as might be well approved by the parliament, could not but overthrow trading more and more, and make monies yet more scarce in the city and kingdom. That the misunderstanding between the king and parliament, the not vindicating the privileges thereof, the charging some members of treason to the deterring of others from discharging their duties, and to the destroying the very being of parliaments, did exceedingly fill the minds of men well affected to the public, with many fears and discouragements; and so disable them from yielding that cheerful assistance, which they would be glad to afford. That by means of these there was such a decay of trading, and such scarcity of money, neither of which could be cured, till the former evils were removed, as it was like, in very short time, to cast innumerable multitudes of poor artificers into such a depth of poverty and extremity, as might enforce them upon some dangerous and desperate attempts, not fit to be expressed, much less to be justified; which they left to the house speedily to consider, and prevent. These evils, under which they did exceedingly labour and languish, they said, did spring from the employing of ill affected persons in places of trust and honour in the state, and near to the person of "the king; and that they were still continued by means of the votes of bishops, and popish lords, in the house of peers. And so having faithfully represented, they said, the true reasons, which really enforced them to return that answer, they craved leave to protest before God and the high court of parliament, that if any further miseries befell their dear brethren in Ireland, or if any mischief should break in upon this kingdom, to the endangering or disturbing [the peace] thereof, it ought not to be imputed to them, but only to such, who should endeavour to hinder the effectual and speedy cure of those evils before recited, which did so much disable and discourage them from doing that which the house had desired of them."

At the same time were presented other petitions, subscribed by many thousand hands, and in the names of the knights, gentlemen, and freeholders, and other inhabitants, of the counties of Middlesex, Essex, and Hertford; all which severally inveighed against the malignant party, which rendered the good endeavours of the house of commons fruitless; "desired that the votes of the bishops, and popish lords, might be taken out of the house of peers; that they might be put into a posture of defence, and the forts, and castles of the kingdom, into such hands as the parliament might confide in; that so Ireland might be relieved, and this kingdom made happy: one of them adding, that the malignant party of prelates and papists, and their adherents, were inconsistent with the happy success of the parliament." These petitions, and the answer of the common council of London, were thought ample materials for a conference with the lords, who might be thereby remembered of their duty; and to that purpose Mr. Pym delivered them at a conference, and after they were read, told them, "that their lordships might in those petitions hear the voice, or rather the cry of all England; and that they were not to wonder if the urgency, the extremity of the condition we were all in, did produce some earnestness and vehemency of expression more than ordinary; the agony, terror, and perplexity, in which the kingdom laboured, was universal, all parts were affected with it; and therefore in those petitions they might observe the groans and miserable complaints of all." After a long discourse of the great and notorious dangers the kingdom was in, by invasions threatened from abroad, and insurrections from within, he told them, "the obstructions, that had brought them into that distemper, were principally the obstruction of reformation in matters of religion, and that there was never church or state afflicted with more grievances of that kind, than we had been; and that though they were partly eased and diminished by the wisdom of the parliament, yet many still remained; and as long as the bishops, and the corrupt part of the clergy, continued in their power, there would be little hope of freedom, either from the sense of those that continued, or the fear of those which were removed. And of that obstruction, he said, he must clear the commons, who were in no part guilty of it. Some good bills they had already passed, and others were in preparation, and might have been passed before that time, if they had not found such ill success in the other [house]: whatsoever mischief that obstruction should produce, they were free from it; they might have their "part of the misery, they could have none in the guilt or dishonour."

He told them, "there was a great obstruction in trade, which brought food and nourishment to the kingdom; and then having enlarged himself with enumeration of the notable benefits the kingdom received by the fulness of trade, he said, he must protest, the house of commons had given no cause to that obstruction: they had eased trade of many burdens, and heavy taxes, and had freed it from many hard restraints by patents and monopolies; they had sought to put the merchants into security and confidence in respect of the Tower of London, that so they might be invited to bring in their bullion to the mint, as heretofore they had done; they were no way guilty of the troubles, the fears, and public dangers, which made men withdraw their stocks, and keep their money by them, to be ready for such sudden exigents, as, in those great distractions, they had too great cause to expect."

"There was an obstruction, he said, in the relief of Ireland; but he must declare the commons were altogether innocent of any neglect therein; they had agreed to the levies of men and money, and, from time to time, done all for the furtherance thereof, though in the midst of many distractions and diversions; but the wants of commissions for levying men, that was the bill [about] pressing, and divers other impediments, had been the causes of that obstruction. Nay, he said, he did not only find impediments to themselves, but encouragement to the rebels; for many of the chief commanders now in the head of the rebels, after both houses had stopped the ports against all Irish papists, had been suffered to pass, by his majesty's immediate warrants, much to the discouragement of the lords justices and council there, and were procured by some evil instruments too near his royal person, and, they believed, without his knowledge and intention."

He said, "there was an obstruction in providing for the defence of the kingdom, that they might be enabled to resist a foreign enemy, and to suppress all civil insurrections: what endeavour they had used to remove them, but hitherto without that success and concurrence which they expected, and where their stop had been, and upon what grounds they might proclaim their own innocence and faithfulness in that particular, they desired no other witnesses but their lordships."

He told them, "the evil influences, which had caused that distemper, were the evil councils about the king, the great power, that a factious and interested party had in parliament by the continuance of the votes of the bishops, and popish lords, in their lordships' house, and the taking in of others out of the house of commons, and, otherwise to increase their strength, the fomenting a malignant party throughout the kingdom, the jealousies between the king and his parliament." And after many bitter and seditious expressions of the court, and of all those who were not of his mind, he concluded, "that he had nothing to propose to their lordships by way of request or desire from the house of commons; he doubted not, but their judgments would tell them what was to be done; their consciences, their honours, their interests, would

"call upon them for the doing of it. The commons would be glad to have their help and concurrence in saving of the kingdom; but if their lordships should fail, it should not discourage them in doing their duty; and whether the kingdom be lost, or saved, they should be sorry, that the story of this present parliament should tell posterity, that, in so great a danger and extremity, the house of commons should be enforced to save the kingdom alone, and that the house of peers should have no part in the honour of the preservation of it, they having so great an interest in the good success of those endeavours, in respect of their great estates, and high degrees of nobility."

As soon as this conference was ended, the speaker of the house of commons was appointed to give Mr. Pym solemn thanks for his so well performing that service, and to require him to deliver his speech in writing into the house, to the end it might be printed; which was done accordingly, to the end that the people might understand, besides those reproaches upon the king, how negligent the house of peers were of their welfare and security.

The same day and hour after that conference, a great number of people, in the name of the inhabitants of the county of Hertford, presented a petition to the house of peers; in which, amongst other particulars, "they complained of the delay of putting the kingdom into a posture of war for their better defence, and the want of compliance by that honourable house with the house of commons in entertaining those many good motions, and passing those necessary bills presented to them from that house for the common good. And therefore they desired them, for the better removing of all the causes and springs of their fears and troubles, that the evil counsellors, and others hindering the public good, might be taken from his majesty, and the voting of the popish lords and bishops removed out of that honourable house: and that the petitioners, who would be ever ready to hazard their lives and estates for the defence of the king and parliament, the privileges of the same, and in special those noble lords and gentlemen in both houses, whose endeavours were for the public good, might have liberty to protest against all those, as enemies to the kingdom, who refused to join with those honourable lords and the house of commons, for the putting the kingdom into a way of safety, under the command of such persons, as the parliament should appoint." But neither this, nor any of the other proceedings were resented by the house of peers, though their privileges were not only invaded, but the very freedom and liberty of parliament were absolutely taken away and destroyed thereby.

When the house of commons found that none of these extraordinary ways would thoroughly subdue the house of lords, but that, though they had very sturdy champions there, the major part, albeit the bishops and all the recusant lords were driven from thence, still opposed them, whereby neither the bill for the taking away the bishops' votes, nor [about] pressing, could pass, and that they peremptorily still refused to join in the business of the militia; they found a new way, as unpractised and as unnatural as any of the former, whereby they would be sure to have an influence upon the house of peers. It is an old custom, and privilege of that house, that upon any solemn debate, whosoever is not satisfied with the conclusion and judgment of the house, may demand leave to enter his protestation, which must be granted. The original of this was in jealous times, when men desired, for avoiding the ill consequence of any act there, that their dissents might appear; and was very seldom practised, but when they conceived religion, or the crown, trenching upon; insomuch as you shall not find, in the journals of many parliaments, one protestation entered; and when there was any, there is no more in the records, than, after the resolution of the house is entered, and the number of those that were content and not content, "that such a lord desired that his protestation, that is, dissent might be entered;" and oftentimes when ten have dissented from the general opinion, not above one hath entered his protestation. But since this parliament, as they altered the custom from cases of high concernment to the most trivial debates, the minor part ordinarily entering their protestation, to the end that their opinions might be taken notice of, and who were opposite to them, whereby the good and bad lords were known and published; so they altered the form, and, instead of short general entries, caused the matter of the debate to be summed up, and thereupon their protestation, "that they were not to be answerable for any inconveniences or mischiefs, that should befall the commonwealth by reason of this or that resolution." So that from an act, for the particular indemnity of the person that made it, it grew to be a reproaching and arraigning the sense of the house by any factious number that disagreed. Then, because the house of peers is a court of record, they concluded, "that any man upon any occasion might peruse their journals;" and so every night the house of commons could see how the debates had been managed and carried all the day, and take public notice, and make use of it accordingly, which they could not do of those discourses they received from their confidants; for supplying whereof this trick was most unjustifiably found out. For though it is a court of record, the highest court, and the acts and judgments of parliament are records, to which the subject may upon all occasions resort, yet they have not liberty to examine and peruse their journal books, much less question any words spoken, or act done, and remembered there; of which if they are not the only judges, their privileges are much less than the commons in truth have, and may justly claim.

It happened, about this time, that upon some overture in the lords' house, which pleased them not, the violent party there, in a disorderly manner, cried out, Adjourn, adjourn, being not willing the matter should then come into debate; others were not willing that the house should adjourn. The duke of Richmond, troubled at that tumultuary and indirect proceeding, said, without directing himself to the speaker, "if they would adjourn, he wished it might be for six months," or words to that effect; upon which some of the other party straight moved, "that the house might not rise, and that the duke might explain himself, and answer the making such a motion, as, being granted, would be destructive to the commonwealth." The duke said, "he made no motion,

"but used that expression, to shew his dislike of the other motion to adjourn at that time, when there was business in agitation of great concernment; and that, when he spoke, all men being upon their feet, and out of their places, he conceived the house had been up." Upon this he was required to withdraw; and then they, who had long looked upon him with great envy and animosity, as the only great person, and officer at court, who had contemned their power, and their stratagems, [and] had with notable courage always opposed their extravagances, and servile complying with the house of commons, and submitting to the tumults, and had with singular constancy preserved his duty and fidelity to his majesty unviolated, inveighed against the motion, "as of too serious a nature to be made a jest of, and fit to be censured as most pernicious to this kingdom, and destructive to Ireland; the war whereof could not proceed, if the parliament should have been adjourned for six months, as his lordship had proposed."

On the other side, it was alleged, "that the motion had never been made to the house; and therefore they ought no more to question, or take notice of it, than of every light or frolic discourse or expression, that negligently or casually fell from any man; which would take away all liberty of conversation. However, that if it had been seriously and formally made, it could be no crime, it being the necessary liberty and privilege of every member, to make any motion he thought in his judgment fit, which the house would approve, or reject, as it found reasonable. And that, since it was as much in the house's power to adjourn for six months, as for six days, it was as lawful to move the one as the other; of which there could not be the least inconvenience, because the house would be sure to reject it, if it were not found proper." After a very fierce and eager debate, in which much bitterness and virulency was expressed, it was resolved by the major part, "that the duke had committed no offence;" and so he was as regularly absolved as was possible. Hereupon the earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Essex, Holland, who thought the duke's affection and duty to his master a reproach, and his interest prejudicial to them, with the rest of that party entered their protestation; "that whereas such a motion had been made by the duke of Richmond, and upon being questioned for the same, he had been acquitted by the major part, they were free from the mischiefs or inconveniences, which might attend the not punishment of an offence tending so much to the prejudice of king or kingdom."

This protestation, by the advice of that night's meeting, was, the next day, taken notice of in the house of commons, and the matter itself of the motion extended by all possible and rhetorical aggravations, concerning the person, and his interests, according to the license of that house, and that people. It was said, "here was an evil counsellor, that had discovered himself, and no doubt had been the author of many of those evil counsels, which had brought that trouble upon us; that he had received his education in Spain, and had been made a grandee of that kingdom, and had been ever since notoriously of that faction; that his sisters were papists, and therefore his

"affection was to be questioned in religion; that, from the beginning of this parliament, he had been opposite to all their proceedings, and was an enemy to reformation; that he had vehemently opposed the attainder of the earl of Strafford; was a friend to bishops; and now, to prevent any possibility of reformation, which could not be effected without the concurrence of the two houses, had desperately moved in the house of peers, where he had a great faction, that it would adjourn for six months; in which time the malignant party, of which he might well be thought the head, and had the greatest influence upon the king's affections, would prevail so far, that all future hopes would be rendered desperate, and the kingdom of Ireland be utterly lost, and possessed by the papists: that they were therefore to take this opportunity, which God had given them, to remove so malignant and dangerous a person from the king, and so suspected a one, from so important a charge as the cinque ports, of which the duke was lord warden, and to send to the lords to join with them in a desire to the king to that purpose."

On the other side, it was objected, that "whilst they were so solicitous of their own privileges, and sensible of the breach and violation of them, they could not more justify those, who had been the advisers of such breaches, than by offering the like trespass to the privileges of the peers: that the life of that council depended upon the liberty of speech; and where there were so different minds, there must be different expressions; and if one house might take notice what the other house said, or did, within those walls, the lords would as well question their members, as they did now one of the lords; which would take away all freedom of debate: that they could not examine the circumstances, which attended that motion, if any such was made; and therefore could not so much as, in their private understandings, make a reasonable judgment of it; but that they were naturally to presume the circumstances were such, as took away the offence of the motion; for that the major part of that house where the words were spoken, and at the time when they were spoken, had, upon solemn debate, concluded, that there was no crime in them; and that they were not only the proper, but the only judges in that case: and if the commons should intermeddle therewith, it was no otherwise, than, by the strength of the major part of the house of commons, to make the minor part of lords superior to the major part of that house; which they would not suffer to be offered to themselves."

It was alleged, "That the duke was a person of great honour and integrity, and of so unblemished a fame, that in all the discovery of the court-offences, there was not any reflection upon him. That his education had been, according to the best rules of the greatest persons, for some years beyond the seas; and that, having spent more time in France and Italy, he visited Spain; where his great quality being known, and no question as a compliment to this kingdom, with which it was then in strait alliance and confederacy, that king had conferred the honour of a grandee upon him; which was of no other advantage or signification to him, than to be covered in the "presence of that king, as the principal subjects there are. That his affection to the protestant religion was unquestionable, and very eminent; and though his sisters, who had been bred under their mother, were catholics, yet his brothers, of whose education he had taken the sole care, were very good protestants.

"That his opinions in parliament had been very avowed, and were to be presumed to be according to his conscience, in the profession of which he was so public, that there was reason to believe he used no ill arts in private; since he had the courage to do that aloud, which he had reason to believe would displease many. That it would be a great prejudice and blemish to their counsels and discoveries, if after so long discourse of a malignant party, and evil counsellors, of which they had never yet named any, they should first brand this lord with that imputation upon such a ground and occasion, as must conclude [include] all those lords who had absolved him, which was the major part of the lords. In a word, that it would look as if they had devised those new words to make men afraid, and kept them in reserve to apply to all those, with whom they were angry."

But notwithstanding all this, and all the reason that could be spoken on that part, and that there could be none on the other, after a debate of very many hours, till after nine of the clock at night, (the latest that ever was in parliament, but that of the remonstrance,) in which it was evident, that they meant, as far as in them lay, to confound all those, whom they could not convert; it was resolved by the majority of voices, not half of the house being present at that unseasonable time of the debate, "that they should accuse the duke of Richmond to the lords to be one of the malignant party, and an evil counsellor to his majesty; and to desire them to join in a request to the king, that he might be removed from any office or employment about his person;" which was solemnly commended to the lords accordingly, and by them so far received, that though the desire was rejected, no dislike or disapprobation of the matter or the manner was in the least manner discovered, or insisted on.

All things thus prepared, and so many lords driven and kept from the house, besides the bishops, and they that stayed there, by this last instance, instructed how to carry themselves, at least how they provoked the good lords to protest, they resolved once more to try whether the house of peers would be induced to join in the business of the militia, which they had twice refused; and to that purpose, their old friends of the city in the same numbers flocked to Westminster, but under the new, received, and allowed style of petitioners; but as unlike petitioners to any of those lords or commons, whom they understood to be malignant, as the other tumults had been. From these herds there were two notable petitions delivered to the house of commons, the one from the porters, their number, as they said, consisting of fifteen thousand; the other under the title of many thousands of poor people in and about the city of London. The porters, with great eloquence, confessed "the unexpressible pains that honourable house had taken for the good of church and state; which deserved to be recorded to their eternal fame, though the effects of those unwearied endeavours

"were not produced, by reason of the prevalence of that adverse, malignant, bloodsucking, rebellious party, by the power of which the privileges of parliament, and the liberty of the subject was trampled upon, the rebellion in Ireland increased, and all succours and relief for that kingdom obstructed." They said, "That trade had been long languishing, but was now dead by the fears, jealousies, and distractions they lay under, for want of fortification of the cinque ports, which was a great encouragement to the papists to make insurrection, and did much animate a foreign power to invade us: that by the deadness of trade they did want employment in such a measure, as did make their lives very uncomfortable; therefore their request was, that that extreme necessity of theirs might be taken into serious consideration, and that the honourable house of commons would fall upon the speediest course for abating and quelling the pride, outrage, and insolency of the adverse party at home; that the land might be secured by fortifying the cinque ports, and putting the people into a posture of defence, that all their fears, or as many as could, might be removed, and that trade might be again set up and opened, that so their wants might be in some measure supplied. They further desired that justice might be done upon offenders, according as the atrocity of their crimes had deserved; for if those things were any longer suspended, they should be forced to extremities not fit to be named, and to make good that saying, that necessity hath no law. They said they had nothing to lose but their lives, and those they would willingly expose to the utmost peril, in defence of the house of commons, according to their protestation," &c.

The other was a petition in the names of many thousands of poor people, and brought by a great multitude of such, who seemed prepared for any exploit. I have thought fit, for the rareness of it, and the rare effect it produced, to insert that petition in terms as it was presented, thus.

To the honourable the house of commons now assembled in parliament.

"The humble petition of many thousands of poor people in and about the city of London,

"Humbly sheweth, that your petitioners have lain a long time under great pressures, and grievances both in liberties and consciences, as hath been largely, and sundry times, shewed and declared, by several petitions exhibited to this honourable assembly both by the citizens and apprentices of the city of London, and divers counties and parts of this kingdom, from which we hoped long ere this, by your pious care, to have been delivered.

"But now we, who are of the meanest rank and quality, being touched with penury, are very sensible of the approaching storms of ruin, which hang over our heads, and threaten to overwhelm us, by reason of the sad distractions occasioned chiefly and originally, as your petitioners humbly conceive, by the prevalence of the bishops, and the popish lords, and others of that malignant faction; who make abortive all good motions, which tend to the peace and tranquillity of this kingdom of England, and have hitherto hindered the sending relief to our brethren in Ireland, al"though they lie weltering in blood; which hath given such head to the adversaries, that we justly fear the like calamities inevitably to befall us here, when they have vented their rage and malice there.

"All which occasions so great a decay and stop of trade, that your petitioners are utterly impoverished, and our miseries are grown insupportable, we having already spent all that little means, which we had formerly, by God's blessing, and our great labour, obtained; and many of us have not, nor cannot tell where to get, bread to sustain ourselves and families; and others of us are almost arrived at the same port of calamity; so that unless some speedy remedy be taken for the removal of all such obstructions, which hinder the happy progress of your great endeavours, your petitioners shall not rest in quietness, but shall be forced to lay hold on the next remedy which is at hand, to remove the disturbers of our peace; want and necessity breaking the bounds of modesty: and rather than your petitioners will suffer themselves, and their families, to perish through hunger and necessity, though hitherto patiently groaned under, they cannot leave any means unessayed for their relief.

"The cry therefore of the poor and needy, your poor petitioners, is, that such persons, who are the obstacles of our peace, and hinderers of the happy proceedings of this parliament, and the enjoyment of the looked for purity of religion, safety of our lives, and return of our welfares, may be forthwith publicly declared, to the end they may be made manifest; the removal of whom we humbly conceive will be a remedy to cure our miseries, and put a period to these distractions: and that those noble worthies of the house of peers, who concur with you in your happy votes, may be earnestly desired to join with this honourable house, and to sit and vote as one entire body; which we hope will remove from us our destructive fears, and prevent that, which apprehension will make the wisest and peaceablest men to put in execution.

"For the Lord's sake hear us, and let our religion, lives, and welfares be precious in your sight, that the loins of the poor may bless you, and pray," &c.

After this horrible petition delivered, the house, according to its gracious custom, ordered thanks to be given for their great kindness. The which when delivered by the speaker, who told them that the house was in consideration of those things, whereof they complained, some of that rabble, no doubt as they had been taught, replied, "that they never doubted the house of commons, but they heard all stuck in the lords' house, and they desired to know the names of those peers, who hindered the agreement between the good lords and the commons;" which they pressed with unheard of rudeness and importunity, and with a seeming unwillingness withdrew, whilst the house took the matter into further consultation.

Yet notwithstanding this provocation, and that it was urged by many members, some which had been assaulted and ill intreated by that rabble in their passage to the house, "that the countenancing such licentious persons and proceedings would be a great blemish to their counsels," they were again called in; and told, "that the house of commons had endeavoured, and would "continue those endeavours for their relief; and they doubted not, when they had delivered their petition, and what they had said, to the lords, which they would presently do, the causes of their evils would be found out, and some speedy course resolved upon for their relief; and therefore desired them with patience to attend a further answer." And accordingly that petition was solemnly read, and delivered to the lords at a conference; and the conference no sooner ended, than Mr. Hollis, one of those five whom the king had accused a month before of high treason, was sent to the lords in a message to desire them, "that they would join with the house of commons in their desire to the king about the militia;" to which he added, "that if that desire of the house of commons was not assented to, he desired those lords who were willing to concur, would find some means to make themselves known, that it might be known who were against them, and they might make it known to those that sent them."

After which motion and message, the lords again resumed the debate; which the earl of Northumberland begun with a profession, "that whosoever refused, in that particular, to join with the house of commons, were, in his opinion, enemies to the commonwealth;" when the major part of that house had twice before refused to concur with them in it. Yet when his lordship was questioned for that unparliamentary language, all the other lords of that faction joined with him; and declared, "that it was their opinions likewise:" the rabble being at the door to execute whatever they were directed: so that many lords, out of a just indignation to see their honours and their liberties sacrificed to the people by themselves; others, out of real fear of being murdered, if they should, in that conjuncture of time, insist on their former resolutions, withdrawing themselves; the major part of those, who stayed, concluded to join with the house of commons in their desire [concerning] the militia.

Within two days after this agreement and submission of the lords, another petition was presented to the commons, in the name of the inhabitants of the county of Surrey, by a multitude of people, who were, or pretended to be, of that county, and subscribed by above two thousand hands. Their petition was of the ordinary strain, full of devotion to the house of commons, and offering to execute all their commands; but with it they presented likewise a petition, which they intended to present to the lords, if they approved it, and was subscribed by above two thousand hands; by which it may appear where that petition was drawn, and when, however the hands were procured. The petition to the lords took notice "of their happy concurrence with the house of commons in settling the militia, and forts, in such hands as the commonwealth might confide in, and the kingdom in such a posture as might be for its defence and safeguard: yet they complained of the miserable condition of Ireland, which, they said, by the delay it had found amongst their lordships, notwithstanding the pressing endeavours of the house of commons, together with many of their lordships, had been exposed to the inhuman cruelties of their merciless enemies. With like grief they apprehended the distractions of this nation, the composure of "which, they said, was altogether hopeless, so long as the king's throne was surrounded with evil counsellors, and so long as the votes of popish lords and bishops were continued in their house."

"Wherefore they did humbly pray, and beseech their lordships, that they would go on in a constant union with the house of commons, in providing for the kingdom's safety; that all evil counsellors might be found out, Ireland relieved; that the votes of the popish lords and bishops might be speedily removed; that so the peace of the kingdom might be established, the privileges of parliament vindicated, and the purity of religion settled and preserved. And, they said, they should be in duty obliged to defend, and maintain with their lives and estates, their lordships, so far as they should be united with the honourable house of commons, in all their just and pious proceedings."

Which petition was read in the house of commons, and approved, and the petitioners thanked for their kind expressions therein; and then it was delivered by them at the bar of the house of peers; who, within a day or two, passed both the bill for taking away the bishops' votes, and [that concerning] pressing, which had lain so long desperate, whilst the lords came, and sat with freedom in the house. And these marvellous things done, they again adjourn both houses into London, to lay the scene for future action.

Upon the second of February, some members, appointed by both houses, attended his majesty at Windsor with their petition, "that he would forthwith put the Tower of London, and all other forts, and the whole militia of the kingdom, into the hands of such persons, as should be recommended unto his majesty by both houses of parliament; which, they assured themselves, would be a hopeful entrance into those courses, which, through God's blessing, should be effectual for the removing all diffidence, and misapprehension betwixt his majesty and his people; and for establishing and enlarging the honour, greatness, and power of his majesty, and royal posterity; and for the restoring and confirming the peace and happiness of his loyal subjects in all his dominions. And to that their most necessary petition, they said, they did, in all humility, expect his speedy and gracious answer, the great distractions, and distempers of the kingdom, not admitting any delay."

At the same time they likewise presented another petition to him, concerning the accused members; in which they besought him "to give directions, that his parliament might be informed, before Friday next, (which was within two days,) what proof there was against them, that accordingly they might be called to a legal trial; it being the undoubted right and privilege of parliament, that no member of parliament could be proceeded against, without the consent of parliament."

His majesty now found that these persons could not be compounded with, and that their purpose was, by degrees, to get so much power into their hands, that they need not care for what was left in his; and that the lords were in no degree to be relied on to maintain their own privileges, much less to defend his rights; and that they had the power to impose generally upon the people's understandings, contrary to their own senses, and to persuade them, "that they were in danger to be invaded by foreign enemies," when the king was not only in peace with all Christian princes, but almost all other nations so embroiled in war, that they all desired the friendship and assistance of England; none was in case or condition to disturb it: "and that there was a decay and deadness of trade, and want and poverty growing upon the whole kingdom," when no man living had ever remembered the like plenty over the whole land, and trade was at that height, that the like had never been known.

He resolved therefore to remove himself to a greater distance from London, where the fears and jealousies grew; and constantly to deny to pass any act, that should be recommended to him from the two houses, except what might concern Ireland, till he might have a full prospect of all they intended to demand, and an equal assurance how far they intended to gratify him for all his condescensions; which resolution was very parliamentary, it having been rarely known, till this present parliament, that the king consented to any acts, till the determination of the session.

The truth is, when his majesty found the extreme ill success of the accusation against the members, and that the tumults, and the petitioners, were no other than an army at the disposal of those, in whom he had no reason to put his confidence, and that all such, who expressed any eminent zeal to his service, would be taken from him under the style of delinquents and malignants, he resolved that the queen, who was very full of fears, should go to Portsmouth, colonel Goring, who was governor thereof, having found means to make good impressions again in their majesties of his fidelity; and that himself would go to Hull, where his magazine of cannon, arms, and munition was; and that being secured in those strong places, whither they who wished him well might resort, and be protected, he would sit still, till they who were over-active would come to reason.

But this, though resolved with so much secrecy, that it was not communicated to three persons, (as I have been since assured by those who knew,) whether by the treachery of one of those few, or by the curiosity of others, (which I rather believe,) who found means to overhear all private discourses, (as both bedchambers were inhabited, and every corner possessed, by diligent spies upon their master and mistress,) was imparted to those, who procured those orders before mentioned for Hull and Portsmouth; by reason whereof, and the advice, and promise of many lords, "that they would firmly unite themselves for the just support of the regal power," with the extreme apprehension the queen had of danger, that counsel was laid aside. That which wrought so much upon the queen's fears, besides the general observation how the king was betrayed, and how his rights and power were every day wrested from him, was an advertisement, that she had received, of a design in the prevalent party, to have accused her majesty of high treason; of which, without doubt, there had been some discourse in their most private cabals, and, I am persuaded, was imparted to her upon design, and by connivance, (for there were some incorporated into that faction, who exactly knew her nature, passions, and infirmities,) that the disdain of it might transport her to somewhat, which might give them advantage. And shortly after that discovery to her majesty, those persons before mentioned were accused of high treason; yet afterwards, when they had received the full fruits, they found means to complain, "as a great argument of the malignity of those persons of nearness to both their majesties, that an infusion had been made to the queen, that there was a purpose of accusing her of high treason," and solemnly by message "besought her to discover, who had done that malicious office;" when they very well knew who it was, and for whose sake the queen was brought to return answer, "that she had heard such a discourse, but took no notice of it, as never believing it:" whereas, if they could have been compelled to have discovered, how they knew that the queen had been informed, all the secret would have appeared; the same person first telling her what was in projection against her, and then returning intelligence of any expressions and distemper, he might easily observe upon the apprehension which the other begat.

But both king and queen were then upon that disadvantage, that all their words and actions, which were the pure results of their own reasons and judgments upon what they saw every day occurred, were called the effects of evil counsels, that so they might take the liberty to reproach them with the more license; whilst what they received by the most secret perjury of bedchamber spies, or what they forged themselves, was urged as the resultants of common fame, or the effects of their fears and jealousies, to the rancour of which the most precious balm of the crown must be applied. And therefore it was concluded, "that the queen should take the opportunity of her daughter the princess Mary's journey into Holland," (who had been before married to the young prince of Orange, and was now solemnly desired by the States' ambassadors to come into that country,) "to transport herself into Holland, patiently to expect an amendment of the affairs of England; and that the king should retire into the north, and reside at York, and deny all particulars, till the whole alteration should be framed." But the first resolution concerning the queen was only published; the other, concerning the king, communicated to very few; both their majesties being reduced to so great wants, that the queen was compelled to coin, or sell, her chamber plate, for the supply of her most necessary occasions, there being no money in the exchequer, or in the power of the ministers of the revenue; and the officers of the customs, out of which the allowance for the weekly support of their majesties' household had been made, being enjoined by the house of commons, not to issue out any money, without their particular consent and approbation.

It was evident now that the accused members were too mighty for the king, or the law, and that they would admit no other judges of their guilt, than themselves, nor rules of proceeding, than the plurality of their own voices: and therefore the king resolved to give over any more thought of that business. And so to that petition he answered, "that as he once conceived that he had ground enough to accuse them, so now he found as good cause wholly to desert any prosecution of them." The other petition concerning the militia gave him more trouble; for though he was resolved in no degree to consent to it, yet he was willing, till all things could be ready for the queen's journey, and so for his own remove, [rather] to delay it, than deny it; lest the same army of petitioners might come to Windsor to persuade him; which had converted, or prevailed over the house of peers. And he was persuaded by some, who thought they knew the temper of both houses, that though they were now united in the matter, they might easily be divided upon the circumstances; and that they would not be of one mind in the election of the persons to be confided in. So to that petition his majesty returned this answer:

"That he was willing to apply a remedy not only to their dangers, but to their doubts and fears; and therefore, that when he should know the extent of power, which was intended to be established in those persons, whom they desired to be commanders of the militia in the several counties, and likewise to what time it should be limited, that no power should be executed [by] his majesty alone without the advice of parliament, then he would declare, that he would be content to put in all the forts, and over the militia, such persons as both houses of parliament should either approve, or recommend to him; so that they before declared the names of the persons, whom they would approve or recommend, and so that no persons should be named by them, against whom his majesty should have just and unquestionable exception."

Which answer, though it was not a consent, gave them notable encouragement, and exceedingly united the vulgar minds to them; who concurred only with them, as they saw them like to prevail in what they went about. And there was no danger of any disunion in the nomination of persons; because, though they should at first admit such into the number, whom they could not sufficiently trust, nor plausibly except against, yet when they were once possessed of the power of nomination, they might easily weed out those, which were not agreeable to the soil they were planted in. However this would take up some time; and therefore to keep the king's inclination to gratify them (for so they would understand it) warm, the same day they received this answer, they returned a message of thanks; and desired his majesty, "whilst they were preparing all other particulars according to his command, that he would confer the custody of the Tower upon sir John Coniers," whom his majesty had lately recommended to them, as a person of great merit. With which being surprised, and desired likewise by sir John Byron to free him from the agony and vexation of that place, which had exposed his person and reputation to the rage and fury of the people, and compelled him to submit to such reproaches, as a generous spirit could not brook without much regret; for he had upon frivolous surmises been sent for as a delinquent, and been brought upon his knees at the bar of both houses; his majesty consented to that alteration, and made sir John Coniers lieutenant of the Tower. Which was such an instance of his yielding upon importunity, that from that time they thought themselves even possessed of the whole militia of the kingdom.

Whilst all diligence was used in making preparation for the queen's journey, to divert their councils from other inquisitions, the king (who had received so many sharp expostulations for breach of privileges, and other attempts upon their reputations) resolved, upon the publication of a bold scandal upon himself by one of their principal members, to expostulate with them, and try what satisfaction and reparation they were prepared to give to him, who exacted so much from him. All opportunities had been taken in public, and all license given to private and clandestine forgeries, to lay odious or envious imputation on the king and queen, in the business of Ireland; and to impute the progress and success of that rebellion to a connivance, if not a countenance, from the court: the not levying men, and not sending provisions, imputed to his majesty; though he had, as is before observed, offered to levy ten thousand volunteers for that service, and had consented cheerfully to every proposition, that had been made with the least reference to the assistance of that kingdom. Indeed he was so alarmed with those perpetual odious impositions, which he perceived wrought very pernicious effects in the minds of the people, that he was compelled to consent to many things contrary to his judgment and kingly policy, to prevent greater inconveniences by those scandals, which he saw were prepared for him. So when several propositions were recommended to him by the two houses concerning those supplies, which were to be sent out of Scotland, amongst the rest, there was one, "that the Scots should have the command and keeping of the town and castle of Carrickfergus; and if any regiments, or troops, in that province should join with them, that they should receive orders from the commander of the Scottish forces." The king consented to all the rest, though there were matters unreasonable enough in favour of that nation; but, "that," he said, "he could not approve of;" and wished "the houses to take that proposition again into consideration, as a business of very great importance, which he doubted might prove prejudicial to the crown of England, and the service intended." And he said, "if the houses desired it, he would be willing to speak with the Scottish commissioners, to see what satisfaction he could give them therein." This answer was no sooner read, but both houses voted, "that whosoever gave the king advice, or counsel, to send that answer, was an enemy to the king and kingdom," and a committee appointed to find out who those evil counsellors were. So that, the Scottish commissioners pressing him, "that, being their native king, he would not publish a less trust and confidence in them, than their neighbour nation had done," his majesty thought fit to consent to the whole, as the two houses had advised.

Then, in the carrying on the war, they allowed his majesty so little power, that when he recommended some officers of prime quality, reputation, and experience in the war, to the lord lieutenant to be employed in that service, the house of commons by express order, and after they knew that his majesty had recommended them, rejected them, because they were taken notice to have attended upon the king at Whitehall, as a guard to his person. And, after all this, they took all occasions to asperse him with any ommissions that were in that great work; as Mr. Pym had more particularly done, in that speech before taken notice of, at the conference with the lords, upon the delivery of those seditious petitions; of which the king could not take notice, lest he should be again reproached with breach of privilege.

But when that speech was printed by order of the house, the king thought he had an opportunity to require a vindication; and therefore, in a letter to the speaker, he sent this message: "That he had taken notice of a speech, pretended by the title to have been delivered by Mr. Pym in a conference, and printed by order of the house of commons; in which it was affirmed, that since the stop upon the ports against all Irish papists by both houses, many of the chief commanders, now in the head of the rebels, have been suffered to pass by his majesty's immediate warrant: and being certain of having used extreme caution in the granting of passports into Ireland, he conceived, either that paper not to have been so delivered, and printed, as is pretended; or that house to have received some misinformation. And therefore his majesty desired to know, whether that speech had been so delivered and printed; and if it had, that the house would review, upon what information that particular had been grounded, that either it might be found upon reexamination false, and so both the house, and his majesty, to have been injured by it; or that his majesty might know, by what means, and by whose fault, his authority had been so highly abused, as to be made to conduce to the assistance of that rebellion, which he so much detested and abhorred; and that he might see himself fully vindicated from all reflections of the least suspicion of that kind."

It was some time before they would vouchsafe any answer to the king upon this message; but at last they returned, "that the speech, mentioned in that message, was printed by their order, and what was therein delivered was agreeable to the sense of the house: that they had received divers advertisements concerning the several persons, Irish papists, and others, who had obtained his majesty's immediate warrant for their passing into Ireland, since the order of restraint of both houses; some of which, as they had been informed, since their coming into Ireland, had joined with the rebels, and been commanders amongst them; and some others had been stayed, and were yet in safe custody."

Then they named some, to whom licenses had been granted before the order of restraint, and were still in England; and said, "there were others, whose names they had not yet received, but doubted not, upon examination, they would be discovered."

To this the king replied, and told them, "that as he had expressed a great desire to give them all possible satisfaction to all their just requests, and a readiness to rectify, or retract, anything done by himself, which might seem to trench upon their privileges by any mistake of his; so he hoped, they would be ready, upon all occasions, to manifest an equal tenderness and regard of his honour, and reputation with his subjects: and therefore he expected they should review his message concerning Mr. Pym's speech, and their answer, with which he could not rest satisfied. He said, he was most assured that no person, who had command in the head of the rebels, had passed by his warrant, or privy. And then, he desired them to consider, whether such a general

"information, and advertisement, as they implied in their answer, without the name of any particular person, was ground enough for such a direct and positive affirmation, as was made in that speech; which, in respect of the place and person, and being now acknowledged to be according to the sense of the house, was of that authority, that his majesty might suffer in the affections of many of his good subjects, and fall under a possible construction, considering many scandalous pamphlets to such a purpose, of not being sensible enough of that rebellion, so horrid and odious to all Christians; by which, in that distraction, such a danger might possibly ensue to his majesty's person and estate, as he was well assured they would endeavour to prevent. And therefore he thought it very necessary, and expected that they should name those persons who had passed by his license, and were then in the head of the rebels: or if, upon their reexamination, they did not find particular evidence to prove that assertion, (as he was most confident they never could,) as that affirmation, which reflected upon his majesty, was very public, so they would publish such a declaration, whereby that mistake might be discovered; he being the more tender in that particular which had reference to Ireland, as being most assured, that he had been, and was, from his soul, resolved to discharge his duty, for the relief of his poor protestant subjects, and the utter rooting out that rebellion; so that service had not suffered for the want of any thing proposed to him, and within his power to grant."

He said, "in this matter he had diligently examined his own memory, and the notes of his secretaries;" and then named all the Irish persons to whom he had given any licenses to go into that kingdom, since the beginning of the rebellion; and said, "he was well assured, none of them were with the rebels; and though some of them might be papists, yet he had no reason to discover any suspicion of them, in respect of their alliance with persons of great honour and power in that kingdom, of whose fidelity to him he had good assurance; and the lords justices themselves having declared, that they were so far from owning a jealousy of all papists there, that they had put arms into the hands of divers noblemen of that religion, within the pale, which the parliament had well approved of. And therefore, unless the first affirmation of the house of commons could be made good by some particulars, he expected a vindication by such a declaration as he had proposed; which, he said, was, in duty and justice, due to him."

But this, and any thing else could be said, was so far from procuring any reparation, or his majesty from receiving any, that when they perceived the king still pressed for that justice, and apprehended that many would believe it due to him, and that the prejudice they had raised to him for Ireland would be removed thereby, they confidently published another declaration of several persons' names, to whom they said the king had granted passes, and were then commanders in the rebels' army, of whose names his majesty had never before heard, to whom no passes had been granted, neither did he believe that there were such men in nature; and so left the people to believe as they found themselves inclined upon the king's denial, or their so particular and positive affirmation.

These proceedings of the parliament made a deep impression upon all noble and generous persons, who found that their pride and ambition was so great, that they resolved to remove all persons out of their way, who were like to stand in their way, by opposing anything they desired, or by filling any place, or office, which they designed should be executed by some other person, in whom they could confide. The earl of Newcastle, who was governor to the prince, knew very well in what prejudice he stood with the earls of Essex and Holland, (two very powerful persons,) upon the account of the challenge formerly mentioned to be sent by him to the latter of the two, who would be glad of any opportunity to expose him to an affront; and that they would find opportunities enough upon the account of his known affections to the king's service, from which it was not possible to remove or startle him. He knew they liked not that he should have the government of the prince, as one, who would infuse such principles into him, as would not be agreeable to their designs, and would dispose him to no kindness to their persons, and that they would not rest, till they saw another man in that province; in order to which, they would pick all quarrels they could, and load him with all reproaches, which might blast him with the people, with whom he had a very good reputation. Upon those considerations, and some other imaginations upon the prospect of affairs, he very wisely resolved to retire from the court, where he had expended much of his own fortune, and only made himself obnoxious to the malice and envy of other pretenders; and desired the king to approve of this his reasonable inclination, and to put the prince under the tuition of some person of honour of unquestionable fidelity to him, and above the reach of popular disapprobation; and at the same time mentioned the marquis of Hertford, who was indeed superior to any temptations. The king could not dislike the earl's judgment upon his own interest and concernment; and did foresee likewise that he might probably have occasion to use his service under another qualification; and therefore was well contented to dismiss him from the prince.

The marquis of Hertford was a man of great honour, great interest in fortune and estate, and of an universal esteem over the kingdom; and though he had received many and continued disobligations from the court, from the time of this king's coming to the crown, as well as during the reign of king James, in both which seasons, more than ordinary care had been taken to discountenance and lessen his interest; yet he had carried himself with notable steadiness, from the beginning of the parliament, in the support and defence of the king's power and dignity, notwithstanding all his allies, and those with whom he had the greatest familiarity and friendship, were of the opposite party; and never concurred with them against the earl of Strafford, whom he was known not to love, nor in any other extravagancy.

And then, he was not to be shaken in his affection to the government of the church; though it was enough known that he was in no degree biassed by any great inclination to the person of any churchman. And with all this, that party carried themselves towards him with profound respect,

It is very true, in many respects he wanted some of those qualities, which might have been wished to be in a person to be trusted in the education of a great and a hopeful prince, and in the forming of his mind and manners in so tender an age. He was of an age not fit for much activity and fatigue, and loved, and was even wedded so much to his ease, that he loved his book above all exercises; and had even contracted such a laziness of mind, that he had no delight in an open and liberal conversation; and cared not to discourse, and argue on those points, which he understood very well, only for the trouble of contending; and could never impose upon himself the pain that was necessary to be undergone in such a perpetual attendance: but then those lesser duties might be otherwise provided for, and he could well support the dignity of a governor, and exact that diligence from others, which he could not exercise himself; and his honour was so unblemished, that none durst murmur against the designation; and therefore his majesty thought him very worthy of the high trust, against which there was no other exception, but that he was not ambitious of it, nor in truth willing to receive and undergo the charge, so contrary to his natural constitution. But [in] his pure zeal and affection for the crown, and the conscience, that in this conjuncture his submission might advance the king's service, and that the refusing it might prove disadvantageous to his majesty, he very cheerfully undertook the province, to the general satisfaction and public joy of the whole kingdom; and to the no little honour and credit of the court, that so important and beloved a person would attach himself to it under such a relation, when so many, who had scarce ever eaten any bread but the king's, detached themselves from their dependence, that they might without him, and against him, preserve and improve those fortunes, which they had procured and gotten under him, and by his bounty.

The bill for the taking away the votes of bishops out of the house of peers, which was called a bill for taking away all temporal jurisdiction from those in holy orders, was no sooner passed the house of peers, than the king was earnestly desired "to give his royal assent to it." The king returned, "that it was a matter of great concernment; and therefore he would take time to advise, and would return an answer in convenient time." But this delay pleased not their appetite; they could not attempt their perfect reformation in church and state, till those votes were utterly abolished; therefore they sent the same day again to the king, who was yet at Windsor, and gave him reasons to persuade him "immediately to consent to it; one of which was the grievances the subjects suffered by their exercising of temporal jurisdiction, and their making a party in the lords' house: a second, the great content of all sorts by the happy conjunction of both houses in their absence: and a third, that the passing of that bill would be a comfortable pledge of his majesty's gracious assent to the future remedies of those evils, which were to be presented to him, this once being passed."

Reasons sufficient to have converted him, if he had the least inclination or propensity to have concurred with them. For it was, upon the matter, to persuade him to join with them in this, because, that being done, he should be able to deny them nothing.

However those of greatest trust about the king, and who were very faithful to his service, though in this particular exceedingly deceived in their judgments, and not sufficiently acquainted with the constitution of the kingdom, persuaded him "that the passing this bill was the only way to preserve the church, there being so united a combination in this particular, that he would not be able to withstand it. Whereas, by the passing this bill, so many persons in both houses would be fully satisfied, that they would join in no further alteration: but, on the other hand, if they were crossed in this, they would violently endeavour an extirpation of bishops, and a demolishing of the whole fabric of the church.

"They alleged that he was, upon the matter, deprived of their votes already, they being not suffered to come to the house, and the major part in prison under an accusation of high treason, of which there was not like to be any reformation, till these present distempers were composed; and then that by his power, and the memory of the indirect means that had been used against them, it would be easier to bring them in again, than to keep them in now. They told him, there were two matters of great importance pressed upon him for his royal assent, but they were not of equal consequence and concernment to his sovereign power; the first, that bill for the bishops' votes; the other, the whole militia of the kingdom, the granting of which would absolutely divest him of all regal power; that he would not be able to deny both; but by the granting the former, in which he parted with no matter of moment, he would, it may be, not be pressed in the second; or if he were, that as he could not have a more popular quarrel to take up arms, than to defend himself, and preserve that power in his hands, which the law had vested in him, and without which he could not be a king; so he could not have a more unpopular argument for that contention, than the preservation of the bishops in the house of peers, which few men thought essential, and most men believed prejudicial, to the peace and happiness of the kingdom."

These arguments, though used by men whom he most trusted, and whom he knew to have opposed that bill in its passage, and to be cordially friends to the church of England in discipline and doctrine, prevailed not so much with his majesty, as the persuasions of the queen; who was not only persuaded to think those reasons valid, and that indeed the church could be only that way preserved, (and there are that believe that infusion to have been made in her by her own priests, by instructions from France, and for reasons in state of that kingdom,) but that her own safety very much depended upon the king's consent to that bill; and that, if he should refuse it, her journey into Holland would be crossed by the parliament, and possibly her person in danger either by the tumults, which might easily be brought to Windsor from Westminster, or by the insurrection of the countries in her passage from thence to Dover, where she intended to take shipping. Whereas by her intercession with the king to do it, she would lay a most seasonable and popular obligation upon the whole nation, and leave a pleasant odour of her grace and favour to the people behind her, which would prove much to her advantage in her absence; and she should have the thanks for that act, as acquired by her goodness, which otherwise would be extorted from the king, when she was gone.

These insinuations and discourses so far satisfied the queen, and she the king, that, contrary to his most positive resolution, the king consented, and sent a commission for the enacting both that bill, and the other for pressing; which was done accordingly, to the great triumph of the boutefeus, the king sending the same day that he passed those bills, which was the fourteenth of February, a message to both houses; "That he was assured his having passed those two bills, being of so great importance, so suddenly, would serve to assure his parliament, that he desired nothing more than the satisfaction of his kingdom." For Ireland, he said, "as he had concurred in all propositions made for that service by his parliament, so he was resolved to leave nothing undone for their relief, which should fall within his possible power, nor would refuse to venture his own person in that war, if the parliament should think it convenient, for the reduction of that miserable kingdom."

The passing that bill for taking away the bishops' votes, exceedingly weakened the king's party; not only as it perpetually swept away so considerable a number out of the house of peers, which were constantly devoted to him; but as it made impression on others, whose minds were in suspense, and shaken, as when foundations are dissolved. Besides, they that were best acquainted with the king's nature, opinions, and resolutions, had reason to believe, that no exigence could have wrought upon him to have consented to so anti-monarchical an act; and therefore never after retained any confidence, that he would deny what was importunately asked; and so, either absolutely withdrew themselves from those consultations, thereby avoiding the envy, and the danger of opposing them, or quietly suffered themselves to be carried by the stream, and consent to any thing that was boldly and lustily attempted.

And then it was so far from dividing the other party, that I do not remember one man, who furiously insisted on, or indeed heartily wished, the passing of that bill, that ever deserted them, till the kingdom was in a flame: but, on the contrary, very many, who cordially and constantly opposed that act, as friends rather to monarchy than religion, after that bill, never considered or resisted any attempt, or further alteration, in the church, looking upon the bishops as useless to sovereignty, and so not of importance enough to defend by the sword. And I have heard the same men, who urged before, "that their places in that house had no relation to the discipline of the church, and their spiritual jurisdiction, and therefore ought to be sacrificed to the preservation of the other, upon which the peace and unity of religion so much depended," since argue, "that since their power in that house, which was a good outwork to defend the king's from invasion, was taken away, any other form of government would be equally advantageous to his majesty; and therefore, that he ought not to insist on it, with the least inconvenience to his condition."

That which was above, or equal to all this, [was,] that, by his majesty's enacting those two bills, he had, upon the matter, approved the circumstances of their passage, which had been by direct violence, and force of arms; in which case, he ought not to have confirmed the most politic, or the most pious constitutions: Male posita est lex, quæ tumultuarie posita est, was one of those positions of Aristotle, which hath never been since contradicted; and was an advantage, that, being well managed, and stoutly insisted upon, would, in spite of all their machinations, which were not yet firmly and solidly formed, have brought them to a temper of being treated with. But I have some cause to believe, that even this argument, which was unanswerable for the rejecting that bill, was applied for the confirming it; and an opinion that the violence and force, used in procuring it, rendered it absolutely invalid and void, made the confirmation of it less considered, as not being of strength to make that act good, which was in itself null. And I doubt this logic had an influence upon other acts of no less moment than these: but it was an erroneous and unskilful suggestion; for an act of parliament, what circumstances soever concurred in the contriving and framing it, will be always of too great reputation to be avoided, or to be declared void, by the sole authority of any private persons, [or] the single power of the king himself. And though the wisdom, sobriety, and power, of a future parliament, if God shall ever bless the kingdom with another regularly constituted, may find cause to declare this or that act of parliament void; yet there will be the same temper requisite to such a declaration, as would serve to repeal it. And it may be then, many men, who abhorred the thing when it was done, for the manner of doing it, will be of the civilian's opinion, fieri non debuit, factum valet; and never consent to the altering of that, which they would never have consented to the establishing: neither will that single precedent of the judges in the case of king Henry the Seventh, when they declared the act of attainder to be void by the accession of the crown, though if he had in truth been the person, upon whom the crown had lineally and rightfully descended, it was good law, find, or make, the judges of another age parallel to them, till the king hath as strong a sword in his hand, and the people as much at his devotion and disposal; and then the making, and declaring law, will be of equal facility, though, it may be, not of equal justice. How much soever the king's friends were, for the reasons aforesaid, dejected upon the passing those two acts, it is certain, they who thought they got whatever he lost, were mightily exalted, and thought themselves now superior to any opposition: and what returns of duty and acknowledgment they made to the king for that grace and favour, is to be remembered in the next place.

The same day those two acts were by his majesty's commission confirmed, and as soon as a very short message of thanks for that favour, as much importing the safety of both kingdoms, of England and Ireland, was consented to, an ordinance for the settling the militia was consented to by both houses, and, together with a list of the names of such persons as for the present they meant to confide in, was immediately sent to the king for his approbation; the which, being the most avowed foundation of all the miseries that have followed, will be here necessary to be inserted in the very terms and form it was agreed upon, and presented; and was as followeth.

"Whereas there hath been of late a most dangerous and desperate design upon the house of commons, which we have just cause to believe to be the effect of the bloody counsels of the papists, and other ill affected persons, who have already raised a rebellion in the kingdom of Ireland, and, by reason of many discoveries, we cannot but fear they will proceed, not only to stir up the like rebellion and insurrections in this kingdom of England, but also to back them with forces from abroad; for the safety therefore of his majesty's person, the parliament, and kingdom, in this time of imminent danger, it is ordained by the king, the lords, and commons, now in parliament assembled, That                   shall have power to assemble, and call together, all and singular his majesty's subjects within the county of                   as well within liberties, as without, that are meet and fit for the wars, and them to train, exercise, and put in readiness, and them, after their abilities, and faculties, well and sufficiently, from time to time, to cause to be arrayed and weaponed, and to take the muster of them in places most fit for that purpose. And                   shall have power within the said county to nominate and appoint such persons of quality, as to him shall seem meet, to be his deputy lieutenants to be approved of by both houses of parliament: and that any one, or more of the said deputies, so assigned and approved of, shall in the absence, or by the command of the said                   have power and authority to do and execute within the county of                   all such powers and authorities, before in this present ordinance contained; and shall have power to make colonels, and captains, and other officers, and to remove out of their places, and to make others from time to time, as he shall think fit for that purpose. And                   his deputies, colonels, and captains, and other officers, shall have further power and authority to lead, conduct, and employ, the persons aforesaid, arrayed and weaponed, as well within the county of                   as within any other part of this realm of England, or dominion of Wales, for the suppression of all rebellions, insurrections, and invasions, that may happen, according as they, from time to time, shall receive directions by his majesty's authority, signified unto them by the lords and commons, assembled in parliament. And it is further ordained, that such persons as shall not obey in any of the premises, shall answer their neglect and contempt to the lords and commons, in a parliamentary way, and not otherwise, nor elsewhere: and that every the powers, granted as aforesaid, shall continue, until it shall be otherwise ordered, or declared by both houses of parliament, and no longer. This to go also to the dominion of Wales."

A second act of the same day, and the only way they took to return their thanks and acknowledgment to the queen for her intercession, and mediation in the passing those bills, was the opening a letter they intercepted, which was directed to her majesty herself. The lord Digby, after their majesties going to Windsor, when he found in what umbrage he stood with the powerful and prevailing party, and that they were able to improve his going through a town in a coach and six horses to a warlike appearance, and so to expose him to the fury of the people, at least to the power of the counties, to be suppressed, as they had done by their order, or proclamation of the twelfth of January, before remembered, and appointed to be read in all market towns throughout England; concluded for his own security, and to free the king's councils from the imputation of his evil influence, to remove himself into some parts beyond the seas: and so, with the king's leave, and by his license, was transported into Holland, from whence he writ some letters to his friends at London, to give them an account where he was, and for supplying himself with those accommodations as he stood in need of. Amongst these letters there was one to his brother [brother-in-law] sir Lewis Dives, which, by the treachery of that person, to whose care it was intrusted for conveyance, was brought to the house of commons: and it being averred, "that it came from the lord Digby," whom they looked upon as a fugitive, they made no scruple of opening it; and finding another in it directed to the queen, after a very little pause they did the like; for which they made no other excuse, (when upon a message from the king they sent her the transcript, for the original they still kept) than, "that having opened the other letters, and finding in them sundry expressions full of asperity, and malignity to the parliament, they thought it very probable, that the like might be contained in that to her majesty; and that it would have been dishonourable to her majesty, and dangerous to the kingdom, if it should not have been opened: and they besought the king to persuade her majesty, that she would not vouchsafe any countenance to, or correspondence with, the lord Digby, or any other of the fugitives or traitors, whose offences depended under the examination and judgment of parliament."

In that letter to the queen were these words: "If the king betake himself to a safe place, where he may avow and protect his servants, from rage (I mean) and violence, for from justice I will never implore it; I shall then live in impatience, and in misery, till I wait upon you. But if, after all he hath done of late, he shall betake himself to the easiest and compliantest ways of accommodation, I am confident, that then I shall serve him more by my absence, than by all my industry." And in that to sir Lewis Dives were these words: "God knows, I have not a thought to make me blush towards my country, much less criminal; but where traitors have so great a sway, the honestest thoughts may prove most treasonable." Which gave those, that thought themselves concerned, so great offence, that, within two days after, they accused him of high treason; and finding no words in the letters would amount to that offence, they accused him of levying war against the king; which could have relation to no act of his, but what was before mentioned at Kingston upon Thames, when, to the terror of the king's subjects, he was seen there in a coach with six horses. Though this extravagancy of theirs seems to be directed against a particular person, I could not omit it in this place, being accompanied with those circumstances. And it may be, posterity may look upon the severe persecution of a young man of admirable parts, and eminent hopes, in so implacable a manner, as a most pertinent instance of the tyranny and injustice of that time, not possible to end, but in so much wickedness as it hath since practised.

A third act of that day was the carrying up an impeachment to the lords against the king's attorney general, "for maliciously advising and contriving the articles upon which the lord Kimbolton, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hambden, Mr. Strode, and sir Arthur Haalerig, had been accused by his majesty of high treason;" it being not thought security and reparation enough, that the king had waved any further proceeding against them, except they left such a monument of their power, that, upon what occasion or provocation soever, no man should presume to obey the king in the like command: so that the same fourteenth of February, that was celebrated for the king's condescension to that act for the putting the bishops out of the house of peers, is famous likewise for those three unparalleled acts of contempt upon the sovereign power; the demand of the sole power over all the militia of the kingdom; the opening letters directed to the sacred person of the queen; and the impeaching the attorney general, for performing the duty of his place, by his master's command. All which were very ill instances of that application and compliance his majesty had reason to expect, and some men had promised him he should receive.

Though the king was resolved in no degree to consent to the proposition for the militia, yet he thought not the time seasonable for his positive denial, the queen retaining still her fears of being stopped in her journey. Therefore, for the present, he returned answer, "that his dearest consort the queen, and his dear daughter the princess Mary, being then upon their departure for Holland, he could not have so good time to consider of a particular answer for a matter of so great weight, as that was; therefore he would respite the same till his return;" the king intending to accompany the queen to Dover, and, as soon as she was embarked, to return. They received this answer with their usual impatience, and the next day sent messengers to him, with that which they called an humble petition; in which they told him, "that they had, with a great deal of grief, received his answer to their just and necessary petition concerning the militia of the kingdom; which, by a gracious message formerly sent unto them, he had been pleased to promise should be put into such hands, as his parliament should approve of, the extent of their power, and the time of their continuance, being likewise declared; the which being now done, and the persons nominated, his majesty nevertheless reserved his resolution to a longer and a very uncertain time; which, they said, was as unsatisfactory and destructive as an absolute denial. Therefore they once again besought him to take their desire into his royal thoughts, and to give them such an answer, as might raise in them a confidence, that they should not be exposed to the practices of those who thirst after the ruin of this kingdom, and the kindling of that combustion in England,

"which they had in so great a measure effected in Ireland; from whence, as they were informed, they intended to invade this kingdom, with the assistance of the papists here. They said, nothing could prevent those evils, nor enable them to suppress the rebellion in Ireland, and secure themselves, but the instant granting of that their petition; which, they hoped, his majesty would not deny to those, who must, in the discharge of their duty to his majesty and the commonwealth, represent unto him, what they found so absolutely necessary for the preservation of both; which the laws of God and man enjoined them to see put in execution, as several counties by their daily petitions desired them to do, and in some places began already to do it of themselves." Notwithstanding all that importunity, the king made no other answer than formerly he had done, "that he would give a full answer at his return from Dover."

In the mean time, the house of commons, to whom every day petitions are directed by the several counties of England, professing all allegiance to them, govern absolutely, the lords concurring, or rather submitting, to whatsoever is proposed; inasmuch as when they had bailed the twelve bishops, who were in the Tower for the treason of their protestation, which they did the next day after the bill was passed for taking away their votes, the house of commons in great indignation expostulated with them, and caused them immediately again to be recommitted to the Tower. So they gave their private intimations to their correspondents in the counties, that they should make small entries upon the militia; which was done in many places, the people choosing their officers, and listing themselves, and so training and exercising under the names of volunteers; whereby they had opportunity to unite themselves, to know their confederates, observe those who were of other opinions, and to provide arms and ammunition against they should have occasion. The Tower of London was at their devotion, and Hull was their own; the mayor of that place having been lately sent for and reprehended, for having said, "that they ought not to have soldiers billeted upon them by the petition of right, and for refusing to submit that town, which was his charge, to the government of Mr. Hotham;" and after a tedious and chargeable attendance, without being brought to a public hearing, he was persuaded to submit; and so was discharged.

Then they fell to raising of monies under pretence of the relief of Ireland, and, for that purpose, prepared one act "for the payment of four hundred thousand pounds to such persons as were nominated by themselves, and to be disbursed and issued in such manner, and to such uses, as the two houses should direct," which the king confirmed accordingly; whereby they had a stock of credit to raise monies, whenever they found themselves put to it: and this could not be prevented; for the king having committed the carrying on the war of Ireland to them, and they being engaged both for the payment of the arrears to the officers of the northern army disbanded the summer before, and of the three hundred thousand pounds to the Scots, his majesty was necessitated to pass the act with such general clauses, that it might be in their power to divert the money to other uses than those to which it was given; as it afterwards fell out.

The queen being shipped for Holland, his majesty returned to Greenwich, whither he had sent to the marquis of Hertford to bring the prince of Wales from Hampton-court to meet him; of which as soon as the houses were advertised, they sent a message to the king, who was upon his way from Dover, to desire him, "that the prince might not be removed from Hampton-court, for that they conceived his removal at that time might be a cause to promote jealousies and fears in the hearts of his good subjects, which they thought necessary to avoid;" and, at the same time, sent an express order to the marquis of Hertford, "to require him not to suffer the prince to go to Greenwich:" but his lordship, choosing rather to obey the king's commands than theirs, carried his highness to his father; of which the houses no sooner were informed, than they sent some members of both houses to Greenwich, "to bring the prince from thence to London." But when they came thither, they found the king, whom they did not expect there; and so made no attempt to perform that command. The reason of this extravagancy (besides their natural humour to affront the king, and this seeming care of the prince was a popular thing) was pretended to be an information they had received from a member of the house.

There was one Griffith, a young Welshman, of no parts or reputation, but for eminent license; this youth had long, with great boldness, followed the court, and pretended to preferment there; and so in the house had always opposed, as far as not consenting, all the undutiful acts towards the king, and, upon this stock of merit, had pressed more confidently for a reward; and, when the queen was ready to take shipping at Dover for Holland, he barefaced importuned her to mediate to the king, "that he might be forthwith admitted of the prince's bedchamber:" the which her majesty refusing, he forthwith told his companions, "that since he could not render himself considerable by doing the king service, he would be considerable by doing him disservice:" and so made great haste to London, and openly in the house told them, (the same day that the prince was to go to Greenwich,) "that if they were not exactly careful, they would speedily lose the prince; for, to his knowledge, there was a design and resolution immediately to carry him into France." From which senseless and groundless information, he was taken into their favour; and, his malice supplying the defect of other parts, was thenceforth taken into trust, and used as their Bravo to justify all their excesses in taverns and ordinaries. And I saw Mr. Hambden, shortly after this discovery, take him in his arms, telling him, "his soul rejoiced to see, that God had put it in his heart to take the right way."

To their message the king sent them word, "That to their fears and jealousies he knew not what answer to give, not being able to imagine from what grounds they proceeded; but if any information had been given to them to cause those apprehensions, he much desired the same might be examined to the bottom; and then he hoped that their fears and jealousies would be hereafter continued only with reference to his majesty's rights and honour."

The queen being gone, and the prince come to his father at Greenwich, the king sent an answer to the two houses concerning the militia; "that having, with his best care and understanding, perused and considered that, which had been sent him from both houses, for the ordering the militia to be made an ordinance of parliament by the giving of his royal assent, as he could by no means do it for many reasons, so he did not conceive himself obliged by any promise made to them in his answer to their former petition. He said, he found great cause to except against the preface, or introduction to that order; which confessed a most dangerous and desperate design upon the house of commons of late, supposed to be an effect of the bloody counsels of papists, and other ill-affected persons, by which many might understand (looking upon other printed papers to that purpose) his own coming in person to the house of commons on the fourth of January, which begot so unhappy a misunderstanding between him and his people. And for that, though he believed it, upon the information since given him, to be a breach of their privileges, and had offered, and was ready, to repair the same for the future, by any act should be desired from his majesty; yet he must declare, and require to be believed, that he had no other design upon that house, or any member of it, than to require, as he did, the persons of those five gentlemen he had before accused of high treason, and to declare that he meant to proceed against them legally and speedily; upon which he believed that house would have delivered them up.

"And he called the almighty God to witness, that he was so far from any intention, or thought, of force or violence, although that house had not delivered them according to his demand, or in any case whatsoever, that he gave those his servants, and others, who then waited on his majesty, express charge and command, that they should give no offence unto any man; nay, if they received any provocation or injury, that they should bear it without return; and he neither saw nor knew, that any person of his train had any other weapons, but his pen-sioners and guard, those with which they usually attend his person to parliament; and the other gentlemen, swords. And therefore he doubted not, but the parliament would be regardless of his honour therein, that he should not undergo any imputation by the rash and indiscreet expressions of any young men then in his train, or by any desperate words uttered by others, who might mingle with them without his consent or approbation.

"For the persons nominated to be the lieutenants of the several counties of England and Wales, he said, he was contented to allow that recommendation; only concerning the city of London, and such other corporations as by ancient charters had granted to them the power of the militia, he did not conceive that it could stand with justice or policy to alter their government in that particular. And he was willing forthwith to grant to every one of them, that of London and those other corporations excepted, such commissions, as he had granted this parliament to some lords lieutenants by their advice. But if that power were not thought "enough, but that more should be thought fit to be granted to those persons named, than, by the law, is in the crown itself, he said, he thought it reasonable that the same should be by some law first vested in him, with power to transfer it to those persons; which he would willingly do: and whatever that power should be, to avoid all future doubts and questions, he desired it might be digested into an act of parliament, rather than an ordinance; so that all his subjects might thereby particularly know, both what they were to do, and what they were to suffer for their neglect; that so there might be the least latitude for them to suffer under any arbitrary power whatsoever.

"To the time desired for the continuance of the powers to be granted, he said, he could not consent to divest himself of the just power, which God, and the laws of the kingdom, had placed in him for the defence of his people, and to put it into the hands of others for any indefinite time. And since the ground of their request to him was to secure their present fears and jealousies, that they might with safety apply themselves to his message of the twentieth of January, he hoped that his grace to them since that time, in yielding to so many of their desires, and in agreeing to the persons now recommended to him, and the power before expressed to be placed in them, would wholly dispel those fears and jealousies: and he assured them, that as he had now applied this unusual remedy to their doubts; so, if there should be cause, he would continue the same to such time, as should be agreeable to the same care he now expressed towards them.

"He said, he was so far from receding from any thing he had promised, or intended to grant in his former answer, that he had hereby consented to all that had been then asked of him by that petition, concerning the militia of the kingdom, except that of London, and the other corporations; which was, to put the same into the hands of such persons, as should be recommended to him by both houses of parliament. And he doubted not but they, upon well weighing the particulars of that his answer, would find the same more satisfactory to their ends, and the peace and welfare of all his good subjects, than the way proposed by that intended ordinance; to which, for those reasons, he could not consent.

"And whereas he observed by their last petition, that in some places, some persons begun already to intermeddle of themselves with the militia, he said, he expected his parliament should examine the particulars thereof, it being a matter of high concernment, and very great consequence. And he required, that if it should appear to them, that any person whatsoever had presumed to command the militia without lawful authority, they might be proceeded against according to law."

It seems this was not the answer they promised themselves; for, at the publishing it, they were marvellously transported, and immediately voted, both houses concurring in it, "That those, that advised his majesty to give that answer, were enemies to the state, and mischievous projectors against the defence of the kingdom: that that denial was of that dangerous consequence, that

"if his majesty should persist in it, it would hazard the peace and safety of all his kingdoms, unless some speedy remedy were applied by the wisdom and authority of both houses of parliament: and that such parts of the kingdom, as had already put themselves into a posture of defence against the common danger, had done nothing but what was justifiable, and was approved by both houses." And having caused these, and such other resolutions to be immediately published in print, that their friends abroad might know what they had to do, they sent a committee of both houses to the king at Theobalds with another petition; in which they told him, "that their just apprehensions of sorrow and fear, in respect of the public dangers and miseries like to fall upon his majesty and the kingdom, were much increased upon the receipt of his unexpected denial of their most humble and necessary petition concerning the militia of the kingdom; and that they were especially grieved, that wicked and mischievous counsellors should still have that power with him, as in that time of imminent and approaching ruin, he should rather incline to that, which was apt to further the accomplishment of the desires of the most malignant enemies of God's true religion, and of the peace and safety of himself, and his kingdom, than to the dutiful and faithful counsel of his parliament. Wherefore, they said, they were enforced in all humility to protest, that, if his majesty should persist in that denial, the dangers and distempers of the kingdom were such, as would endure no longer delay: but unless he should be graciously pleased to assure them by those messengers, that he would speedily apply his royal assent to the satisfaction of their former desires, they should be enforced, for the safety of his majesty and his kingdoms, to dispose of the militia by the authority of both houses, in such a manner as had been propounded to him; and they resolved to do it accordingly.

"They likewise most humbly besought his majesty to believe, that the dangerous and desperate design upon the house of commons, mentioned in their preamble, was not inserted with any intention to cast the least aspersion upon his majesty; but therein they reflected upon that malignant party, of whose bloody and malicious practices they had so often experience, and from which they could never be secure, unless his majesty would be pleased to put from him those wicked and unfaithful counsellors, who interposed their own corrupt and malicious designs betwixt his majesty's goodness and wisdom, and the prosperity and contentment of himself, and of his people: and that for the despatch of the great affairs of the kingdom, the safety of his person, the protection and comfort of his subjects, he would be pleased to continue his abode near to London, and the parliament; and not to withdraw himself to any the remoter parts, which if he should do, must needs be a cause of great danger and distraction.

"That he would likewise be graciously pleased to continue the prince's highness in those parts at St. James's, or any other of his houses near London; whereby the designs, which the enemies of the religion, and peace of the kingdom, might have upon his person, and the jea-

"lousies and fears of his people, might be prevented.

"And they besought him to be informed by them, that, by the laws of the kingdom, the power of raising, ordering, and disposing of the militia within any city, town, or other place, could not be granted to any corporation by charter, or otherwise, without the authority and consent of parliament: and that those parts of the kingdom, which had put themselves in a posture of defence against the common danger, had therein done nothing but according to the declaration and direction of both houses, and what was justifiable by the laws of the kingdom. All which their most humble counsel and desires they prayed him to accept, as the effect of that duty and allegiance, which they owed unto him, and which would not suffer them to admit of any thoughts, intentions, or endeavours, but such as were necessary and advantageous for his greatness and honour, and the safety and prosperity of the kingdom, according to that trust and power, which the laws had reposed in them."

As soon as the petition was read, the king told them that presented it, "That he was so much amazed at their message, that he knew not what to answer. He said, they spake of jealousies and fears; but he desired them to lay their hands to their hearts, and ask themselves, whether he might not likewise be disturbed with fears and jealousies? and if so, he assured them, that message had nothing lessened them."

"For the militia, he said, he had thought so much of it before he sent his answer, and was so well assured that the answer was agreeable to what, in justice or reason, they could ask, or he in honour grant, that he should not alter it in any point.

"For his residence near them, he said, he wished it might be so safe and honourable, that he had no cause to absent himself from Whitehall: he bid them ask themselves, whether he had not? For his son, he said, he should take that care of him, which should justify him to God, as a father; and to his dominions, as a king. To conclude, he assured them upon his honour, that he had no thought but of peace, and justice to his people; which he would by all fair means seek to preserve and maintain, relying upon the goodness and providence of God for the preservation of himself, and his rights."

This, being suddenly, and with more than usual quickness, spoken by the king, much appalled them; but they were too far engaged to retire; and therefore, as soon as it was reported to the houses, they resolved, upon debate, "that the kingdom should be forthwith put into a posture of defence, by authority of both houses, in such a way as had been formerly agreed upon by both houses; and that a declaration should be speedily sent unto the king, containing the causes of their just fears and jealousies, and to make it evident that any that were entertained against them were groundless;" ordering at the same time, "that all the lords lieutenants of any counties in England, who had been formerly so constituted by the king by his commissions under the great seal of England, should immediately bring in those commissions to be cancelled as

"illegal:" albeit some such commissions had been granted, upon their own desire, since the beginning of the parliament, as particularly to the earl of Essex to be lord lieutenant of Yorkshire, and to the earl of Salisbury for Dorsetshire.

Then both houses sent to the earl of Northumberland, being high admiral of England, "that they had received advertisement of extraordinary preparations made, by the neighbouring princes, both by land and sea; by which an apprehension was raised in both houses, that the public honour, peace, and safety of his majesty, and his kingdom, could not be secured, unless a timely course were taken for the putting the kingdom into a condition of defence at sea, as well as at land: and they did therefore order him forthwith to give effectual direction, that all the ships belonging to his majesty's navy, and fit for service, and not already abroad, nor designed for the summer's fleet, should be rigged, and put in such a readiness, as that they might be soon fitted for the sea: and that his lordship would also make known to the masters and owners of other ships, in any of the harbours of the kingdom, [as] might be of use for the public defence, that it would be an acceptable service to the king and parliament, if they would likewise cause their ships to be rigged, and so far put into a readiness, as they might, at a short warning, likewise be set to sea upon any emergent occasion; which would be a means of great security to his majesty and his dominions." To which the earl returned an answer full of submission and obedience.

I have been assured from persons of very good credit, and conversant with those councils, that they had it in deliberation and debate to send, and take the prince from his father at Theobalds by force: but that design was quickly laid aside, when they heard that the king was removed from thence to Newmarket, and was like to make a further progress. So they used all possible expedition in preparing their declaration; which they directed to his majesty, and in which they told him, "that although that answer, he had given to their petition at Theobalds, did give just cause of sorrow to them; yet it was not without some mixture of confidence and hope, considering those expressions proceeded from the misapprehensions of their actions and intentions; which, having no ground of truth or reality, might, by his justice and wisdom, be removed, when he should be fully informed, that those fears and jealousies of theirs, which his majesty thought to be causeless, and without any just ground, did necessarily and clearly arise from those dangers and distempers, into which the mischievous and evil councils about him had brought the kingdom. And that those other fears and jealousies, by which his favour, his royal presence, and confidence, had been withdrawn from his parliament, had no foundation, or subsistence in any action, intention, or miscarriage of theirs; but were merely grounded upon the falsehood and malice of those who, for the supporting and fomenting their own wicked designs against the religion and peace of the kingdom, did seek to deprive his majesty of the strength and the affection of his people; and them of his grace and protection; and thereby to subject both his “ person, and the whole kingdom, to ruin and destruction.

“ That, to satisfy his majesty’s judgment and conscience in both those points, they desired to make a free and clear declaration of the causes of their fears and jealousies, in some particulars.

1. “ That the design of altering religion, in this and his other kingdoms, had been potently carried on, by those in greatest authority about him, for divers years together: and that the queen’s agent at Rome, and the pope’s agent, or nuncio, here, were not only evidences of that design, but had been great actors in it.

2. “ That the war with Scotland was procured to make way for that intent, and chiefly invited and fomented by the papists, and others popishly affected, whereof they had many evidences, especially their free and general contribution to it.

3. “ That the rebellion in Ireland was framed and contrived here in England; and that the English papists should have risen about the same time, they had several testimonies and advertisements from Ireland: and that it was a common speech amongst the rebels, (with which, they said, other evidences did concur, as the information of a minister who came out of Ireland; the letter of one Tristram Whetcomb in Ireland to his brother in England, and many others,) that they would recover unto his majesty his royal prerogative, wrested from him by the puritan faction in the houses of parliament in England; and would maintain episcopal jurisdiction, and the lawfulness thereof; which, they said, were the two quarrels, upon which his late army in the north should have been incensed against them.

4. “ The cause they had to doubt that the late design, styled the queen’s pious intention, was for the alteration of religion in this kingdom, for success whereof the pope’s nuncio (the count Rozetti) enjoined fasting and praying to be observed every week by the English papists; which, they said, appeared to them by one of the original letters directed by him to a priest in Lancashire.

5. “ The boldness of the Irish rebels in affirming they do nothing but by authority from the king; that they call themselves the queen’s army; that the prey and booty they take from the English, they mark with the queen’s mark; that their purpose was to come into England, when their business was done in Ireland; and sundry other things of that kind, which, they said, were proved by one Oconelly, and others; but especially in the forementioned letter from Tristram Whetcomb, wherein there was this passage, that many other speeches they utter, concerning religion, and our court of England, which he dares not commit to paper.

6. “ The many attempts to provoke his late army, and the army of the Scots, and to raise a faction in the city of London, and other parts of the kingdom. That those, who had been actors in these businesses, had their dependence, their countenance, and encouragement, from the court; witness the treason, whereof Mr. Jermyyn, and others, stood accused; who, they said, was transported beyond seas by warrant under his majesty’s own hand, after he had “ given assurance to his parliament, that he had laid a strict command upon his servants, that none of them should depart from court. And that dangerous petition delivered to captain Leg by his majesty’s own hand, accompanied with a direction signed with C. R.

7. “ The false and scandalous accusation against the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the house of commons, tendered to the parliament by his own command, and endeavoured to be justified in the city by his own presence and persuasion, and to be put in execution upon their persons by his demand of them in the house of commons, in so terrible and violent a manner, as far exceeded all former breaches of privileges of parliament acted by his majesty, or any of his predecessors: and they said, whatever his own intentions were, divers bloody and desperate persons, that attended him, discovered their affections, and resolutions, to have massacred and destroyed the members of that house, if the absence of those persons accused had not, by God’s providence, stopped the giving that word, which they expected for the setting them upon that barbarous and bloody act: the listing of officers and soldiers, for a guard at Whitehall, and such other particulars.

8. “ That, after a vote had passed in the house of commons, declaring that the lord Digby had appeared in a warlike manner at Kingston upon Thames, to the terror and affright of his majesty’s good subjects, and disturbance of the public peace of the kingdom, he should nevertheless be of that credit with his majesty, as to be sent away by his majesty’s own warrant to sir J. Pennington to land him beyond seas: from whence he vented his own traitorous conceptions, that his majesty should declare himself, and retire to a place of strength; as if he could not be safe amongst his people. Which false and malicious counsel and advice, they said, they had great cause to doubt, made too deep an impression on his majesty, considering the course he was pleased to take of absenting himself from his parliament, and carrying the prince with him; which seemed to express a purpose in his majesty to keep himself in a readiness for the acting of it.

9. “ The many advertisements they had from Rome, Paris, Venice, and other parts, that they still expected that his majesty had some great design in hand, for the altering of religion, the breaking the neck of his parliament. That the pope’s nuncio had solicited the kings of France and Spain to lend his majesty four thousand men apiece, to help to maintain his royalty against the parliament. And they said, as that foreign force was the most pernicious and malignant design of all the rest; so they hoped it was, and should always be, farthest from his majesty’s thoughts; because no man could believe he would give up his people and kingdom to be spoiled by strangers, if he did not likewise intend to change both his own profession in religion, and the public profession of the kingdom, that so he might be still more assured of those foreign states of the popish religion for their future support and defence.

“ These, they said, were some of the grounds of their fears and jealousies, which had made them so earnestly implore his royal authority, and pro“tection, for their defence and security, in all the ways of humility and submission ; which being denied by his majesty, seduced by evil counsel, they did, with sorrow for the great and unavoidable misery and danger, which thereby was like to fall upon his own person, and his kingdoms, apply themselves to the use of that power for the security and defence of both, which, by the fundamental laws and constitutions of the kingdom, resided in them ; yet still resolving to keep themselves within the bounds of faithfulness and allegiance to his sacred person, and his crown.

“To the fears and jealousies expressed by his majesty, when he said, that for his residence near the parliament, he wished it might be so safe and honourable, that he had no cause to absent himself from Whitehall : that, they said, they took as the greatest breach of privilege, that could be offered ; as the heaviest misery to himself, and imputation upon them, that could be imagined, and the most mischievous effect of evil counsels ; it rooted up the strongest foundation of the safety and honour the crown afforded ; it seemed as much as might be, they said, to cast upon the parliament such a charge, as was inconsistent with the nature of that great council, being the body, of which his majesty was the head ; it struck at the very being both of king and parliament, depriving his majesty, in his own apprehension, of their fidelity, and them of his protection ; which are the natural bands and supports of government and subjection.

“They said, they had, according to his majesty’s desire, laid their hands upon their hearts ; they had asked themselves in the strictest examination of their consciences ; they had searched their affections, their thoughts, considered their actions ; and they found none, that could give his majesty any just occasion to absent himself from Whitehall, and his parliament ; but that he might, with more honour and safety, continue there, than in any other place. They said, his majesty laid a general tax upon them : if he would be graciously pleased to let them know the particulars, they should give a clear and satisfactory answer. But, they said, they could have no hope of ever giving his majesty satisfaction, when those particulars, which he had been made believe were true, yet, being produced, and made known to them, appeared to be false ; and his majesty notwithstanding would neither punish nor produce the authors, but go on to contract new fears and jealousies, upon general and uncertain grounds ; affording them no means or possibility of particular answer to the clearing of themselves, of which they gave him these instances. 1. The speeches pretended to be spoken at Kensington concerning the queen, which had been denied and disavowed ; yet his majesty had not named the authors. 2. The charge and accusation of the lord Kimbolton, and the five members, who refused no trial or examination, which might stand with the privileges of parliament ; yet no authors, no witnesses, were produced, against whom they might have reparation for the great injury, and infamy cast upon them.

“happiness, honour, greatness, and plenty, and security, if he would join with his parliament, and his faithful subjects, in the defence of the religion, and the public good of the kingdom. That, they said, was all they expected from him, and for that they would return to him their lives, fortunes, and uttermost endeavours to support his majesty, his just sovereignty, and power over them. But, they said, it was not words that could secure them in those their humble desires ; they could not but too well and sorrowfully remember, what gracious messages they had from him the last summer ; when, with his privacy, the bringing up the army was in agitation : they could not but with the like affections recall to their minds, how, not two days before he gave direction for the aforementioned accusation, and his own coming to the commons’ house, that house received from him a gracious message, that he would always have care of their privileges, as of his own prerogative ; and of the safety of their persons, as of his own children.

“They said, that which they expected, and which would give them assurance that he had no thought but of peace, and justice to his people, must be some real effect of his goodness to them, in granting those things, which the present necessity of the kingdom did enforce them to desire. And in the first place, that he would be graciously pleased to put from him those wicked and mischievous counsellors, which had caused all those dangers and distractions ; and to continue his own residence, and the prince’s, near London, and the parliament ; which, they hoped, would be a happy beginning of contentment, and confidence between him and his people ; and be followed with many succeeding blessings of honour and greatness to his majesty, and of security and prosperity to them.

In the debate of this declaration, the like whereof had never before been heard of in parliament, in which they took his majesty’s doubt of his safety at Whitehall so heavily, that, they said, “it seemed to cast such a charge upon the parliament, as was inconsistent with the nature of that great council,” (so apprehensive they were of the least suspicion of want of freedom,) the prevalent party carried themselves with that pride and impetuosity, that they would endure no opposition or dispute ; insomuch as sir Ralph Hopton, (who indeed was very grievous to them for not complying with them,) for objecting against some sharp expressions in the declaration, (before it passed the house, and when the question was, whether it should pass,) as being too distant from that reverence, which ought to be used to the king ; and saying, upon a clause, in which they mentioned their general intelligence from Rome, Venice, Paris, and other places, of some design the king had upon religion, and the parliament, from whence they seemed to conclude that the king would change his religion, “that they seemed to ground an opinion of the king’s apostasy upon a less evidence, than would serve to hang a fellow for stealing a horse,” was committed to the Tower of London, for laying an imputation upon that committee, which had drawn up the declaration.” Notwithstanding which, after they had imprisoned him, they thought fit to make that expression less gross and positive; though, as it is set down above, (in which words it passed, and was delivered to the king,) it was thought by standers-by to be very unagreeable to the gravity of a wise court, and to the duty of subjects.

But in this particular, in oppressing all those who were of different opinions from them, their carriage was so notorious and terrible, that spies were set upon, and inquiries made upon all private, light, casual discourses, which fell from those who were not gracious to them: as one Mr. Trelawny, a member of the house of commons, and a merchant of great reputation, was expelled the house, and committed to prison, for having said, in a private discourse in the city, to a friend, "that the house could not appoint a guard for themselves without the king's consent, under pain of high treason:" which was proved by a fellow, who pretended to overhear him; when the person himself, with whom the conference was held, declared, "that he said, it might be imputed to them for treason:" and it was confessed on all parts, that the words were spoken long before the discovery, and some days before the house had resolved, "that they would have a guard." And afterwards, upon the old stock of their dislike, when the war began to break out, they again imprisoned this poor gentleman; seized upon all his estate, which was very good; and suffered him to die in prison for want of ordinary relief and refreshment.

And in this very time we speak of, and in the very business of the militia, when every day very great multitudes with petitions from most of the counties of England, and from the city of London, were presented to both houses, to desire them to be put into a posture of defence; and that they would cause the ordinance for the militia to be speedily executed, which was alleged to be an instance of the people's desire throughout the kingdom, and the chief ground of their proceeding; the most substantial citizens of London, both in reputation and estate, finding that the militia of that city, with which by their charter, and constant practice, the lord mayor had been always intrusted, was now with a most extravagant power to be committed to a number of factious persons of the city, the major part of whom consisted of men of no fortune, or reputation, resolved to petition both houses "not to alter their original constitution and right of their city:" and, to that purpose, a petition was signed by some hundreds, and very probably would in few days have been subscribed by all, or most of the substantial citizens of London. The house had notice of this petition, which they called another conspiracy and plot against the parliament, and immediately employed a member of their own to procure a sight of it; who, under a trust of redelivering it, got it into his hands, and brought it to the house of commons; upon which, some principal citizens, who had subscribed it, were examined, and committed to prison; and a direction given, that a charge and impeachment should be prepared against the recorder of London, who, they heard, had been of council in the drawing up and preparing that petition, and, they knew, was opposite to their tumultuary proceedings. So when the chief gentlemen of Oxfordshire heard, that a petition had been delivered to the house of commons in their name, and the name of that county, against the established government of the church, and for the exercise of the militia, they assembled together to draw up a petition disavowing the former, and to desire, "that the settled laws might be observed;" of which the lord Say having notice, he procured the chief gentlemen to be sent for as delinquents, and so suppressed that address: and this was the measure of their justice in many other particulars of the same nature, receiving and cherishing all mutinous and seditious petitions, and discountenancing such as besought the continuance and vindication of the so long celebrated and happy government in church and state; the prime leaders of that faction not blushing, in public debates in the house, to aver, "that no men ought to petition for the government established by law, because he had already his wish; but they that desired an alteration, could not otherwise have their desires known; and therefore were to be countenanced."

The committee, which presented the declaration to the king at Newmarket, presented likewise additional reasons, as they called them, for his majesty's return, and continuance near the parliament; as a matter, in their apprehension, of so great necessity and importance towards the preservation of his person, and his kingdom: and they said,

"They could not think they discharged their duties in the single expression of their desire, unless they added some further reasons to back it with. 1. His majesty's absence would cause men to believe, that it was out of design to discourage the undertakers, and hinder the other provisions for raising money for defence of Ireland. 2. It would very much hearten the rebels there, and disaffected persons in this kingdom, as being an evidence, and effect of the jealousy and division between his majesty and his people. 3. That it would much weaken and withdraw the affection of the subject from his majesty; without which, a prince is deprived of his chiefest strength and lustre, and left naked to the greatest dangers and miseries that can be imagined. 4. That it would invite and encourage the enemies of our religion and the state in foreign parts, to the attempting, and acting of their evil designs and intentions towards us. 5. That it did cause a great interruption in the proceedings of parliament. Those considerations, they said, threatened so great danger to his person, and to all his dominions, that, as his great council, they held it necessary to represent to him that their faithful advice, that so, whatsoever should follow, they might be excused before God and man."

Whilst that declaration was reading, his majesty expressed some passion upon particular expressions; and once, when that passage was read, that takes notice "of the transportation of Mr. Jermyn by his majesty's own warrant, after he had given his word, that he had commanded that none of his servants should depart from court," interrupted the earl of Holland, who read it, and said, "That's false;" and when he was told, "it related not to the date, but the execution of the warrant," his majesty said, "It might have been better expressed then: it is a high thing to tax a king with breach of promise." But after both the declaration and reasons were read, the king, after a short pause, said to them,

"I am confident that you expect not I should give you a speedy answer to this strange and unexpected declaration; and I am sorry, in the

"distraction of this kingdom, you should think this way of address to be more convenient, than that propounded, by my message of the twentieth of January last, to both houses. As concerning the grounds of your fears and jealousies, I will take time to answer [them] particularly; and doubt not but I shall do it to the satisfaction of all the world. God, in his good time, will, I hope, discover the secrets and bottoms of all plots and treasons; and then I shall stand right in the eyes of all my people. In the mean time I must tell you, that I rather expected a vindication for the imputation laid on me in Mr. Pym's speech, than that any more general rumours and discourses should get credit with you. For my fears and doubts, I did not think they should have been thought so trivial and groundless, whilst so many seditious pamphlets and sermons are looked upon, and so great tumults are remembered, unpunished, uninquied into. I still confess my fears, and call God to witness, that they are greater for the true protestant profession, my people and laws, than for my own rights, or safety; though I must tell you, I conceive none of these are free from danger. What would you have? Have I violated your laws? Have I denied to pass any one bill for the ease and security of my subjects? I do not ask you what you have done for me. Are my people transported with fears and apprehensions? I have offered as free and general a pardon as yourselves can devise. There is a judgment from heaven upon this nation, if these distractions continue. God so deal with me, and mine, as all my thoughts, and intentions, are upright for the maintenance of the true protestant profession, and for the observation and preservation of the laws of the land: and I hope God will bless and assist those laws for my preservation."

This being suddenly, and with some vehemence, spoken by his majesty, and he having taken further time to answer the declaration, and the reasons, the committee besought him, "since they were to carry back with them no other answer, that his majesty would vouchsafe to give them what he had spoken in writing;" which, the next morning, he did: and then the earl of Holland again desired him, "that he would reside nearer his parliament;" whereunto the king shortly answered, "I would you had given me cause; but I am sure this declaration is not the way to it." Then being asked by the earl of Pembroke, whether the militia might not be granted, as was desired by the parliament, for a time? he answered, "By God, not for an hour. You have asked that of me in this, was never asked of a king, and with which I will not trust my wife and children." He told them, "he could not have believed the parliament would have sent him such a declaration, if he had not seen it brought by such persons: and said he was sorry for the parliament, but glad he had it; for by that he doubted not to satisfy his people. He said they spake of ill councils; but he was confident they had worse informations, than he had councils. He told them, the business of Ireland would never be done in the way they were in; four hundred would never do that work; it must be put into the hands of one: and, he said, if he were trusted with it, he would pawn his head to end that work."

As soon as the committee returned, and reported what answer they had received, and in what disposition and temper they found and left the king; it was ordered, that their declaration, which they had sent to him, should be speedily printed, and carefully dispersed throughout the kingdom, that the people might see upon what terms they stood; and all other possible courses were taken to poison the hearts and affections of the subjects, and to suppress all those, who, in any degree, seemed to dislike their high proceedings. Above all, care was taken to place such preachers and lecturers in the most populous towns and parishes, as were well known to abhor the present government, and temperature of church and state; many of whom were recommended, and positively enjoined, and imposed upon parishes, by the house of commons; and others, by such factious members, whose reputation was most current: and all canonical clergymen, and orthodox divines, were, with equal industry, discountenanced, imprisoned, or forced to a long attendance upon committees, or the house, (which was worse than imprisonment,) under the notion and imputation of scandalous ministers. Which charge and reproach reached all men, whose inclinations they liked not, or whose opinions they suspected. And that they might be sure to be as strong and absolute at sea, as at land, they appointed the lord admiral to send the names of all those captains of ships, who were to attend the fleet for that summer service, to them, to the end they might have such men, in whom they might confide; which his lordship most punctually observed. By which they helped to free him of those officers whom he could not plausibly have discharged; and struck out the names of those, whose affections or relations they thought themselves not secure in.

The king thought it now time, according to his former resolution, which he had not communicated to many, to remove to York, which was a place of good receipt and convenience, for those who were willing to attend him; and, to the end that there might be public notice of it, he sent from Huntington, when he was upon his journey, a message to both houses: "That, being then in his remove to his city of York, where he intended to make his residence for some time, he thought fit to send that message to them, and very earnestly to desire them, that they would use all possible industry in expediting the business of Ireland; in which they should find so cheerful a concurrence from his majesty, that no inconvenience should happen to that service by his absence, he having all that passion for the reducing that kingdom, which he had expressed in his former messages, and being, by words, unable to manifest more affection to it, than he had endeavoured to do by those messages: having likewise done all such acts, as he had been moved unto by his parliament. Therefore, if the misfortunes and calamities of his poor protestant subjects there should grow upon them, (though he should be deeply concerned in, and sensible of their sufferings,) he said, he should wash his hands before all the world from the least imputation of slackness in that most necessary and pious work.

"And, that he might leave no way unattempted, which might beget a good understanding between him and his parliament, he said, he thought it necessary to declare, that, as he had been so tender of the privilege of parliament, that he "had been ready and forward to retract any act of his own, which he had been informed had trenchoned upon their privileges; so he expected an equal tenderness in them of his known and unquestionable prerogatives, which are the privileges of the kingdom; amongst which, he was assured, it was a fundamental one, that his subjects could not be obliged to obey any act, order, or injunction, to which he had not given his consent.

"And, therefore, he thought it necessary to publish, that he expected, and thereby required, obedience from all his loving subjects to the laws established; and that they presumed not upon any pretence of order, or ordinance, to which his majesty was no party, concerning the militia, or any other thing, to do, or execute what was not warrantable by those laws; he being resolved to keep the laws himself, and to require obedience to them from all his subjects. "And he once more recommended unto them the substance of his message of the twentieth of January last; that they would compose, and digest with all speed, such acts as they should think fit for their present and future establishment of their privileges, the free and quiet enjoying their estates and fortunes, the liberties of their persons, the security of the true religion then professed in the church of England, the maintaining his regal and just authority, and settling his revenue; he being most desirous to take all fitting and just ways, which might beget a happy understanding between him and his parliament, in which he conceived his greatest power and riches did consist."

I have not known both houses in more choler and rage, than upon the receiving this message, which came early to them on Wednesday the sixteenth of March. Now the day before had been spent in preparing all things ready for the execution of the ordinance of the militia; they had voted, and resolved, "that it was not any way against the oath of allegiance, that all the commissions to lieutenants under the great seal were illegal and void; and that whosoever should execute any power over the militia by colour of any commission of lieutenancy, without consent of both houses of parliament, should be accounted a disturber of the peace of the kingdom." Then they agreed upon this proposition, "That the kingdom had been of late, and still was, in so evident and imminent danger, both from enemies abroad, and a popish and discontented party at home, that there was an urgent and inevitable necessity of putting his majesty's subjects into a posture of defence, for the safeguard both of the king and his people; and that the lords and commons, apprehending that danger, and being sensible of their own duty to provide a suitable prevention, had, in several petitions, addressed themselves to his majesty for the ordering and disposing the militia of the kingdom in such a way, as was agreed upon, by the wisdom of both houses, to be most proper for the present exigence of the kingdom: yet they could not obtain it; but his majesty did several times refuse to give his royal assent thereunto." Upon this proposition, they resolved, "that in that case of extreme danger, and of his majesty's refusal, the ordinance agreed on by both houses for the militia did oblige the people, and ought to be "obeyed by the fundamental laws of the kingdom; and that such persons, as should be nominated deputy lieutenants, and approved of by both houses, should receive the commands of both houses, to take upon them to execute their offices." All which resolutions were ordered, the same night, to be printed and published. So that, when the king's message from Huntington was read the next morning, and seemed to be against their votes of the day before, they concluded, "that it could not be sent from the king, but that it had been inserted in blanks left in the town for such purposes;" and immediately made a committee, "to find out by whom that message was framed." But when they remembered, that they had voted as much a week before, and had examined the gentleman who brought it, and had received it from the king's own hand, they proceeded no further in that inquisition; but satisfied themselves with a new vote, "that those persons, who advised his majesty to absent himself from the parliament, and those that advised him to that message, were enemies to the peace of the kingdom, and justly to be suspected to be favourers of the rebellion in Ireland." And for the matter itself they resolved to insist upon their former votes; and withal declared, "that when the lords and commons in parliament, which is the supreme court of judicature in the kingdom, should declare what the law of the land is, to have that not only questioned and controverted, but contradicted, and a command that it should not be obeyed, was a high breach of the privilege of parliament."

And this likewise they caused to be speedily printed; lest the king should be able to persuade the subjects, that an order of theirs, without his consent, was no law to compel their obedience. And from this last resolution, by which the law of the land, and consequently the liberty of the subject, was resolved into a vote of the two houses, which passed without any dispute or hesitation, all sober men discerned the fatal period of both, and saw a foundation laid for all the anarchy and confusion that hath followed.

It was now known, that the king was gone to York, which made them apprehend their principality of Hull might be in danger; and therefore they immediately resolve, "that no forces whatsoever shall be admitted in that town, without the immediate consent of both houses;" which order was sent thither by an express. And having prepared the people to be ready for the militia, by publishing, "that, in case of extreme danger, they were to obey that ordinance;" they were, in the next place, to find the danger to be extreme; and, to that purpose, they produced letters without any name, pretended to be written from Amsterdam, signifying, "that they had intelligence there, that there was an army ready in Denmark to be transported into England, and was to be landed at Hull; which, they said, had been confirmed to them by a person of reputation, from Newmarket, who confirmed the intelligence of Denmark: and added, that there [were] likewise forces ready in France to be likewise landed at Hull."

And of this, how gross and ridiculous soever it appeared to wise men, they made a double use, (besides the general impression in the people,) the one to colour and countenance their orders to their governor there; the other, to make the king's residence in those parts suspected and grievous, as if he came thither only to bring in foreign forces upon them. With these alarms of foreign forces, they mingled other intelligence of the papists in England, "that they had a purpose of making an "insurrection;" and therefore they proceeded in preparing a bill to secure the persons of those of the best quality, and greatest interest, and enjoining the oath of supremacy to be taken with great rigour; and, amongst other stratagems they had to humble the papists, I remember, upon an information that they used their protestant tenants worse in the raising their rents, than they did those of their own religion, there was an order, "that they "should not raise the rents of their tenants, above "the rates that the protestant landlords adjoining "received from their tenants:" by virtue of which, in some places, they undertook to determine what rents their tenants should pay to them. But, in this zeal against the papists, they could not endure that the king should have any share; and therefore, when they found, that his majesty had published a proclamation in his journey towards York, "commanding all the judges and justices of peace, "and other officers, to put in due execution all the "laws and statutes of the kingdom, against popish "recusants, without favour or connivance," they presently sent for the sheriffs of London to the house of commons, and examined them, "why "seven priests, who were in Newgate, and had "been long condemned, were not executed?" the reason whereof they well knew: and when they said, "that they had received a reprieve for them "under the king's hand," they published that with great care in their prints, to take off the credit of the new proclamation; and appointed their messengers, whom they were then sending to the king with a new declaration, to move his majesty, "that "he would take off his reprieve, and suffer those "seven condemned priests to be executed, according to the judgments they had received."

They proceeded now to provide all necessary means for the raising great sums of money, by the diligent collection of what was granted by former acts, and by a new bill for the raising of four hundred thousand pounds for the payment of the great debts of the kingdom, (by which they meant the remainder of the three hundred thousand pounds, they had bountifully given to their brethren of Scotland,) and the support of the war of Ireland: all which monies were to be received and disposed as the two houses should direct; of which though the king saw the danger, that might, and after did ensue to them, yet he thought that probable inconvenience and mischief to be less, than that, which the scandal of denying any thing, upon which the recovery of Ireland seemed to depend, would inevitably bring upon him; and so ratified whatsoever they brought to him of that kind.

Amongst other expedients for raising of money for the war of Ireland, about this time, they made certain propositions to encourage men to be adventurers in that traffick, thus: they concluded "that, "in so general a rebellion, very much land must "escheat to the crown by the forfeiture of treason, "and that, out of such forfeitures, satisfaction "might be given to those, who should disburse "money towards the suppression of the rebels; so "many acres of land to be allowed for so much "money, according to the value of the lands in the "several provinces, which was specified in the pro-

"positions;" which, having passed both houses, were presented to the king, who (it being about the beginning of February, when the breach of their privileges rang in all men's ears) answered, "that as he had offered, and was still ready to "venture, his own person for the recovery of that "kingdom, if his parliament should advise him "thereunto; so he would not deny to contribute "any other assistance he could to that service, by "parting with any profit or advantage of his own "there; and therefore, relying upon the wisdom "of his parliament, he did consent to every proposition, now made to him, without taking time "to consider and examine, whether that course "might not retard the reducing that kingdom, by "exasperating the rebels, and rendering them "desperate of being received into grace, if they "should return to their obedience. And, he said, "he would be ready to give his royal assent to "such bills, as should be tendered to him by his "parliament for the confirmation of those "positions."

Which answer, together with their propositions, they caused forthwith to be printed; made their committees, in all places, to solicit subscriptions, and to receive the monies, the principal and most active persons subscribing first, for the example of others; and delayed the framing and presenting the bill to the king, till they had received great sums of money, and procured very many persons of all conditions to subscribe, many coming in out of pure covetousness to raise great fortunes; five hundred acres of land being assigned for one hundred pound in some counties, and not much under that proportion in others; some out of pure fear, and to win credit with the powerful party, which made this new project a measure of men's affections, and a trial how far they might be trusted, and relied on.

Then they sent those propositions digested into a bill to the king, with such clauses of power to them, and diminution of his own, that, upon the matter, he put the making a peace with the rebels there out of his own power, though upon the most advantageous terms; which he was likewise necessitated to pass.

But notwithstanding all these preparations on this side the sea, the relief and provision was very slowly supplied to the other side: where the rebels still increased in strength, and by the fame of these propositions enlarged their power, very many persons of honour and fortune, who till then had sat still, and either were, or seemed to be, averse to the rebellion, joining with them, as being desperate, and conceiving the utter suppressing their religion, and the very extirpation of their nation, to be decreed against them. And, without doubt, the great reformers here were willing enough to drive them to any extremity, both out of revenge and contempt, as a people easy to be rooted out, and that the war might be kept still up; since they feared an union in that kingdom might much prejudice their designs in this, both as it might supply the king with power, and take away much of theirs; whereas now they had opportunity, with reference to Ireland, to raise both men and money, which they might be able to employ upon more pressing occasions, as they will be found afterwards to have done. Neither was it out of their expectation and view, that, by the king's consenting to that severe decree, he might very probably discourage his catholic subjects, in his other dominions, from any extraordinary acts of duty and affection: at least, that it would render him less considered by the most catholic princes. And they knew well what use to make of any diminution of his interest or reputation. These matters thus settled, for the ease of the two houses, who were now like to have much to do, they appointed the whole business of Ireland to be managed by commission under the great seal of England, by four lords and eight commoners, whom they recommended to the king, and who were always to receive instructions from themselves. And in this state and disposition were the affairs of Ireland, when the king went to York, where let us now resort to him.

HISTORY OF THE REBELLION, &c.

BOOK V.

AS soon as the king came to York, which was about the end of the year 1641, and found his reception there to be equal to his expectation, the gentry, and men of ability of that great and populous county, (some very few excepted,) expressing great alacrity for his majesty's being with them, and no less sense of the insolent proceedings of the parliament; whereupon he resolved to treat with the two houses in another manner than he had done, and to let them clearly know, "that as he would deny them nothing that was fit for them to ask, so he would yield to nothing that was unreasonable for him to grant; and that he would have nothing extorted from him, that he was not very well inclined to consent to." So, within few days after his coming thither, he sent a declaration (which he caused to be printed, and, in the frontispiece, recommended to the consideration of all his loving subjects) to them, in answer to that presented to him at Newmarket some days before: he told them,

"That, though that declaration, presented to him at Newmarket from both houses of parliament, [was] of so strange a nature, in respect of what he expected, (after so many acts of grace and favour to his people,) and some expressions in it so different from the usual language to princes, that he might well take a very long time to consider it; yet the clearness and uprightness of his conscience to God, and love to his subjects, had supplied him with a speedy answer; and his unalterable affection to his people prevailed with him to suppress that passion, which might well enough become him upon such an invitation. He said, he had considered his answer of the first of that month at Theobalds, which was said to have given just cause of sorrow to his subjects: but, he said, whoever looked over that message, (which was in effect to tell him, that if he would not join with them in an act, which he conceived might prove prejudicial and dangerous to him, and the whole kingdom,

"they would make a law without him, and impose it upon his people,) would not think that sudden answer could be excepted to. He said, he had little encouragement to replies of that nature, when he was told of how little value his words were like to be with them, though they came accompanied with all the actions of love and justice, (where there was room for actions to accompany them;) yet he could not but disavow the having any such evil counsel, or counsellors about him, to his knowledge, as were mentioned by them; and, if any such should be discovered, he would leave them to the censure and judgment of his parliament. In the mean time he could wish, that his own immediate actions, which he did avow, and his own honour, might not be so roughly censured and wounded, under that common style of evil counsellors. For his faithful and zealous affection to the true protestant profession, and his resolution to concur with his parliament in any possible course for the propagation of it, and the suppression of popery, he said he could say no more than he had already expressed in his declaration to all his loving subjects, published in January last, by the advice of his privy council; in which he endeavoured to make as lively a confession of himself in that point as he was able, being most assured, that the constant practice of his life had been answerable thereunto: and therefore he did rather expect a testimony, and acknowledgment of such his zeal and piety, than those expressions he met with in that declaration of any design of altering religion in this kingdom. And he said, he did, out of the innocency of his soul, wish, that the judgments of Heaven might be manifested upon those, who have or had any such design.

"As for the Scots' troubles, he told them, he had thought, that those unhappy differences had been wrapped up in perpetual silence by the act of oblivion; which, being solemnly passed in the "parliaments of both kingdoms, stopped his own mouth from any other reply, than to shew his great dislike for reviving the memory thereof. He said, if the rebellion in Ireland, so odious to all Christians, seemed to have been framed and maintained in England, or to have any countenance from hence, he conjured both his houses of parliament, and all his loving subjects whatsoever, to use all possible means to discover and find such out, that he might join in the most exemplary vengeance upon them, that could be imagined. But, he told them, he must think himself highly and causelessly injured in his reputation, if any declaration, action, or expression of the Irish rebels; any letter from the count Rozetti to the papists, for fasting and praying; or from Tristram Whetcomb, of strange speeches uttered in Ireland, should beget any jealousy or misapprehension in his subjects of his justice, piety, and affection: it being evident to all understandings, that those mischievous and wicked rebels are not so capable of great advantage, as by having their false discourses so far believed, as to raise fears and jealousies to the distraction of this kingdom; the only way to their security. He said, he could not express a deeper sense of the sufferings of his poor protestant subjects in that kingdom, than he had done in his often messages to both houses; by which he had offered, and was still ready, to venture his royal person for their redemption; well knowing, that as he was, in his own interests, more concerned in them; so he was to make a strict account to Almighty God for any neglect of his duty, or their preservation.

"For the manifold attempts to provoke his late army, and the army of the Scots, and to raise a faction in the city of London, and other parts of the kingdom, if it were said as relating to him, he could not without great indignation suffer himself to be reproached to have intended the least force, or threatening to his parliament; as the being privy to the bringing up of the army would imply. Whereas, he called God to witness, he never had any such thought, or knew of any such resolution concerning his late army. For the petition shewed to him by captain Leg, he said, he well remembered the same, and the occasion of that conference. Captain Leg being lately come out of the north, and repairing to him at Whitehall, his majesty asked him of the state of his army; and, after some relation of it, he told his majesty, that the commanders and officers of the army had a mind to petition the parliament, as others of his people had done, and shewed him the copy of a petition; which he read, and finding it to be very humble, desiring the parliament might receive no interruption in the reformation of the church and state, to the model of queen Elizabeth's days, his majesty told him, that he saw no harm in it; whereupon captain Leg replied, that he believed all the officers of the army would like it; only, he thought, sir Jacob Ashley would be unwilling to sign it, out of fear that it might displease him. His majesty then read the petition over again; and observing nothing in matter or form he conceived could possibly give just cause of offence, he delivered it to him again, bidding him give it to sir Jacob Ashley, for whose satisfaction he writ C. R. upon it, to testify his ap"probation; and he wished that the petition might be seen and published, and then he believed it would appear no dangerous one, nor a just ground for the least jealousy or misapprehension.

"For Mr. Jermyn, he said, it was well known that he was gone from Whitehall, before he received the desire of both houses for the restraint of his servants; neither returned he thither, or passed over by any warrant granted by him after that time. For the breach of privilege in the accusation of the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the house of commons, he told them, he thought, he had given so ample satisfaction in his several messages to that purpose, that it should have been no more pressed against him; being confident, if the breach of privilege had been greater than ever had been before offered, his acknowledgment and retractation had been greater than ever king had given: besides the not examining how many of his privileges had been invaded in defence and vindication of the other. And therefore he hoped his true and earnest protestation in his answer to their order concerning the militia, would so far have satisfied them of his intentions then, that they would no more have entertained any imagination of any other design, than he there expressed. But why the listing so many officers, and entertaining them at Whitehall, should be misconstrued, he said, he much marvelled, when it was notoriously known the tumults about Westminster were so great, and their demeanour so scandalous and seditious, that he had good cause to suppose his own person, and those of his wife and children, to be in apparent danger; and therefore he had great reason to appoint a guard about him, and to accept the dutiful tender of the services of any of his loving subjects, which was all he did to the gentlemen of the inns of court.

"For the lord Digby, he assured them in the word of a king, that he had his warrant to pass the seas, and had left his court, before ever he heard of the vote of the house of commons, or had any cause to imagine that his absence would have been excepted against. What their advertisements were from Rome, Venice, Paris, and other parts, or what the pope's nuncio solicited the kings of France or Spain to do, or from what persons such informations come to them, or how the credit and reputation of such persons had been sifted and examined, he said, he knew not; but was confident, no sober honest man in his kingdoms could believe, that he was so desperate, or so senseless, to entertain such designs, as would not only bury this his kingdom in sudden distraction and ruin, but his own name and posterity in perpetual scorn and infamy. And therefore, he said, he could have wished in matters of so high and tender a nature, wherewith the minds of his good subjects must needs be startled, all the expressions had been so plain and easy, that nothing might stick with them that reflected upon his majesty; since they thought fit to publish it at all.

"And having now dealt thus plainly and freely with them, by way of answer to the particular grounds of their fears, he said, he hoped, upon a due consideration and weighing of both together, they would not find the grounds to be of that

"moment to beget, or longer to continue, a misunderstanding between them; or force them to apply themselves to the use of any other power, than what the law had given them: the which he always intended should be the measure of his own power, and expected it should be the rule of his subjects' obedience.

"Concerning his own fears and jealousies, as he had no intention of accusing them, so he said, he was sure no words spoken by him on the sudden at Theobalds would bear that interpretation. He had said, for his residence near them, he wished it might be so safe and honourable, that he had no cause to absent himself from Whitehall; and how that could be a breach of privilege of parliament he could not understand. He said, he had explained his meaning in his answer at Newmarket, at the presentation of that declaration, concerning the printed seditious pamphlets, and sermons, and the great tumults at Westminster: and he said, he must appeal to them, and all the world, whether he might not justly suppose himself in danger of either. And if he were now at Whitehall, he asked them, what security he had, that the like should not be again? especially if any delinquents of that nature had been apprehended by the ministers of justice, and had been rescued by the people, and so as yet had escaped unpunished. He told them, if they had not yet been informed of the seditious words used in, and the circumstances of those tumults, and would appoint some way for the examination of them, he would require some of his learned council to attend with such evidence as might satisfy them; and till that were done, or some other course should be taken for his security, he said, they could not with reason wonder, that he intended not to be, where he most desired to be.

"He asked them, whether there could yet want evidence of his hearty and importunate desire to join with his parliament, and all his faithful subjects, in defence of the religion and public good of the kingdom? Whether he had given them no other earnest but words, to secure them of those desires? He told them the very remonstrance of the house of commons (published in November last) of the state of the kingdom allowed him a more real testimony of his good affections, than words; that remonstrance valued his acts of grace and justice at so high a rate, that it declared the kingdom to be then a gainer, though it had charged itself, by bills of subsidies and poll-money, with the levy of six hundred thousand pounds, besides the contracting a debt of two hundred and twenty thousand pounds more to his subjects of Scotland. He asked them, whether the bills for the triennial parliament, for relinquishing his title of imposing upon merchandise, and power of pressing of soldiers, for the taking away the star-chamber and high-commission courts, for the regulating the council-table, were but words? whether the bills for the forests, the stannary courts, the clerk of the market, and the taking away the votes of bishops out of the lords' house, were but words? Lastly, what greater earnest of his trust, and reliance on his parliament, he could give, than the passing the bill for the continuance of this present parliament: the length of which, he said, he hoped, would never alter the nature of parliaments, and the constitution of this kingdom; or invite his subjects so much to abuse his confidence, as to esteem anything fit for this parliament to do, which were not fit, if it were in his power to dissolve it to-morrow. And after all these, and many other acts of grace on his part, that he might be sure of a perfect reconciliation between him and all his subjects, he had offered, and was still ready to grant, a free and general pardon, as ample as themselves should think fit. Now if those were not real expressions of the affections of his soul for the public good of this kingdom, he said he must confess that he wanted skill to manifest them.

"To conclude: although he thought his answer already full to that point concerning his return to London, he told them, that he was willing to declare, that he looked upon it as a matter of so great weight, as with reference to the affairs of this kingdom, and to his own inclinations and desires, that if all he could say, or do, could raise a mutual confidence, (the only way, with God's blessing, to make them all happy,) and, by their encouragement, the laws of the land, and the government of the city of London, might recover some life for his security; he would overtake their desires, and be as soon with them, as they could wish. And, in the mean time, he would be sure that neither the business of Ireland, or any other advantage for this kingdom, should suffer through his default, or by his absence; he being so far from repenting the acts of his justice and grace, which he had already performed to his people, that, he said, he should, with the same alacrity, be still ready to add such new ones, as might best advance the peace, honour, and prosperity of this nation."

They who now read this declaration, and remember only the insolent and undutiful expressions in that declaration, to which this was an answer, and the more insolent and seditious actions which preceded, accompanied, and attended it, may think that the style was not answerable to the provocation, nor princely enough for such a contest; and may believe, that if his majesty had then expressed himself with more indignation for what he had suffered, and more resolution, "that he would no more endure those sufferings," they who were not yet grown to the hardness of avowing the contempt of the king (and most of them having designs to be great with and by him, whom they provoked) would sooner have been checked, and recovered their loyalty and obedience. But they again, who consider and remember that conjuncture of time, the incredible disadvantage his majesty suffered by the misunderstanding of his going to the house of commons, and by the popular mistake of privilege of parliament, and consequently of the breach of those privileges; and, on the contrary, the great height and reputation the factious party had arrived to, the stratagems they used, and the infusions they made into the people, "of the king's disinclination to the laws of the land;" and especially, "that he had consented to all those excellent laws made this parliament (of which the people were possessed) very unwillingly, and meant to avoid them: that the queen had an irreconcilable hatred to the religion professed, and to the "whole nation, and that her power was unquestionable: that there was a design to send the prince beyond the seas, and to marry him to some papist:" above all, (which the principal of them, with wonderful confidence, in all places avowed to be true,) "that the rebellion in Ireland was fomented, and countenanced at least, by the queen, that good terms might be got for the catholics in England." I say, whoever remembers this, and, that though it might be presumed, that the exorbitancy of the parliament might be very offensive to some sober and discerning men, yet his majesty had no reason to presume of their eminent and vehement zeal on his behalf, since he saw all those (two or three only excepted) from whom he might challenge the duty, and faith of servants usque ad aras, and for whose sake he had undergone many difficulties, either totally alienated from his service, and engaged against him, or, like men in a trance, unapplicable to it: he will conclude that it concerned his majesty, by all gentleness and condescension, to undeceive and recover men to their sobriety and understanding, before he could hope to make them apprehensive of their own duty, or the reverence that was due to him; and therefore, that he was to descend to all possible arts and means to that purpose, it being very evident, that men would no sooner discern his princely justice and clemency, than they must be sensible of the indignities which were offered to him, and incensed against those who were the authors of them.

And the truth is, (which I speak knowingly,) at that time, the king's resolution was to shelter himself wholly under the law; to grant any thing, that by the law he was obliged to grant; and to deny what by the law was in his own power, and which he found inconvenient to consent to; and to oppose and punish any extravagant attempt by the force and power of the law, presuming that the king and the law together would have been strong enough for any encounter that could happen; and that the law was so sensible a thing, that the people would easily perceive who endeavoured to preserve, and who to suppress it, and dispose themselves accordingly.

The day before this answer of his majesty came to them, though they knew they should speedily receive it, lest somewhat in it might answer, and so prevent some other scandals they had a mind to lay to his majesty's charge, they sent a petition to him, in the name of the lords and commons, upon occasion of the short cursory speech he made to their committee, (which is before mentioned,) at the delivery of their declaration at Newmarket, in which they told him,

"That the lords and commons in parliament could not conceive, that that declaration, which he received from them at Newmarket, was such as did deserve that censure his majesty was pleased to lay upon them in that speech, which his majesty made to their committee; their address therein, being accompanied with plainness, humility, and faithfulness, they thought more proper for the removing the distraction of the kingdom, than if they had then proceeded according to his message of the twentieth of January; by which he was pleased to desire, that they would declare, what they intended to do for his majesty, and what they expected to be done for themselves; in both which, they said, they had been very much hindered by his majesty's denial to secure them, and the whole kingdom, by disposing the militia as they had divers times most humbly petitioned. And yet, they said, they had not been altogether negligent of either, having lately made good proceedings in preparing a book of rates, to be passed in a bill of tonnage and poundage, and likewise the most material heads of those humble desires, which they intended to make to his majesty for the good and contentment of his majesty and his people; but none of these could be perfected before the kingdom be put in safety, by settling the militia: and until his majesty should be pleased to concur with his parliament in those necessary things, they held it impossible for his majesty to give the world, or his people, such satisfaction concerning the fears and jealousies, which they had expressed, as they hoped his majesty had already received touching that exception, which he was pleased to take to Mr. Pym's speech. As for his majesty's fears and doubts, the ground whereof was from seditious pamphlets and sermons, they said, they should be as careful to endeavour the removal [of them], as soon as they should understand what pamphlets and sermons were by his majesty intended, as they had been to prevent all dangerous tumults. And if any extraordinary concourse of people out of the city to Westminster had the face and show of tumult and danger, in his majesty's apprehension, it would appear to be caused by his majesty's denial of such a guard to his parliament, as they might have cause to confide in; and by taking into Whitehall such a guard for himself, as gave just cause of jealousy to the parliament, and of terror and offence to his people. They told him, they sought nothing but his majesty's honour, and the peace and prosperity of his kingdoms; and that they were heartily sorry they had such plentiful matter [for] an answer to that question, whether his majesty had violated their laws? They besought his majesty to remember, that the government of this kingdom, as it was, in a great part, managed by his ministers before the beginning of this parliament, consisted of many continued and multiplied acts of violation of laws; the wounds whereof were scarcely healed, when the extremity of all those violations was far exceeded by the late strange and unheard of breach of their laws in the accusation of the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the commons' house, and in the proceedings thereupon; for which they had yet received no full satisfaction.

To his majesty's next question, whether he had denied any bill for the ease and security of his subjects? they wished they could stop in the midst of their answer; that with much thankfulness they acknowledged, that his majesty had passed many good bills full of contentment and advantage to his people: but truth and necessity enforced them to add this, that, even in or about the time of passing those bills, some design or other had been on foot, which, if it had taken effect, would not only have deprived them of the fruit of those bills, but have reduced them to a worse condition of confusion, than that wherein the parliament found them.

And if his majesty had asked them the third question intimated in that speech, what they "had done for him? they told him, their answer would have been much more easy; that they had paid two armies with which the kingdom was burdened the last year, and had undergone the charge of the war in Ireland at this time, when, through many other excessive charges and pressures, whereby his subjects had been exhausted, and the stock of the kingdom very much diminished; which great mischiefs, and the charges thereupon ensuing, had been occasioned by the evil counsels so powerful with his majesty, and would cost this kingdom more than two millions; all which, in justice, ought to have been borne by his majesty.

"As for that free and general pardon his majesty had been pleased to offer, they said, it could be no security to their fears and jealousies, for which his majesty seemed to propound it; because they arose not from any guilt of their own actions, but from the evil designs and attempts of others.

"To that their humble answer to that speech, they desire to add an information, which they lately received from the deputy governor of the merchant adventurers at Rotterdam in Holland, that an unknown person, appertaining to the lord Digby, did lately solicit one James Henly, a mariner, to go to Elsinore, and to take charge of a ship in the fleet of the king of Denmark, there prepared; which he should conduct to Hull. In which fleet likewise, he said, a great army was to be transported: and although they were not apt to give credit to informations of that nature, yet they could not altogether think it fit to be neglected; but that it might justly add somewhat to the weight of their fears and jealousies, considering with what circumstances it was accompanied; with the lord Digby's precedent expressions in his letter to her majesty, and sir Lewis Dives; and his majesty's succeeding course of withdrawing himself northward from his parliament, in a manner very suitable and correspondent to that evil counsel; which, they doubted, would make much deeper impression in the generality of his people: and therefore they most humbly advised, and besought his majesty, for the procuring and settling the confidence of his parliament and all his subjects, and for the other important reasons concerning the recovery of Ireland, and securing this kingdom, which had been formerly presented to him, he would be graciously pleased, with all convenient speed, to return to those parts, and to close with the counsel and desire of his parliament; where he should find their dutiful affections and endeavours ready to attend his majesty with such entertainment, as should not only give him just cause of security in their faithfulness, but other manifold evidences of their earnest intentions, and endeavours to advance his majesty's service, honour, and contentment; and to establish it upon the sure foundation of the peace and prosperity of all his kingdoms."

This, which they called a petition, being presented to the king, his majesty immediately returned, by the same messengers, his answer in these words:

"If you would have had the patience to have expected our answer to your last declaration, (which, considering the nature of it, hath not been long in coming,) we believe, you would have saved yourselves the labour of saying much of this message. And we could wish, that our privileges on all parts were so stated, that this way of correspondency might be preserved with that freedom, which hath been used of old. For we must tell you, that if you may ask any thing of us by message, or petition, and in what language (how unusual soever) you think fit; and we must neither deny the thing you ask, nor give a reason why we cannot grant it, without being taxed of breaking your privileges, or being counselled by those, who are enemies to the peace of the kingdom, and favourers of the Irish rebellion, (for we have seen your printed votes upon our message from Huntington,) you will reduce all our answers hereafter into a very little room; in plain English, it is to take away the freedom of our vote; which, were we but a subject, were high injustice; but being your king, we leave all the world to judge what it is.

"Is this the way to compose all misunderstandings? we thought we shewed you one, by our message of the twentieth of January; if you have a better or readier, we shall willingly hearken to it, for hitherto you have shewed us none. But why the refusal to consent to your order, which you call a denial of the militia, should be any interruption to it, we cannot understand. For the militia, which we always thought necessary to be settled, we never denied the thing (as we told you in our answer of the twenty-eighth of January) to the petition of the house of commons; for we accepted the persons, except for corporations; we only denied the way. You ask it by way of ordinance, and with such a preface, as we can neither with justice to our honour or innocence consent to. You exclude us from any power in the disposition or execution of it together with you, and for a time utterly unlimited. We tell you, we would have the thing done; allow the persons, with that exception; desire a bill, the only old way of imposing on our subjects: we are extremely unsatisfied what an ordinance is, but well satisfied, that without our consent it is nothing, not binding: and it is evident by the long time spent in this argument, the necessity and danger was not so imminent, but a bill might have been prepared; which if it shall yet be done, with that due regard to us, and care of our people, in the limitation of the power and other circumstances, we shall recede from nothing we formerly expressed in that answer to your order; otherwise, we must declare to all the world, that we are not satisfied with, or shall ever allow our subjects to be bound by, your printed votes of the fifteenth or sixteenth of this month; or that, under pretence of declaring what the law of the land is, you shall, without us, make a new law, which is plainly the case of the militia: and what is this but to introduce an arbitrary way of government?"

"Concerning Pym's speech, you will have found, by what the lord Compton and Mr. Baynton brought from us in answer to that message they brought to us, [that,] as yet, we rest nothing satisfied in that particular.

"As for the seditious pamphlets and sermons, we are both sorry and ashamed (in so great a "variety, and in which our rights, honour, and authority are so insolently alighted and vilified, and in which the dignity and freedom of parliament is so much invaded and violated) it should be asked of us to name any. The mentioning of the Protestation Protested, the Apprentices' Protestation, To your tents, O Israel, or any other, would be too great an excuse for the rest: if you think them not worth your inquiry, we have done. But we think it most strange to be told, that our denial of a guard (which we yet never denied, but granted in another manner, and under a command at that time most accustomed in the kingdom,) or the denial of any thing else, (which is in our power legally to deny,) which in our understanding, of which God hath surely given us some use, is not fit to be granted, should be any excuse for so dangerous a course of people; which, not only in our apprehension, but, we believe, in the interpretation of the law itself, hath been always held most tumultuous and seditious. And we must wonder, what, and whence come the instructions and informations, that those people have, who can so easily think themselves obliged by the protestation to assemble in such a manner for the defence of privileges, which cannot be so clearly known to any of them, and so negligently pass over the consideration and defence of our rights, so beneficial and necessary for themselves, and scarce unknown to any of them; which by their oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and even by the same protestation, they are at least equally obliged to defend. And what interruptions such kind of assemblies may be to the freedom of future parliaments, (if not seasonably discountenanced and suppressed,) we must advise you to consider; as likewise, whether both our rights and powers may not by such means be usurped, by hands not trusted by the constitution of this kingdom. For our guard, we refer you to our answer to your declaration.

"By that question of violating your laws, by which we endeavoured to express our care and resolution to observe them, we did not expect you would have been invited to have looked back so many years, for which you have had so ample reparation; neither looked we to have been reproached with the actions of our ministers then against the laws, whilst we express so great a zeal for the present defence of them; it being our resolution, upon observation of the mischief which then grew by arbitrary power, (though made plausible to us by the suggestions of necessity and imminent danger; and take you heed, you fall not into the same error, upon the same suggestions,) hereafter to keep the rule ourself, and to our power require the same from all others. But above all, we must be most sensible of what you cast upon us for requital of those good bills, you cannot deny. We have denied any such design; and as God Almighty must judge in that point between us, who knows our upright intentions at the passing those laws, so in the mean time we defy the Devil to prove, that there was any design (with our knowledge or privity) in or about the time of passing those bills, that, had it taken effect, could have deprived our subjects of the fruit of them. And therefore we demand full reparation in this point, that we may be cleared in the sight of all the "world, and chiefly in the eyes of our loving subjects, from so notorious and false an imputation as this is.

"We are far from denying what you have done; for we acknowledge the charge our people have sustained in keeping the two armies, and in relieving Ireland; of which we are so sensible, that, in regard of those great burdens our people have undergone, we have, and do patiently suffer those extreme personal wants, as our predecessors have been seldom put to, rather than we would press upon them; which we hope in time will be considered on your parts.

"In our offer of a general pardon, our intent was to compose and secure the general condition of our subjects, conceiving that, in these times of great distractions, the good laws of the land have not been enough observed: but it is a strange world, when princes' proffered favours are counted reproaches: yet if you like not this our offer, we have done.

"Concerning any discourses of foreign forces, though we have given you a full answer in ours to your last declaration, yet we must tell you, we have neither so ill an opinion of our own merit, or the affections of our good subjects, as to think ourself in need of any foreign forces to preserve us from oppression; and we shall not need for any other purpose: but are confident, through God's providence, not to want the good wishes and assistance of the whole kingdom, being resolved to build upon that sure foundation, the law of the land: and we take it very ill, that any general discourses between an unknown person and a mariner, or inferences upon letters, should be able to prevail in matters so improbable in themselves, and scandalous to us; for which we cannot but likewise ask reparation, not only for the vindicating of our own honour, but also thereby to settle the minds of our subjects, whose fears and jealousies would soon vanish, were they not fed and maintained by such false and malicious rumours as these.

"For our return to our parliament, we have given you a full answer in ours to your declaration; and you ought to look on us as not gone, but driven (we say not by you, yet) from you. And if it be not so easy for you to make our residence in London so safe as we could desire, we are and will be contented, that our parliament be adjourned to such a place, where we may be fitly and safely with you. For though we are not pleased to be at this distance, yet you are not to expect our presence, until you shall both secure us concerning our just apprehensions of tumultuary insolences, and likewise give us satisfaction for those insupportable and insolent scandals, that are raised upon us.

"To conclude: as we have or shall not refuse any way agreeable to justice or honour, which shall be offered to us for the begetting a right understanding between us; so we are resolved that no straits or necessities, to which we may be driven, shall ever compel us to do that, which the reason and understanding that God hath given us, and our honour and interest, with which God hath trusted us for the good of our posterity and kingdoms, shall render unpleasant and grievous to us. And we assure you, that how meanly soever you are pleased to value the discharge of our public duty, we are so conscious

"to ourself of having done our part since this parliament, that, in whatsoever condition we now stand, we are confident of the continued protection from Almighty God, and the constant gratitude, obedience, and affection from our people. And we shall trust God with all."

These quick answers from the king gave them very much trouble, and made it evident to them, that he would be no more swagtered into concessions that he thought unreasonable, or persuaded to them upon general promises, or an implicit confidence in their future modesty; but that he demanded reparation for the breach of his privileges, and so fought with them with their own weapons, troubled them much more; apprehending that, in a short time, the people might be persuaded to believe, that the king was in the right, and had not been well dealt with: and though some few, who thought themselves too far engaged to retire, were glad of the sharpness of these paper skirmishes, which they believed made the wound still wider, and more incurable; yet the major part, which had been induced to join with them out of confidence that the king would yield, and that their boldness and importunity in asking would prevail with his majesty to consent, wished themselves fairly unentangled: and I have heard many of the fiercest concurrens, and who have ever since kept them company, at that time profess, "that if any expedient might be found to reconcile the present difference about the militia, they would no more adventure upon demands of the like nature:" and the earl of Essex himself was startled, and confessed to his friends, "that he desired a more moderate proceeding should be in parliament; and that the king, who had given so much, should receive some satisfaction." But those of the court, who thought their faults to their master most unpardonable, could not endure that he being the youngest courtier should be the eldest convert; and therefore, by repeating what the king and queen had said of him heretofore, and by fresh intelligence, which they procured from York, of what the king then thought of him, they persuaded him, "that his condition was too desperate to recede:" and all men were persuaded, that this severe deportment of the king proceeded from the spirit of some new evil counsellors, who would be as soon destroyed as discovered; and that then they would so carry themselves, that the king should owe his greatness and his glory (for they still said, "he should excel all his predecessors in both") to their formed counsels and activity, and not to the whispers of those who thought to do his business without them. And I am persuaded, that even then, and I was at that time no stranger to the persons of most that governed, and a diligent observer of their carriage, they had rather a design of making themselves powerful with the king, and great at court, than of lessening the power of the one, or reforming the discipline of the other: but, no doubt, there were some few in the number that looked further; yet, by pretending that, kept up the mettle of writing, and inclined them for their honour to new declarations.

When the king came to York, he found himself at ease; the country had received him with great expressions of joy and duty, and all persons of quality of that great county, and of the counties adjacent, resorted to him, and many persons of condition from London, and those parts, who had not the courage to attend upon him at Whitehall; so that the court appeared with some lustre. And now he began to think of executing some of those resolutions, which he had made with the queen before her departure; one of which was, and to be first done, the removing the earls of Essex and Holland from their offices in the court, the one of chamberlain, the other of groom of the stole, which hath the reputation and benefit of being first gentleman of the bedchamber. Indeed no man could speak in the justification of either of them, yet no man thought them both equally culpable. The earl of Holland was a person merely of the king's creation; raised from the condition of a private gentleman, a younger brother of an extraction that lay under a great blemish, and without any fortune, to a great height by the king's mere favour and bounty. And he had not only adorned him with titles, honours, and offices, but enabled him to support those in the highest lustre, and with the largest expense: and had drawn many inconveniences, and great disadvantages, upon himself and his service, by his preferring him to some trusts, which others did not only think themselves, but really were, worthier of; but especially by indulging him so far in the rigorous execution of his office of chief justice in eyre, in which he brought more prejudice upon the court, and more discontent upon the king, from the most considerable part of the nobility and gentry in England, than any one action, that had its rise from the king's will and pleasure, though it was not without some warrant from law; which having not been practised for some hundreds of years, was looked upon as a terrible innovation and exaction upon persons, who knew not that they were in any fault; nor was any imputed to them, but the original sin of their forefathers, even for which they were obliged to pay great penalties and ransoms. That such a servant should suffer his zeal to lessen and decay towards such a master, and that he should keep a title to lodge in his bedchamber, from whose court he had upon the matter withdrawn himself, and adhered to and assisted those who affronted and contemned his majesty so notoriously, would admit of no manner of interposition and excuse.

Less was to be objected against the earl of Essex, who, as he had been, all his life, without obligations from the court, and believed he had undergone oppression there, so he was, in all respects, the same man he had always professed himself to be, when the king put him into that office; and in receiving of which, many men believed, that he rather gratified the king, than that his majesty had obliged him in conferring it; and it had been, no doubt, the chief reason of putting the staff in his hand, because in that conjuncture no other man, who would in any degree have appeared worthy of it, had the courage to receive it. However having taken the charge upon him, he ought, no doubt, to have taken all his master's concerns more to heart, than he had done; and he can never be excused for staying in Whitehall, when the king was with that outrage driven from thence, and for choosing to behold the triumph of the members' return to Westminster, rather than to attend his majesty's person in so great perplexity to Hampton-court; which had been his duty to have done, and for failing wherein no other excuse can be made, but that, after he had taken so full a resolution to have waited upon his majesty thither, that he had dressed himself in his travelling habit, he was diverted from it by the earl of Holland, who ought to have accompanied him in the service, and by his aversion, "that if he went, he should be assassinated;" which was never thought of.

Notwithstanding all this, the persons trusted by his majesty, and remaining at London, had no sooner notice of it, (which his majesty sent to them, that he might be advised the best way of doing it,) but they did all they could to dissuade the pursuing it. They did not think it a good conjuncture to make those two desperate; and they knew that they were not of the temper and inclinations of those, who had too much credit with them, nor did desire to drive things to the utmost extremities, which could never better their conditions; and that they did both rather desire to find any expedients, by which they might make a safe and an honourable retreat, than to advance in the way they were engaged. But the argument they chiefly insisted on to the king, was, "that, being deprived of their offices, they would be able to do more mischief, and ready to embark themselves with the most desperate persons, in the most desperate attempts;" which fell out accordingly. And there is great reason to believe, that if that resolution the king had taken had not been too obstinately pursued at that time, many of the mischiefs, which afterwards fell out, would have been prevented; and, without doubt, if the staff had remained still in the hands of the earl of Essex, by which he was charged with the defence and security of the king's person, he would never have been prevailed with to have taken upon him the command of that army, which was afterwards raised against the king, and with which so many battles were fought. And there can be as little doubt in any man, who knew well the nature and temper of that time, that it had been utterly impossible, for the two houses of parliament to have raised an army then, if the earl of Essex had not consented to be general of that army.

But the king was inexorable in the point; he was obliged by promise to the queen at parting, which he would not break; and her majesty had contracted so great an indignation against the earl of Holland, whose ingratitude indeed towards her was very odious, that she had said, "she would never live in the court, if he kept his place." And so the king sent an order to Littleton, then lord keeper of the great seal, "that he should require the staff and key from the one and the other, and receive them into his custody." The keeper trembled at the office, and had not courage to undertake it. He went presently to the lord Falkland, [and] desired him to assist him in making his excuse to the king. He made many professions of his duty to the king, "who, he hoped, would not command him in an affair so unsuitable to the office he held under him; that no keeper had ever been employed in such a service; that if he should execute the order he had received, it would in the first place be voted a breach of privilege in him, being a peer; and the house would commit him to prison, by which the king would receive the greatest affront, though he should be ruined; whereas the thing itself might be done by a more proper officer, without any inconvenience."

How weak soever the reasons were, the passion was strong; and the lord Falkland could not refuse to convey his letter to the king, which contained his answer in his own words, with all the imaginable professions of duty and zeal for his service. How ill soever his majesty was satisfied, he saw the business would not be done that way; and therefore he writ immediately a letter, all in his own hand, to the lord Falkland; in which with some gracious expressions of excuse for putting that work upon him, he commanded him "to require the surrender of the ensigns of their offices from those two earls." The lord Falkland was a little troubled in receiving the command: they were persons from whom he had always received great civilities, and with whom he had much credit; and this harsh office might have been more naturally, and as effectually, performed by a gentleman usher, as the same staff had been demanded before from the earl of Pembroke, within less than a year. However, he would make no excuse, being a very punctual and exact person in the performance of his duty; and so went to both of them, and met them coming to the house, and imparted his message to them: they desired him very civilly, "that he would give them leave to confer a little together, and they would, within half an hour, send for him into the house of commons:" whither he went, and they, within less time, sent to him to meet them in sir Thomas Cotton's garden, (a place adjacent, where the members of both houses used frequently to walk,) and there, with very few words, they delivered the staff and the key into his hands, who immediately carried them to his lodging; and they went up to the house of peers: and immediately both houses took notice of it, and with passion, and bitter expressions against the evil counsellors, who had given his majesty that counsel, they concurred in a vote, "that whosoever presumed to accept of either of those offices, should be reputed an enemy to his country;" and then they proceeded with more impetuosity in the business of the militia, and all other matters which most trench upon the king's authority.

Whilst they were so eager in pursuit of the militia, and pretended the necessity so imminent, that they could not defer the disposition thereof till it might be formally and regularly settled by bill, they had their eye upon another militia, the royal navy; without recovering of which to their own power, (though they were satisfied by the pulse of the people, that they would join with them, and be generally obedient to their commands,) they had no mind to venture upon the execution of their land ordinance. And therefore, in the beginning of the spring, when the fleet for that year was provided, after they [had] excepted against such persons to be captains of ships, as they thought not devoted to them, (as is before mentioned,) they sent a formal message to the lords, "that the earl of Northumberland, lord admiral, might be moved to constitute the earl of Warwick his admiral of the fleet for that year's service, being a person of such honour and experience, as they might safely confide in him; and that the earl of Warwick might be desired to undertake that service." The lords thought fit that the king's approbation might be first desired, before it was recommended to the earl of Northumberland : but the commons thought that superfluous, since it was absolutely in the earl's disposal to dispose of the officers of the fleet ; and therefore refused to send to the king, but of themselves sent to both the one earl and the other ; and the earl of Warwick, being well pleased with the trust, very frankly, without waiting the king's consent, declared, " that he was ready to undertake the employment." But this being so publicly agitated, the king could not but take notice of it ; and finding that the business should not be proposed to him, thought it necessary to signify his pleasure in it, that so at least the lord admiral might not pretend innocence, if ought should be done to his disservice ; and therefore he appointed Mr. Secretary Nicholas to write to the earl of Northumberland, " that his majesty expected that sir John Pennington should command that fleet, as he had done two or three years before." This letter being communicated to both houses, and the lord admiral being thereby upon the disadvantage of a single contest with the king, the house of commons, rather out of kindness and respect to the earl, than of duty to the king, condescended to join with the lords in a message to the king ; which they sent not by members of their own, but directed the lord keeper " to inclose it in a letter to the secretary attending the king, and to send the same to York ;" which he did accordingly. The message was :

" That the lords and commons, in this present parliament assembled, having found it necessary to provide, and set to sea, a strong and powerful navy for the defence of this kingdom against foreign force, and for the security of his majesty's other dominions, the charge whereof was to be borne by the commonwealth : and taking notice of the indisposition of the lord admiral, which disabled him, at that time, for commanding the fleet in his own person, did thereupon recommend unto his lordship the earl of Warwick, a person of such quality and abilities, in whom they might best confide, to supply his lordship's room for this employment : and understanding that his majesty hath since signified his pleasure concerning that command for John Pennington, they said, they did hold it their duty to represent to his majesty the great danger and mischief the commonwealth was like to sustain by such interruption ; and therefore did humbly beseech his majesty, that the noble person, recommended by both houses of parliament for this service, might no longer be detained from it, out of any particular respect to any other person whatsoever."

The same day that this message came to his majesty, he despatched an answer to the lord keeper ; in which he told him, " that he wondered both at the form and matter of that inclosed paper he had sent to him, in the name of both houses of parliament ; it being neither by the way of petition, declaration, or letter ; and for the matter, he believed, it was the first time, that the houses of parliament had taken upon them the nomination, or recommendation of the chief sea-commander ; but it added to the wonder, that sir John Pennington being already appointed by him for that service, upon the recommendation of his admiral, and no fault so much as alleged against him, another should " be recommended to him. Therefore, he said, his resolution upon that point was, that he would not alter him, whom he had already appointed to command that year's fleet ; whose every ways sufficiency was so universally known, the which he was confident his admiral, if there should be occasion, would make most evident ; against whose testimony he supposed his parliament would not except. And though there were yet none appointed, or the said sir John, through some accident, not able to perform the service ; yet, he said, the men of that profession were so well known to him, besides many other reasons, that (his admiral excepted, because of his place) recommendations of that kind would not be acceptable to him."

This answer was no other than they expected, though they seemed troubled at it, and pretended that they had many things of misdemeanour to object against sir John Pennington, at least such matters as would render him incapable of that trust ; the greatest of which was, that he had conveyed the lord Digby over sea ; though they well knew (as is before mentioned) that he had the king's warrant and command for that purpose ; and therefore moved the lords that he might be sent for to be examined upon many particulars : and in the mean time, whilst they caused him to attend their leisure to be examined, they proceeded in hastening the earl of Warwick to make himself ready for the service, who made no scruple of undertaking it ; and the earl of Northumberland receiving the order, and desire of both houses, " to grant his commission to him to be admiral of that fleet," thought himself sufficiently excused towards the king, and did it accordingly ; the two houses in the mean time, without any further thought of procuring the king's consent, preparing reasons to satisfy his majesty for the necessity or conveniency of their proceeding.

Many men, especially they who at a distance observed and discerned the difficulties the king was like to encounter, wondered that upon so apparent a breach of trust, and act of undutifulness, his majesty did not at that time revoke the lord admiral's commission, which was but during pleasure ; and so put that sure guard of the kingdom, his navy, under such a command as he might depend upon. But the truth is, it was not then counsellable ; for (besides that it was easier to resolve, " that it was fit to remove the earl of Northumberland," than to find a man competent for the place) that way it might have been possible to have prevented the going out of any fleet to sea, which would have confirmed the frantic jealousies of bringing in foreign forces, [but] not have reduced it to his own obedience.

They had, by degrees, so ordered the collection of tonnage and poundage, by passing bills for six weeks and two months at a time, and putting those, who should receive or pay those duties, otherwise than they were granted by those bills, into a præsumpture ; and so terrified the old customers, that the king had no other means of setting out his fleet, than by the monies arising by the customs, which they absolutely disposed of ; and at this time had contracted with the victualler, made the ships ready, and hired many merchants' ships to join in that fleet for the guard of the seas. And whilst this matter of the admiral was in suspense, they suffered the former bill of tonnage and poundage to expire, and did not, till the very night before, pass a new bill; which could not have the royal assent till many days after, the king being then at York. Yet the house of commons, to save all danger of the præmunire, on the twenty-fourth of March, being the very day that the former bill expired, sent an order to all the collectors of the customs, many of which could not receive it in ten days after;

"That the new bill being passed by both houses for the continuance of those payments until the third day of May, (which could not yet receive the royal assent, in regard of the remoteness of his majesty's person from the parliament,) which monies to be collected by that bill were to be employed for the necessary guarding of the seas, and defence of the commonwealth: it was therefore ordered by the commons in parliament, that the several officers belonging to the custom-house, both in the port in London, and the out-ports, should not permit any merchant or other to lade or unlade any goods, or merchandises, before such persons do first make due entries thereof in the custom-house. And it was declared also by the said commons, that such officers, upon the respective entry made by any merchant as aforesaid, should intimate to such merchant, that it was the advice of the commons, for the better ease of the said merchants, and in regard the respective duties would relate, and become due as from that day; that the said merchants upon entry of their goods, as usually they did, when a law was in force to that purpose, would deposit so much money as the several customs would amount unto, in the hands of such officers, to be by them accounted to his majesty, as the respective customs due by the said bill, when the said bill should have the royal assent; or otherwise, his majesty refusing the passing thereof, the said monies to be restored, upon demand, unto the several merchants respectively."

By which order, which was a more absolute dispensation for a præmunire, than ever any non-obstante granted by the crown, the customs were as frankly and fully paid, as if an act of parliament had been passed to that purpose; and as soon as the commission could be sent, and returned from York, the act was passed. But no doubt they had a further design in suffering the bill totally to expire, before they prepared a new [one], than at that time was apprehended; and intended, under such a popular necessity, which seemed to be occasioned by the king's absence, to bring their own orders in such reputation, that in another necessity which they should declare, they might by the precedent of this, which was the only indemnity all those merchants who paid, and the officers who received, customs, had for the preservation of their estates, be currently and absolutely obeyed and submitted to.

By this it appears the king could not at that time, with convenience or safety to his affairs, displace the earl of Northumberland; and he believed, if his occasions should hereafter require it, that the time would be much more seasonable, when the fleet was at sea; and the thing itself more practicable: which was a true conclusion. However, he expressed so much dislike against the earl of Warwick's commanding that fleet, that he was not willing that any officers whom he valued should take employment under him; which he had shortly after cause to repent. For, by this means, the vice-admiralty, which was designed to captain Cartwright, the comptroller of the navy, who hath since sufficiently testified how advantageously to his majesty he would have managed that charge, upon his refusal (which was occasioned by intimation from his majesty, as shall be hereafter mentioned) was conferred upon Batten, an obscure fellow; and, though a good seaman, unknown to the navy, till he was, two or three years before, for money, made surveyor, who executed it ever since with great animosity against the king's service, of which more hereafter.

Being, by this means, secure at sea, they proceeded with more vigour at land; and, though they thought it not yet seasonable to execute their ordinance for the militia with any form and pomp, they directed, underhand, their agents and emissaries, "that the people, of themselves, should choose captains and officers, and train under the name of volunteers;" which began to be practised in many places of the kingdom, but only in those corporations, and by those inferior people, who were notorious for faction and schism in religion. The king's declarations, which were now carefully published, gave them some trouble, and made great impression in sober men, who were moved with the reason, and in rich men, who were startled at the commands in them. But that clause in the king's answer to their declaration, presented to him at Newmarket, in which he told them, "that if they had not been informed of the seditious words used in, and the circumstances of the tumults, and would appoint some way for the examination of them, that he would require some of his learned council to attend with such evidence as might satisfy them," troubled them much more. For if there were still so much courage left in the king's council, that they durst appear to inform against any of those proceedings, which they favoured, they should find men grow more afraid of the law than of them; which would destroy all their designs. Therefore they resolved to proceed with all expedition, and severity, against the attorney general for his trespass and presumption upon their privileges, in the accusation of the five members, and the lord Kimbolton: of the circumstances of which proceeding, and judgment thereupon, being as extraordinary, and as distant from the rules of justice, at least of practice, as any thing that then happened, it will not be amiss to set down two or three particulars.

Shortly after they had impeached him, (which is mentioned before,) and the king had found it necessary to give over any prosecution against them, his majesty being desirous, now he had freed them, that they should free his attorney, writ a letter from Royston, when he was in his way to York, to the lord keeper; in which he told him, "that the articles, which had been preferred against the members, [were,] by himself, delivered to his attorney general, engrossed in paper; and that he had then commanded him to accuse those persons, upon those articles of high treason, and other misdemeanours; and, in his name, to desire a committee of lords might be appointed to take the examinations of such witnesses as should be produced, as formerly had been done in cases of like nature, according to the justice of the house. And his majesty did further declare, that his said attorney did not advise or

"contrive the said articles, nor had any thing to do with, or in advising, any breach of privilege that followed after. And for what he did in obedience to his commands, he conceived he was bound by oath, and the duty of his place, and by the trust reposed in him by his majesty, so to do : and that, if he had refused to obey his majesty therein, his majesty would have questioned him for breach of oath, duty, and trust ; but now having declared that he found cause wholly to desist from proceeding against the persons accused, he had commanded him to proceed no further therein, nor to produce nor to discover any proof concerning the same."

Though this testimony of his majesty's clearly absolved him from the guilt, with which he was charged, yet it rather hastened the trial, and sharpened the edge, that was before keen enough against him ; and the day of trial being come, when the members of the commons, who were appointed for the prosecution, found that council was ready (which had been assigned by the lords) for the defence of the attorney general, they professed, "that they would admit no council ; that it was below the dignity of the house of commons to plead against fee'd council ; that whoever presumed to be of council with a person accused by the commons of England, should be taught better to know his duty, and should have cause to repent it." The lords seemed much moved with this reproach, that their acts of judicature should be questioned, and the council, which had been justly and regularly assigned by them, should be threatened for submitting to their order. But that which troubled them most, was, that the council, which was assigned by them, upon this reprehension and threat of the commons, positively refused to meddle further in the business, or to make any defence for the attorney. Hereupon they put off the trial, and commit to the Tower of London sir Thomas Bedingfield, and sir Thomas Gardiner, for their contempt in refusing to be of council with the attorney upon their assignment : standers by looking upon the justice of parliament with less reverence, to see the subject, between the contradictory and opposite commands of both houses, (the displeasure of either being insupportable,) punished and imprisoned for not doing, by one, what he was straitly inhibited by the other not to do.

However, this difference gave only respite for some days to the attorney, who was quickly again called before his judges. To what was passionately and unreasonably objected against him, "of breach of privilege and scandal," he confidently alleged "the duty of his place ; that his master's command was warrant for what he had done ; and that he had been justly punishable, if he had refused to do it when commanded ; that there had never been a pretence of privilege in case of treason, the contrary whereof was not only understood by the law, but had been by themselves confessed, in a petition delivered by them in the beginning of this king's reign, upon the imprisonment of the earl of Arundel ; in which it was acknowledged, that the privilege of parliament extended not to treason, felony, or refusal to find sureties for the peace ; that he had no reason to suspect the executing the duty of his place would have been imputed to him for any trespass, since the very same thing he had now done, and of which "he stood accused, was done, in the first year of this king's reign, by sir Robert Heath, the then attorney general ; who exhibited articles of high treason before their lordships, against the earl of Bristol, which was not then understood to be any breach of privilege ; and therefore, having so late a precedent, most of their lordships being then judges, he hoped he should be held excusable for not being able to discern that to be a crime, which they had yet never declared to be so." The undeniable reasons of his defence (against which nothing was replied, "but the inconvenience and mischief, which would attend a parliament, if the members might be accused of high treason without their consent") prevailed so far with the major part of the house of peers, though the prosecution was [carried on] with all imaginable sharpness and vehemence by the house of commons, and entertained by those peers who were of that party, as a matter of vast concernment to all their hopes, that the questions being put, whether he should be deprived of his place of attorney ? whether he should be fined to the king ? whether he should pay damages to the persons accused ? and whether he should be committed to the Tower ? which were the several parts of the sentence, which many of the lords had judged him to undergo, the negative prevailed in every one of the particulars ; so that the attorney was understood by all men, who understood the rules and practice of parliament, to be absolutely absolved from that charge and impeachment, by the judgment of the house of peers.

The house of commons expressed all possible resentment, and declared, "that they would not rest satisfied with the judgment ;" and some lords, even of those who had acquitted him, were very desirous to find out an expedient, whereby the house of commons might be compounded with ; and it was believed, that the attorney himself was much shaken with the torrent of malice and prejudice, which the house of commons seemed now to threaten him with ; conceiving, "that he and his office now triumphed over the whole body, and not over six members only : " and therefore, after some days, the house of peers considering, "that his discharge was but negative, that he should not be punished in this and that degree ; and that he had no absolution from the crime, with which he was charged," proceeded to a new judgment, (contrary to all course and practice of parliament, or of any judicial court,) and complying with all their other votes, resolved, by way of judgment upon him, "that he should be disabled from ever being a parliament man ; incapable of any place of judicature, or other preferment, than of attorney general ;" which they could not deprive him of, by reason of the former vote ; and "that he should be committed to the prison of the Fleet." Which sentence was with all formality pronounced against him, and he committed to the Fleet accordingly : the which the commons was no more satisfied with than with the former ; some of them looking that their favourite, the solicitor, should have the place of attorney ; others, that the accused members should receive ample damages by way of reparation ; without which they could not think themselves secure from the like attempts.

Having, by this extraordinary and exemplary proceeding, fortified their privileges against such attempts, and secured their persons from being accused, or proceeded against by law, they used no less severity against all those who presumed to question the justice or prudence of their actions, especially against those, who, following the method that had done so much hurt, drew the people to petition for that which they had no mind to grant; and in this prosecution they were not less severe and vehement, than against the highest treason could be imagined.

Upon the petition mentioned before, that was framed in London against their settling the militia, they committed one George Binion, a citizen of great reputation for wealth and wisdom, and [who] was indeed a very sober man. After he had lain some time in prison, the lords, according to law, bailed him; but the commons caused him the next day to be recommitted, and preferred an impeachment against him, for no other crime but "advising and contriving that petition." The gentleman defended himself, "that it was always held, and so publicly declared this parliament, to be lawful, in a modest way, to petition for the removal or prevention of any grievance: that he observing very many petitions to be delivered, and received, for the settling the militia in another way than was then agreeable to the law, or had been practised, and conceiving that the same would prove very prejudicial to the city of London, of which he was a member, he had joined with many other citizens, of known ability and integrity, in a petition against so great an inconvenience; which he presumed was lawful for him to do." How reasonable soever this defence was, the house of peers adjudged him "to be disfranchised, and incapable of any office in the city; to be committed to the common gaol of Colchester," (for his reputation was so great in London, that they would not trust him in a city prison,) and fined him three thousand pounds.

About the same time, at the general assizes in Kent, the justices of peace, and principal gentlemen of that county, prepared a petition to be presented to the two houses, with a desire, "that the militia might not be otherwise exercised in that county, than the known law permitted: and that the Book of Common-Prayer, established by law, might be observed." This petition was communicated by many to their friends, and copies thereof sent abroad, before the subscription was ready; whereupon the house of peers took notice of it, as tending to some commotion in Kent; and, in the debate, the earl of Bristol taking notice, "that he had seen a copy of it, and had had some conference about it with judge Mallet," who was then judge of assize in Kent, and newly returned out of his circuit, both the earl and judge, for having but seen the petition, were presently committed to the Tower; and a declaration published, "that none should presume to deliver that, or the like petition to either house." Notwithstanding which, some gentlemen of Kent, with a great number of the substantial inhabitants of that county, came to the city; which, upon the alarm, was put in arms; strong guards placed at London-bridge, where the petitioners were disarmed, and only some few suffered to pass with their petition to Westminster; the rest forced to return to their country. And, upon the delivery thereof to the house of commons, (though the same was very modest, and in a more dutiful dialect than most petitions delivered to them,) the bringers of the petition were sharply reprehended; two or three of them committed to several prisons; the principal gentlemen of the country, who had subscribed and advised it, sent for as delinquents; and charges, and articles of impeachment, drawn up against them; and a declaration published, "that whosoever should henceforth advise or contrive the like petitions, should be proceeded against, as enemies to the commonwealth." So unlike and different were their tempers, and reception of those modest addresses, which were for duty and obedience to the laws established, and those which pressed and brought on alteration and innovation. But that injustice gave great life and encouragement to their own proselytes; and taught others to know that their being innocent would not be long easy or safe: and this kind of justice extended itself in the same measure to their own members, who opposed their irregular determinations; who, besides the agony and vexation of having the most abstract reason, and confessed law, rejected, and overruled with contempt and noise, were liable to all the personal reproaches and discountenance, that the pride and petulance of the other party could lay upon them; and were sometimes imprisoned and disgraced, for freely speaking their opinions and conscience in debate.

All sorts of men being thus terrified, the commons remembered, that a great magazine of the king's ammunition lay still at Hull; and though that town was in the custody of a confident of their own, yet they were not willing to venture so great a treasure so near the king, who continued at York, with a great resort of persons of honour and quality from all parts; and therefore they resolved, under pretence of supplying Ireland, to remove it speedily from thence; and to that purpose moved the lords, "to join with them in an order to that purpose." The lords, who proceeded with less fury, and more formality, desired, "that it might be done with the king's consent." After a long debate, the one thinking they merited much by that civility, the other contented to gratify those in the ceremony, who, they knew, would in the end concur with them, a petition was agreed upon to be sent to his majesty; in which, that he might the sooner yield to them in this matter, they resolved to remember him of that, which, they thought, would reflect on him with the people, and to "move him to take off the reprieve from the six priests," which is before mentioned. And so they sent their petition to him, telling him, "that they found the stores of arms and ammunition in the tower of London much diminished; and that the necessity for supply of his kingdom of Ireland (for which they had been issued from thence) daily increased; and that the occasion, for which the magazine was placed at Hull, was now taken away; and considering it would be kept at London with less charge, and more safety, and transported thence with much more convenience for the service of the kingdom of Ireland; they therefore humbly prayed, that his majesty would be graciously pleased to give leave, that the said arms, cannon, and ammunition, now in the magazine of Hull, might be removed to the Tower of London, according as should be directed by both his houses of parliament. And whereas six priests, then in New-

"gate, were condemned to die, and by his majesty had been reprieved, they humbly prayed his majesty to be pleased, that the said reprieves might be taken off, and the priests executed according to law." To which petition his majesty immediately returned answer in these words:

"We rather expected, and have done so long, that you should have given us an account, why a garrison hath been placed in our town of Hull, without our consent, and soldiers billeted there against law, and express words of the Petition of Right, than to be moved, for the avoiding of a needless charge you have put upon yourselves, to give our consent for the removal of our magazine and munition, our own proper goods, upon such general reasons as indeed give no satisfaction to our judgment: and since you have made the business of Hull your argument, we would gladly be informed, why our own inclination, on the general rumour of the designs of papists in the northern parts, was not thought sufficient ground for us to put a person of honour, fortune, and unblemished reputation, into a town and fort of our own, where our own magazine lay: and yet the same rumour be warrant enough for you to commit the same town and fort, without our consent, to the hands of sir John Hotham, with a power unagreeable to the law of the land, or the liberty of the subject.

"And yet of this, in point of right, or privilege, for sure we are not without privilege too, we have not all this while complained: and being confident that the place, whatsoever discourse there is of public or private instructions to the contrary, shall be speedily given up, if we shall require it, we shall be contented to dispose our munition there, as we have done in other places, for the public ease and benefit, as, upon particular advice, we shall find convenient; though we cannot think it fit, or consent, that the whole magazine be removed together. But when you shall agree upon such proportions, as shall be held necessary for any particular service, we shall sign such warrants as shall be agreeable to wisdom and reason; and if any of them be designed for Ulster, or Lemster, you know well the conveyance will be more easy and convenient from the place they are now in. Yet we must tell you, that if the fears are so great from the papists at home, or of foreign force, as is pretended, it seems strange that you make not provision of arms and munition for defence of this kingdom, rather than seek to carry any more from hence, without some course taken for supply; especially, if you remember your engagement to our Scots subjects, for that proportion of arms which is contained in your treaty. We speak not this, as not thinking the sending of arms to Ireland very necessary, but only for the way of the provision. For you know what great quantities we have assigned out of our several stores, which, in due time, we hope, you will see replenished. For the charge of looking to the magazine at Hull, as it was undertaken voluntarily by you at first, and, to say no more, unnecessarily; so you may free our good people of that charge, and leave it to us to look to, who are the proper owner of it. And this, we hope, will give you full satisfaction in this point, and that ye do not, as you have done in the business of the militia, send this message

"out of compliment and ceremony, resolving to be your own carvers at last. For we must tell you, if any attempt shall be made or given in this matter, without our consent or approbation, we shall esteem it as an act of violence against us; and declare it to all the world, as the greatest violation of our right, and breach of our privilege.

"Concerning the six priests condemned, it is true, they were reprieved by our warrant, [we] being informed, that they were, by some restraint, disabled to take the benefit of our former proclamation: since that, we have issued out another, for the due execution of the laws against papists; and have most solemnly promised, in the word of a king, never to pardon any priest without your consent, which shall be found guilty by law; desiring to banish these, having herewith sent warrant to that purpose, if, upon second thoughts, you do not disapprove thereof. But if you think the execution of these persons so very necessary to the great and pious work of reformation, we refer it wholly to you; declaring hereby, that upon such your resolution signified to the ministers of justice our warrant for their reprieve is determined, and the law to have the course. And now let us ask you, (for we are willing to husband time, and to despatch as much as may be under one message; God knows the distractions of this kingdom want a present remedy,) will there never be a time to offer to, as well as to ask of us? We will propose no more particulars to you, having no luck to please, or to be understood by you; take your own time for what concerns our particular: but be sure you have an early, speedy care of the public; that is, of the only rule that preserves the public, the law of the land; preserve the dignity and reverence due to that. It was well said in a speech, made by a private person; it was Mr. Pym's speech against the earl of Strafford, but published by order of the house of commons this parliament: the law is that which puts a difference betwixt good and evil, betwixt just and unjust. If you take away the law, all things will fall into a confusion, every man will become a law unto himself; which, in the depraved condition of human nature, must needs produce many great enormities. Lust will become a law, and envy will become a law; covetousness and ambition will become laws; and what dictates, what decisions, such laws will produce, may easily be discerned. So said that gentleman, and much more, very well, in defence of the law, and against arbitrary power. It is worth looking over, and considering: and if the most zealous defence of [the] true protestant profession, and the most resolved protection of the law, be the most necessary duty of a prince, we cannot believe this miserable distance and misunderstanding can be long continued between us; we having often and earnestly declared them to be the chiefest desires of our soul, and the end and rule of all our actions. For Ireland, we have sufficiently, and we hope satisfactorily, expressed to all our good subjects our hearty sense of that sad business, in our several messages in that argument, but especially in our last of the eighth of this month, concerning our resolution for that service; for the speedy, honourable, and full performance whereof, we

"conjure you to yield all possible assistance and present advice."

This answer was received with the usual circumstances of trouble and discontent, the taxation of evil counsellors and malignant persons about the king; and that clause about the condemned priests exceedingly displeased them; for by the king's reference of the matter entirely to them, he had removed the scandal from himself, and laid it at their doors; and though they were well content, and desirous, that they should have been executed by the king's warrant, for taking off his own reprove, (whereby they should have made him retract an act of his own mercy, and undeniably within his own power; and thereby have lessened much of the devotion of that people to him, when they should have seen him quit his power of preserving them in the least degree,) yet, for many reasons, they were not willing to take that harsh part upon themselves; and so those condemned priests were no more prosecuted, and were much safer under that reference for their execution, than they could have been, at that time, by a pardon under the great seal of England. For the other part of the answer concerning the magazine, it made no pause with them; but, within few days after, they sent a warrant to their own governor, sir John Hotham, to deliver it; and to their own admiral, the earl of Warwick, to transport it to London; which was, notwithstanding the king's inhibition, done accordingly. But they had at that time another message from the king, which was referred to in the last clause of that answer, and came to their hands some few days before, that gave them some serious trouble and apprehension; the grounds and reasons of which were these:

The king finding that, notwithstanding all the professions and protestations he could make, the business of Ireland was still unreasonably objected to him, as if he were not cordial in the suppressing that rebellion, sent a message to both houses:

"That being grieved at the very soul for the calamities of his good subjects of Ireland, and being most tenderly sensible of the false and scandalous reports dispersed amongst the people concerning the rebellion there; which not only wounded his majesty in honour, but likewise greatly retarded the reducing that unhappy kingdom, and multiplied the distractions at home, by weakening the mutual confidence between him and his people: out of his pious zeal to the honour of Almighty God, in establishing the true protestant profession in that kingdom, and his princely care for the good of all his dominions, he had firmly resolved to go with all convenient speed into Ireland, to chastise those wicked and detestable rebels, odious to God and all good men; thereby so to settle the peace of that kingdom, and the security of this, that the very name of fears and jealousies might be no more heard of amongst them.

"And he said, as he doubted not but his parliament would cheerfully give all possible assistance to this good work, so he required them, and all his loving subjects, to believe, that he would, upon those considerations, as earnestly pursue that design, not declining any hazard of his person in performing that duty, which he owed to the defence of God's true religion, and

"his distressed subjects, as he undertook it for those only ends; to the sincerity of which profession he called God to witness, with this further assurance, that he would never consent, upon whatsoever pretence, to a toleration of the popish profession there, or the abolition of the laws now in force against popish recusants in that kingdom.

"His majesty further advertised them, that, towards this work, he intended to raise forthwith, by his commission, in the counties near West Chester, a guard for his own person, (when he should come into Ireland,) consisting of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, which should be armed at West Chester, from his magazine at Hull; at which time, he said, all the officers and soldiers should take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance; the charge of raising and paying whereof, he desired the parliament to add to their former undertakings for that war; which he would not only well accept, but, if their pay should be found too great a burden to his good subjects, he would be willing, by the advice of his parliament, to sell, or pawn, any of his parks, lands, or houses, towards the supplies of the service of Ireland. With the addition of these levies to the former of English, and Scots, agreed upon in parliament, he said, he hoped so to appear in that action, that, by the assistance of Almighty God, that kingdom, in a short time, might be wholly reduced, and restored to peace, and some measure of happiness; whereby he might cheerfully return, to be welcomed home with the affections and blessings of all his good English people.

"Towards this good work, he said, as he had lately made despatches into Scotland, to quicken the levies there for Ulster, so he heartily wished, that his parliament would give all possible expedition to those, which they had resolved for Munster and Connaught; and hoped the encouragement, which the adventurers, of whose interests he would be always very careful, would hereby receive, would raise full sums of money for the doing thereof. He told them, that out of his earnest desire to remove all occasions, which did unhappily multiply misunderstandings between him and his parliament, he had likewise prepared a bill to be offered to them by his attorney concerning the militia; whereby he hoped the peace and safety of the kingdom might be fully secured to the general satisfaction of all men, without violation of his majesty's just rights, or prejudice to the liberty of the subject. If this should be thankfully received, he said, he should be glad of it; if refused, he must call God, and all the world, to judge on whose part the default was; only he required, if the bill should be approved of, that if any corporation should make their lawful rights appear, they might be reserved to them. He said, before he would part from England, he would take all due care to intrust such persons with such authority in his absence, as he should find to be requisite for the peace and safety of the kingdom, and the happy progress of the parliament."

They neither before nor after ever received any message from his majesty, that more discomposed them; and so much the more, because that which gave them most umbrage could not be publicly and safely avowed by them. For though, to those who had a due reverence to the king's person, and an impatient desire, that all misunderstandings might be composed, they urged, "the hazard and danger to his majesty's person, in such an expedition," and the increase of jealousies and distractions, "that would ensue in this kingdom by his absence;" and to others, as well those who from the barbarity, inhumanity, and unheard of cruelty, exercised by the rebels in Ireland upon the English protestants, (of which they every day received fresh and bleeding evidence,) had contracted a great animosity against the nation, and were persuaded that the work of extirpation was not so difficult as in truth it was; as to the adventurers, who had disbursed great sums of money, and had digested a full assurance of ample recompence, by confiscations and forfeitures; "that by this voyage of the king a peace would be in a short time concluded in that kingdom, to their great disadvantage and damage;" yet the true reasons, which surprised and startled them, were, that hereby the managing the war of Ireland would be taken out of their hands; and so, instead of having a nursery for soldiers of their own, which they might employ as they saw occasion; and a power of raising what money they pleased in this kingdom under that title, which they might dispose, as they found most fit for their affairs; the king would probably in a short time recover one entire kingdom to his obedience, by which he might be able to preserve the peace of the other two. However, working by the several impressions upon the several affections, they found it no difficult thing to persuade, almost an unanimous, aversion from approving the journey; they who usually opposed their advice not enduring to think of staying in England, where the power, at least for a time, would be in them, whose government, they knew, would be terrible, when his majesty should be in Ireland. And then they despatched a magisterial answer to the king, in which they told him:

"That the lords and commons in parliament had duly considered the message, received from his majesty, concerning his purpose of going into Ireland in his own person to prosecute the war there, with the bodies of his English subjects, levied, transported, and maintained at their charge; which he was pleased to propound to them, not as a matter, wherein he desired the advice of his parliament, but as already firmly resolved on, and forthwith to be put in execution, by granting out commissions for the levying of two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, for a guard for his person, when he should come into that kingdom; wherein they said, they could not but, with all reverence and humility to his majesty, observe, that he had declined his great council, the parliament, and varied from the usual course of his royal predecessors; that a business of so great importance concerning the peace and safety of all his subjects, and wherein they have a special interest, by his majesty's promise, and by those great sums, which they had disbursed, and for which they stood engaged, should be concluded, and undertaken, without their advice; whereupon, they said, they held it their duty to declare, that if, at that time, his majesty should go into Ireland, he would very much endanger the safety of his royal person and kingdoms, and of all other states professing the protestant religion in Christendom, and make way to the execution of that cruel and bloody design of the papists, every where to root out and destroy the reformed religion; as the Irish papists had, in a great part, effected in that kingdom; and, in all likelihood, would quickly be attempted in other places, if the consideration of the strength and union of the two nations of England and Scotland did not much hinder and discourage the execution of any such design. And that they might manifest to his majesty the danger and misery, which such a journey and enterprise would produce, they presented to his majesty the reasons of that their humble opinion and advice:

1. "His royal person would be subject, not only to the casualty of war, but to secret practices and conspiracies; especially his majesty continuing his profession to maintain the protestant religion in that kingdom, which the papists were generally bound by their vow to extirpate.

2. "It would exceedingly encourage the rebels; who did generally profess and declare, that his majesty did favour and allow their proceedings, and that this insurrection was undertaken by the warrant of his commission; and it would make good their expectation of great advantage, by his majesty's presence at that time, of so much distraction in this kingdom, whereby they might hope the two houses of parliament would be disabled to supply the war there, especially there appearing less necessity of his majesty's journey at that time, by reason of the manifold successes, which God had given against them.

3. "It would much hinder and impair the means whereby the war was to be supported, and increase the charge of it, and in both these respects make it more insupportable to the subject; and this, they said, they could confidently affirm; because many of the adventurers, who had already subscribed, did, upon the knowledge of his majesty's intention, declare their resolution not to pay in their money; and others, very willing to have subscribed, do now profess the contrary.

4. "His majesty's absence must necessarily very much interrupt the proceedings of parliament; and deprive his subjects of the benefit of those further acts of grace and justice, which they should humbly expect from his majesty for the establishing of a perfect union, and mutual confidence between his majesty and his people, and procuring and confirming the prosperity and happiness of both.

5. "It would exceedingly increase the fears and jealousies of his people; and render their doubts more probable, of some force intended, by some evil councils near his majesty, in opposition of the parliament, and favour of the malignant party of this kingdom.

6. "It would bereave his parliament of that advantage, whereby they were induced to undertake that war, upon his majesty's promise, that it should be managed by their advice; which could not be done, if his majesty, contrary to their counsels, should undertake to order and govern it in his own person.

Upon which, they said, they had resolved, by the full and concurrent agreement of both houses, that they could not, with discharge of their duty, consent to any levies or raising of soldiers to be "made by his majesty, for that his intended expedition into Ireland; or to the payment of any army, or soldiers there, but such as should be employed and governed according to their advice and direction: and that, if such levies should be made by any commission of his majesty's, not agreed to by both houses of parliament, they should be forced to interpret the same to be raised to the terror of his people, and disturbance of the public peace; and did hold themselves bound, by the laws of the kingdom, to apply the authority of parliament to suppress the same.

"And, they said, they did further most humbly declare, that if his majesty should by ill counsel be persuaded to go, contrary to that advice of his parliament, (which they hoped his majesty would not,) they did not, in that case, hold themselves bound to submit to any commissioners, which his majesty should choose; but did resolve to preserve and govern the kingdom, by the counsel and advice of parliament, for his majesty and his posterity, according to their allegiance, and the law of the land: wherefore they did most humbly pray, and advise his majesty, to desist from that his intended passage into Ireland, and from all preparation of men and arms tending thereunto; and to leave the managing of that war to his parliament, according to his promise made unto them, and his commission granted under his great seal of England, by advice of both houses; in prosecution whereof, by God's blessing, they had already made a prosperous entrance, by many defeats of the rebels, whereby they were much weakened and disheartened; and had no probable means of subsistence, if the proceedings of the two houses were not interrupted by that interruption of his majesty's journey: but they hoped, upon good grounds, that, within a short time, without hazard of his person, and so much dangerous confusion in his kingdoms, which must needs ensue, if he should proceed in that resolution, they should be enabled fully to vindicate his majesty's right, and authority in that kingdom; and punish those horrible, outrageous cruelties, which had been committed in the murdering and spoiling so many of his subjects; and to bring that realm to such a condition, as might be much to the advantage of his majesty and the crown, and the honour of his government, and contentment of his people: for the better and more speedy effecting whereof, they did again renew their humble desires of his return to his parliament; and that he would please to reject all counsels and apprehensions, which might any way derogate from that faithfulness and allegiance, which, in truth and sincerity, they had always borne and professed to his majesty, and should ever make good, to the uttermost, with their lives and fortunes."

This petition (the matter whereof finding a general concurrence, there was the least debate and contradiction upon the manner of expression) being sent to the king to York; and, in the mean time, all preparations being suspended for the necessary relief for Ireland, inasmuch as with the votes (which were presently printed) against the king's journey, there was likewise an order printed to discourage the adventurers from bringing in their money; the which, though it had no approbation from either house, and seemed to be angrily interpreted by them, and the printer was ordered to be found out and punished, yet did wholly stop that service; and by the no-inquiry, or punishment of that boldness, appeared to be done by design; his majesty speedily returned this answer:

"That he was so troubled, and astonished to find that unexpected reception and misunderstanding of his message concerning his Irish journey, that (being so much disappointed of the approbation and thanks he looked for to that declaration) he had great cause to doubt, whether it were in his power to say or do any thing, which would not fall within the like interpretation: but he said, as he had, in that message, called God to witness the sincerity of the profession of his only ends for the undertaking that journey; so he must appeal to all his good subjects, and the whole world, whether the reasons alleged against that journey were of weight to satisfy his understanding; or the counsel, presented to dissuade him from it, were full of that duty, as was like to prevail over his affections. For the resolving of so great a business without the advice of his parliament, he said, he must remember, how often, by his messages, he made the same offer, if they should advise him thereunto; to which they never gave him the least answer; but, in their late declaration, told him, that they were not to be satisfied with words: so that he had reason to conceive, they rather avoided, out of regard to his person, to give him counsel to run that hazard, than that they disapproved the inclination. And, he asked them, what greater comfort or security the protestants of Christendom could receive, than by seeing a protestant king venture, and engage his person for the defence of that religion, and the suppression of popery? to which he solemnly protested, in that message, never to grant a toleration, upon what pretence soever, or an abolition of any of the laws there in force against the professors of it. And, he said, when he considered the great calamities, and unheard of cruelties, his poor protestant subjects in that kingdom had undergone for the space of near, or full six months; the growth and increase of the strength of those barbarous rebels; and the evident probability of foreign supplies, if they were not speedily suppressed; the very slow succours hitherto sent them from hence: that the officers of several regiments, who had long time been allowed entertainment for that service, had not raised any supply or succour for that kingdom; that many troops of horse had long lain near Chester untransported; that the lord lieutenant of Ireland, on whom he relied principally for the conduct and managing of affairs there, was still in this kingdom, notwithstanding his majesty's earnestness expressed, that he should repair to his command: and when he considered the many and great scandals raised upon himself by report of the rebels, and not sufficiently discountenanced here, notwithstanding so many professions of his majesty; and had seen a book, lately printed by the order of the house of commons, entitled, A Remonstrance of divers remarkable Passages concerning the Church and Kingdom of Ireland, wherein some examinations were set down, (how improbable or impossible soever,) which might make an impression in the minds of many of his weak subjects: and, lastly, when he had duly

"weighed the dishonour which would perpetually lie upon this kingdom, if full and speedy relief were not despatched thither; his majesty could not think of a better way to discharge his duty to Almighty God, for the defence of the true protestant religion, or to manifest his affection to his three kingdoms, for their preservation, than by engaging his person in that expedition, as many of his royal progenitors had done, even in foreign parts, upon causes of less importance and piety, with great honour to themselves, and advantage to this kingdom. And therefore he expected at least thanks for such his inclination.

"For the danger to his person, he said, he conceived it necessary, and worthy of a king, to adventure his life to preserve his kingdom; neither could it be imagined, that he would sit still, and suffer his kingdoms to be lost, and his good protestant subjects to be massacred, without exposing his own person to the utmost hazard for their relief and preservation; his life, when it was most pleasant, being nothing so precious to him, as it was, and should be, to govern and preserve his people with honour and justice.

"For any encouragement to the rebels, because of the reports they raised, he said, he could not conceive, that the rebels were capable of a greater terror, than by the presence of their lawful king, in the head of an army, to chastise them. Besides, it would be an unspeakable advantage to them, if any report of theirs could hinder him from doing any thing, which were fit for him to do, if such report were not raised: that would quickly teach them, in this jealous age, to prevent, by such reports, any other persons coming against them, whom they had no mind should be employed.

"He told them, he marvelled, that the adventurers, whose advantage was a principal motive (next the reasons before mentioned) to him, should so much mistake his purpose; whose interest he conceived must be much improved by the expedition he hoped, by God's blessing, to use in that service; that being the most probable way for the speedy conquest of the rebels, their lands were sufficiently secured by act of parliament.

"He told them, he thought himself not kindly used, that the addition of so few men to their levies (for a guard to his person in Ireland) should be thought fit for their refusal; and much more, that having used so many cautions in that message, both in the smallness of the number; in his having raised none, until their answer; in their being to be raised only near the place of shipping; in their being there to be armed, and that not till they were ready to be shipped; in the provision, by the oaths, that none of them should be papists, (all which were sufficient to destroy all grounds of jealousy of any force intended by them in opposition to the parliament, or favour to any malignant party,) any suspicion should, notwithstanding, be grounded upon it.

"Neither, he said, could it be understood, that, when he recommended the managing of that war to them, that he intended to exclude himself, or not to be concerned in their counsels, that if he found any expedient, (which, in his conscience and understanding, he thought necessary for that great work,) he might not put it in practice. He told them, he looked upon them as his great

"council, whose advice he always had, and would, with great regard and deliberation, weigh and consider: but he looked upon himself as neither deprived of his understanding, or divested of any right he had, if there were no parliament sitting. He said, he called them together by his own writ and authority (without which they could not have met) to give him faithful counsel about his great affairs; but he resigned not up his own interest and freedom; he never subjected himself to their absolute determination; he had always weighed their counsels, as proceeding from a council intrusted by him; and when he had dissented from them, he had returned them the reasons, which had prevailed with his conscience and understanding, with that candour, which a prince should use towards his subjects; and that affection, which a father could express to his children. What application had been used to rectify his understanding by reasons, or what motives had been given to persuade his affections, he would leave all the world to judge. And then, he said, he must tell them, howsoever a major part might bind them in matter of opinion, he held himself (and he was sure the law and constitution of the kingdom had always held the same) as free to dissent, till his reason [was] convinced for the general good, as if they had delivered no opinion.

"For his journey itself, he told them the circumstances of their petition were such, as he knew not well what answer to return, or whether he were best to give any; that part which pretended to carry reason with it did no way satisfy him; the other, which was rather reprehension and menace, than advice, could not stagger him. His answer therefore was, that he should be very glad to find the work of Ireland so easy as they seemed to think it; which did not so appear by any thing known to him, when he sent his message: and though he would never refuse, or be unwilling, to venture his person for the good and safety of his people, he was not so weary of his life, as to hazard it impertinently; and therefore, since they seemed to have received advertisements of some late and great successes in that kingdom, he would stay some time to see the event of those, and not pursue his resolution till he had given them a second notice: but, if he found the miserable condition of his poor subjects of that kingdom were not speedily relieved, he would, with God's assistance, visit them with succours as his particular credit and interest could supply him with, if they refused to join with him. And he doubted not but the levies he should make (in which he would observe punctually the former, and all other cautions, as might best prevent all fears and jealousies; and to use no power but what was legal) would be so much to the satisfaction of his subjects, as no person would dare presume to resist his commands; and if they should, at their peril [be it]. In the mean time, he hoped his forwardness, so remarkable to that service, should be notorious to all the world; and that all scandals, laid on him in that business, should be clearly wiped away.

"He told them, he had been so careful that his journey into Ireland should not interrupt the proceedings of parliament, nor deprive his subjects of any acts of justice, or further acts of grace, for the real benefit of his people, that he had made a free offer of leaving such power behind,

"as should not only be necessary for the peace and safety of the kingdom, but fully provide for the happy progress of the parliament : and therefore he could not but wonder, since such power had been always left here, by commission, for the government of this kingdom, when his progenitors had been out of the same, during the sitting of parliaments; and since themselves desired that such a power might be left here by his majesty, at his last going into Scotland; what law of the land they had now found to dispense with them from submitting to such authority, legally derived from him, in his absence; and to enable them to govern the kingdom by their own mere authority.

"For his return to London, he said, he had given them so full answers in his late declaration, and answers that he knew not what to add, if they would not provide for his security with them, nor agree to remove to another place, where there might not be the same danger to his majesty. He told them, he expected, that (since he had been so particular in the causes and grounds of his fears) they should have sent him word, that they had published such declarations against future tumults and unlawful assemblies, and taken such courses for the suppressing seditious pamphlets and sermons, that his fears of that kind might be laid aside, before they should press his return.

"To conclude, he told them, he could wish, that they would, with the same strictness and severity, weigh and examine their messages and expressions to him, as they did those they received from him. For he was very confident, that if they examined his rights and privileges, by what his predecessors had enjoyed; and their own addresses, by the usual courses observed by their ancestors; they would find many expressions in that petition, warranted only by their own authority; which indeed he forbore to take notice of, or to give answer to, lest he should be tempted, in a just indignation, to express a greater passion, than he was yet willing to put on. God in his good time, he hoped, would so inform the hearts of all his subjects, that he should recover from the mischief and danger of that distemper; on whose good pleasure, he said, he would wait with all patience and humility."

And from this time the purpose was never resumed of his majesty's personal expedition into Ireland, and so they were freed from that apprehension. The truth is, that counsel for his majesty's journey into Ireland was very suddenly taken, and communicated to very few, without consideration of the objections, that would naturally arise against it; and was rather resolved as a probable stratagem, to compose the two houses to a better temper and sobriety, upon the apprehension of the king's absence from them, and the inconveniences that might thence ensue, than sufficiently considered and digested for execution. For none were more violent against it than they who served the king most faithfully in the houses; who, in the king's absence, and after such a grant of the militia, as was then offered, looked upon themselves as sacrificed to the pride and fury of those, whose inclinations and temper had begot the confusions they complained of. But if it had been so duly weighed and consulted, and men so disposed, that it might have been executed, and the king [had] taken a fit council and retinue about him, it would at that time have been no hard matter speedily to have reduced Ireland; and, by the reputation and authority of that, the other two kingdoms might have been contained within their proper bounds. But, as it fell out, the overture proved disadvantageous to the king, and gave the other party new cause of triumph, that they had plainly threatened him out of what he pretended to have firmly resolved to do; which disadvantage was improved by the other proposition, that attended it, concerning the militia. For the bill, sent by the king upon that argument, brought the business again into debate; and, though nothing was concluded upon it, the king was a loser by the proposition, though not so much as he feared he should have been, when he saw his journey into Ireland desperate; upon the supposition of which, he had only made that tender.

The bill sent by the king, and preferred to the house of peers, by the attorney general, granted the militia, for one year, to the persons first nominated by the houses in their ordinance to his majesty; and made those persons, in the execution of that trust, subject to the authority of his majesty and the two houses jointly, whilst his majesty was within the kingdom; and, in his absence, of the two houses only. What alterations and amendments they made in it before they returned it again for the royal assent, will best appear by the king's answer, which he sent to them at the time of his refusal to pass it; which was, "That he had, with great deliberation and patience, weighed and considered (as it concerned him much to weigh the consequences of every law before he passed it) their bill lately sent to him for the settling the militia; and though it had not been usual to give any reason for the refusal to pass any bill, it being absolutely in his power to pass, or not pass, any act sent to him, if he conceived it prejudicial to himself, or inconvenient to his subjects, for whom he was trusted, and must one day give an account; yet, in that business of the militia, which, being misunderstood amongst his good subjects, had been used as an argument, as if he were not vigilant enough for the public safety, and lest he should be thought less constant in his resolutions, and that bill to be the same he had sent to them, he thought fit to give them, and all the world, particular satisfaction, why he could not, ought not, must not pass that bill, being the first public bill he had refused this parliament: and therefore, he told them, he must complain, that having expressed himself so clearly and particularly to them in that point, they should press any thing upon him, which they could not but foresee that he must refuse; except he departed from those resolutions, grounded upon so much reason, he had so earnestly before acquainted them with, and against which they had not given one argument to satisfy his judgment.

"He told them, he was pleased they had declined the unwarrantable course of their ordinance, (to the which, he was confident, his good subjects would never have yielded their consent,) and chosen that only right way of imposing upon the people, which he would have allowed but for the reasons following:

"He said, he had refused to consent to their

" ordinance, as for other things, so for that the power was put into the persons nominated therein by direction of both houses of parliament, excluding his majesty from any power in the disposition or execution of it together with them: he had then advised them, for many reasons, that a bill should be prepared; and after, in his answer of the 26th of March to the petition of both houses, he had told them, if such a bill should be prepared with that due regard to his majesty, and care of his people, in the limitation of the power, and other circumstances, he should recede from nothing he formerly expressed.

" What passed (enough to have discouraged him from being further solicitous in that argument) after his full and gracious answers, he was content to forget. When he resolved [on] his journey into Ireland, so that, by reason of his absence, there might be no want of settling that power; besides complying with their fears, he sent, together with a message of that his purpose, a bill for the settling the power for a year; hoping in that time to return to them, and being sure that, in much less time, they might do the business, for which at first they seemed to desire this; which was, that they might securely consider his message of the 20th of January last. By that bill, which he sent, he consented to those names they proposed in their ordinance, and in the limitation of the power; provided, that himself should not be able to execute any thing but by their advice; and, when he should be out of the kingdom, the sole execution to be in them; with many other things, of so arbitrary and uncircumscribed a power, that he should not have consented to, but with reference to the absence of his own person out of the kingdom; and thought it the more sufferable, in respect the time was but for a year. Whether that bill, they had sent to him to pass, were the same, the world would judge.

" He said, they had, by that bill tendered to his majesty, without taking notice of him, put the power of the whole kingdom, the life and liberties of the subjects of all degrees and qualities, into the hands of particular men, for two years. He asked them, if they could imagine he would trust such an absolute power in the hands of particular persons, which he had refused to commit to both houses of parliament? Nay, if the power itself were not too absolute, too unlimited, to be committed into any private hands? Whether sir John Hotham's high insolence shewed him not, what he might expect from an exorbitant legal power, when he, by a power not warranted by law, durst venture upon a treasonable disobedience? But his majesty would willingly know, and indeed such an account in ordinary civility, he said, he might have expected, why he was, by that act, absolutely excluded from any power, or authority, in the execution of the militia. He said, sure their fears and jealousies were not of such a nature, as were capable of no other remedy, than by leaving him no power in a point of the greatest importance; in which God, and the law, had trusted him solely, and which he had been contented to share with them by his own bill, by putting it, and a greater, into the hands of particular subjects. He asked them, what all Christian princes would think of him after he had passed such a bill?

" How they would value his sovereignty? And yet, he said, sure his reputation with foreign princes was some ground of their security. Nay, he was confident, by that time they had thoroughly considered the possible consequence of that bill, upon themselves, and the rest of his good subjects, they would all give him thanks for not consenting to it; finding their condition, if it should have passed, would not have been so pleasing to them. He told them, he hoped that animadversion would be no breach of their privileges. In that throng of business and distemper of affections, it was possible, second thoughts might present somewhat to their considerations, which escaped them before.

" He remembered them, that he had passed a bill this parliament, at their entreaty, concerning the captives of Algiers, and waved many objections of his own to the contrary, upon information that the business had been many months considered by them; whether it proved suitable to their intentions, or whether they had not, by some private orders, suspended that act of parliament upon view of the mistakes, themselves best knew; as likewise, what other alterations they had made upon other bills, passed this session. He told them, he could not pass over the putting their names out of that bill, whom before they had recommended to him in their ordinance, not thinking fit, it seemed, to trust those who would obey no guide but the law of the land, (he imagined they would not wish he should in his estimation of others follow that their rule,) and the leaving out, by special provision, the present lord mayor of London, as a person in their disfavour; whereas, he said, he must tell them, his demeanour had been such, that the city, and the whole kingdom, was beholding to him for his example.

" To conclude, he said, he did not find himself possessed of such an excess of power, that it was fit to transfer, or consent it should be in other persons, as was directed by that bill; and therefore he should rely upon that royal right and jurisdiction, which God and the law had given him, for the suppressing of rebellion, and resisting foreign invasion; which had preserved the kingdom in the time of all his ancestors, and which he doubted not but he should be able to execute. And, not more for his own honour and right, than for the liberty and safety of his people, he could not consent to pass that bill."

Though no sober man could deny the reasonableness of that answer, and that there was indeed so great a difference between the bill sent by his majesty, and that presented to him from the two houses, that it could not soberly be imagined he would consent to it; yet, it had been better for his majesty, that that overture had never been made; it giving new life, spirit, and hopes to them; and they making the people believe (who understood not the difference, and knew not that the king's pleasure, signified by both houses of parliament, was the pleasure of both houses without the king) that his majesty now refused to consent to what himself had offered and proposed; whilst his own party (for so those began now to be called, who preserved their duty and allegiance entire) was as much troubled to find so sovereign a power of the crown offered to be parted with to the two houses, as was tendered to them by the king's own bill; and that it was possible for his majesty to recede from his firmest resolves, even in a point that would not naturally admit of the least division or diminution.

The king, being well pleased that he had gone through one of his resolutions, and not much troubled at the anger and trouble it had produced, and finding his court full of persons of quality of the country, who made all expressions of affection and duty, which they thought would be most acceptable to him, he resolved to undertake another enterprise, which was of more importance, and which in truth was the sole motive of his journey into those parts. The great magazine of arms and ammunition, which was left upon the disbanding the army, remained still at Hull, and was a nobler proportion than remained in the Tower of London, or all other his majesty's stores; and there had been formerly a purpose to have secured the same by the earl of Newcastle's presence there, which had been disappointed, as hath been before mentioned, and sir John Hotham sent thither to look to it; who was now there only with one of the companies of the trained bands: and so the king resolved that he would himself make a journey thither, with his own usual train; and being there, that he would stay there, till he had secured the place to him. This was his purpose; which he concealed to that degree, that very few about him knew any thing of it.

As soon as it was known that his majesty meant to reside in York, it was easily suspected, that he had an eye upon the magazine; and therefore they made an order in both houses, "That the magazine should be removed from Hull to the Tower;" and ships were making ready for the transportation; so that his majesty could no longer defer the execution of what he designed. And, being persuaded, by some who believed themselves, that, if he went thither, it would neither be in sir John Hotham's will, or his power, to keep him out of that town; and that, being possessed of so considerable a port, and of the magazine there, (which the houses had ordered to be speedily sent to London,) he should find a better temper towards a modest and dutiful treaty; his majesty took the opportunity of a petition presented to him by the gentlemen of Yorkshire, (who in truth were much troubled at the order for removing the magazine from Hull; and were ready to appear in any thing for his service,) by which "they desired him to cast his eyes and thoughts upon the safety of his own person, and his princely issue, and that whole county; a great means whereof, they said, did consist in the arms and ammunition at Hull, placed there by his princely care and charge; and since, upon general apprehensions of dangers from foreign parts, thought fit to be continued: and they did very earnestly beseech him, that he would take such course, that it might still remain there, for the better securing those, and the rest of the northern parts." Hereupon he resolved to go thither himself; and, the night before, he sent his son the duke of York, who was lately arrived from Richmond, accompanied with the prince elector, thither, with some other persons of honour; who knew no more, than that it was a journey given to the pleasure and curiosity of the duke. Sir John Hotham received them with that duty and civility that became him. The next morning early, the king took horse from York; and, attended with two or three hundred of his servants, and gentlemen of the country, rode thither; and, when he came within a mile of the town, sent a gentleman to sir John Hotham, "to let him know that the king would that day dine with him;" with which he was strangely surprised, or seemed to be so.

It was then reported, and was afterwards averred by himself to some friends, that he had received the night before advertisement, from a person very near to, and very much trusted by his majesty, of the king's purpose of coming thither, and that there was a resolution of hanging him, or cutting his throat as soon as he was in the town.

The man was of a fearful nature, and perplexed understanding, and could better resolve upon deliberation than on a sudden; and many were of opinion, that if he had been prepared dexterously beforehand, and in confidence, he would have conformed to the king's pleasure; for he was master of a noble fortune in land, and rich in money; of a very ancient family, and well allied; his affections to the government very good; and no man less desired to see the nation involved in a civil war, than he: and, when he accepted this employment from the parliament, he never imagined it would engage him in rebellion; but believed, that the king would find it necessary to comply with the advice of his two houses; and that the preserving that magazine from being possessed by him, would likewise prevent any possible rupture into arms. He was now in great confusion; and calling some of the chief magistrates, and other officers, together to consult, they persuaded him, not to suffer the king to enter into the town. And his majesty coming within an hour after his messenger, found the gates shut, and the bridges drawn, and the walls manned; all things being in a readiness for the reception of an enemy. Sir John Hotham himself from the walls, with several professions of duty, and many expressions of fear, telling his majesty, "that he durst not open the gates, being trusted by the parliament;" the king told him, "that he believed he had no order from the parliament to shut the gates against him, or to keep him out of the town." He replied, "that his train was so great, that if it were admitted, he should not be able to give a good account of the town." Whereupon the king offered "to enter with twenty horse only, and that the rest should stay without." The which the other refusing, the king desired him "to come to him, that he might confer with him, upon his princely word of safety, and liberty to return." And when he excused himself likewise from that, his majesty told him, "that as this act of his was unparalleled, so it would produce some notable effect; that it was not possible for him to sit down by such an indignity, but that he would immediately proclaim him traitor, and proceed against him as such; that this disobedience of his would probably bring many miseries upon the kingdom, and much loss of blood; all which might be prevented, if he performed the duty of a subject; and therefore advised him to think sadly of it, and to prevent the necessary growth of so many calamities, which must lie all upon his conscience." The gentleman, with much distraction in his looks, talked confusedly of "the "trust he had from the parliament;" then fell on his knees, and wished, "that God would bring confusion upon him, and his, if he were not a loyal and faithful subject to his majesty;" but, in conclusion, plainly denied to suffer his majesty to come into the town. Whereupon, the king caused him immediately to be proclaimed a traitor; which the other received with some expressions of undutifulness and contempt. And so the king, after the duke of York, and prince elector, with their retinue, were come out of the town, where they were kept some hours, was forced to retire that night to Beverly, four miles from that place; and so the next day returned to York, full of trouble and indignation for the affront he had received; which he foresaw would produce a world of mischief.

The king sent an express to the two houses, with a message, declaring what had passed; and, "that sir John Hotham had justified his treason and disloyalty, by pretence of an order and trust from them; which as he could not produce, so, his majesty was confident, they would not own; but would be highly sensible of the scandal he had laid upon them, as well as of his disloyalty to his majesty. And therefore he demanded justice of them against him, according to law." The houses had heard before of the king's going out of York thither, and were in terrible apprehension that he had possessed himself of the town; and that sir John Hotham, (for they were not confident of him, as of a man of their own faith,) by promises or menaces, had given up the place to him; and, with this apprehension, they were exceedingly dejected: but when they heard the truth, and found that Hull was still in their hands, they were equally exalted, magnifying their trusty governor's faith, and fidelity against the king. In the mean time, the gentlemen of the north expressed a marvellous sense and passion on his majesty's behalf; and offered to raise the force of the county to take the town by force. But the king chose, for many reasons, to send again to the houses another message, in which he told them,

"That he was so much concerned in the undutiful affront (an indignity all his good subjects must disdain in his behalf) he had received from sir John Hotham at Hull, that he was impatient till he received justice from them; and was compelled to call again for an answer, being confident, however they had been so careful, though without his consent, to put a garrison into that his town, to secure it and his magazine against any attempt of the papists, that they never intended to dispose and maintain it against him, their sovereign. Therefore he required them forthwith (for the business would admit no delay) that they took some speedy course, that his said town and magazine might be immediately delivered up unto him; and that such severe exemplary proceedings, should be against those persons, who had offered that insupportable affront and injury to him, as by the law was provided; and, till that should be done, he would intend no business whatsoever, other than the business of Ireland. For, he said, if he were brought into a condition so much worse than any of his subjects, that, whilst they all enjoyed their privileges, and might not have their possessions disturbed, or their titles questioned, he only might be spoiled, thrown out of his towns,

"and his goods taken from him, it was time to examine how he had lost those privileges; and to try all possible ways, by the help of God, the law of the land, and the affection of his good subjects, to recover them, and to vindicate himself from those injuries; and, if he should miscarry therein, he should be the first prince of this kingdom that had done so, having no other end but to defend the true protestant religion, the law of the land, and the liberty of the subject; and he desired God so to deal with him, as he continued in those resolutions."

Instead of any answer to his majesty upon these two messages, or sadly considering how this breach might be made up, they immediately publish (together with a declaration of their former jealousies of the papists; of the malignant party; of the lord Digby's letter intercepted; of the earl of Newcastle's being sent thither, upon which they had first sent down a governor, and put a garrison into Hull) several votes and resolutions, by which they declared,

"That sir John Hotham had done nothing but in obedience to the command of both houses of parliament, and that the declaring of him a traitor, being a member of the house of commons, was a high breach of the privilege of parliament, and, being without due process of law, was against the liberty of the subject, and against the law of the land."

And hearing at the same time, that a letter, coming from Hull to them the night after the king's being there, had been intercepted by some of his majesty's servants, they declared, "that all such intercepting of any letters sent to them, was a high breach of the privilege of parliament, which by the laws of the kingdom, and the protestation, they were bound to defend with their lives, and their fortunes, and to bring the violator thereof to condign punishment." Then they ordered, that the sheriffs and justices of the peace of the counties of York and Lincoln, and all others his majesty's officers, should suppress all forces, that should be raised or gathered together in those counties, either to force the town of Hull, or stop the passages to and from the same, or in any other way to disturb the peace of the kingdom. All which votes, orders, and declarations, being printed, and diligently dispersed throughout the kingdom before any address made to his majesty in answer of his messages, and coming to his view, the king published an answer to those votes and declarations, in which he said:

"Since his gracious messages to both houses of parliament, demanding justice for the high and unheard of affront offered unto him, at the gates of Hull, by sir John Hotham, was not thought worthy of an answer; but that, instead thereof, they had thought fit, by their printed votes, to own and avow that unparalleled act to be done in obedience to the command of both houses of parliament, (though at that time he could produce no such command,) and, with other resolutions against his proceedings there, to publish a declaration concerning that business, as an appeal to the people, and as if their intercourse with his majesty, and for his satisfaction, were now to no more purpose; though he knew that course of theirs to be very unagreeable to the modesty and duty of former times, and unwarrantable by any precedents, but what themselves had made; yet,

" he was not unwilling to join issue with them in " that way, and to let all the world know, how
 " necessary, just, and lawful all his proceedings " had been in that point, and that the defence of " those proceedings was the defence of the law of " the land, of the liberty, and property of the sub" ject; and that by the same rule of justice, which " was now offered to him, all the private interest
 " and title of all his good subjects to all their lands
 " and goods was confounded and destroyed. He " remembered them, that Mr. Pym had said in his " speech against the earl of Strafford, (which was " published by order of the commons' house,) the " law is the safeguard, the custody of all private " interest; your honours, your lives, your liberties,
 " and estates are all in the keeping of the law;
 " without this every man hath a like right to any " thing. And he said, he would fain be answered
 " what title any subject of his kingdom had to his " house or land, that he had not to his town of " Hull? or what right any subject had to his " money, plate, or jewels, that his majesty had not
 " to his magazine or munition there? If he had " ever such a title, he said he would know when " he lost it? And if that magazine and munition, " bought with his own money, were ever his, when
 " and how that property went out of him? He " very well knew the great and unlimited power of " a parliament; but he knew as well, that it was " only in that sense, as he was a part of that par" liament; without him, and against his consent,
 " the votes of either or both houses together must " not, could not, should not (if he could help it,
 " for his subjects' sake, as well as his own) forbid
 " any thing that was enjoined by the law, or en-
 " join any thing that was forbidden by the law.
 " But in any such alteration, which might be for " the peace and happiness of the kingdom, he had " not, should not refuse to consent. And he " doubted not, but that all his good subjects would " easily discern, in what a miserable insecurity and " confusion they must necessarily and inevitably be,
 " if descents might be altered; purchases avoided;
 " assurances and conveyances cancelled; the sove" reign legal authority despised, and resisted by " votes, or orders of either or both houses. And
 " this, he said, he was sure, was his case at Hull;
 " and as it was his this day, by the same rule, it " might be theirs to-morrow.

" Against any desperate design of the papists, of " which they discoursed so much, he had suffi" ciently expressed his zeal and intentions; and " should be as forward to adventure his own life
 " and fortune, to oppose any such designs, as the " meanest subject in his kingdom.

" For the malignant party, he said, as the law
 " had not, to [his] knowledge, defined their con" dition, so neither house had presented them to " his majesty, under such a notion, as he might " well understand, whom they intended; and he " should therefore only inquire after and avoid the " malignant party, under the character of persons
 " disaffected to the peace and government of the " kingdom, and such who, neglecting and despis-
 " ing the law of the land, had given themselves
 " other rules to walk by, and so dispensed with " their obedience to authority; of those persons, as " destructive to the commonwealth, he should take
 " all possible caution.

" Why any letters intercepted from the lord
 " Digby, wherein he mentioned a retreat to a place " of safety, should hinder him from visiting his own

 " fort, and how he had opposed any ways of ac" commodation with his parliament, and what ways
 " and overtures had been offered in any way, or
 " like any desire of such accommodation; or whe" ther his message of the twentieth of January
 " last, so often in vain pressed by him, had not " sufficiently expressed his earnest desire of it, he " said, all the world should judge; neither was it " in the power of any persons to incline him to " take arms against his parliament and his good
 " subjects, and miserably to embroil the kingdom
 " in civil wars. He had given sufficient evidence " to the world how much his affections abhorred,
 " and how much his heart did bleed at, the appre" hension of a civil war. And, he said, God and " the world must judge, if his care and industry
 " were [not], only to defend and protect the " liberty of the subject, the law of the kingdom,
 " his own just rights, (part of that law,) and his " honour, much more precious than his life: and " if, in opposition to these, any civil war should " arise, upon whose account the blood, and de" struction that must follow, must be cast: God,
 " and his own conscience, told him, that he was " clear.

" For captain Leg's being sent heretofore to " Hull, or for the earl of Newcastle's being sent " thither by his warrant and authority, he said, he " had asked a question long ago, in his answer to " both houses concerning the magazine at Hull,
 " which, he had cause to think, was not easy to be " answered; why the general rumour of the de" sign of papists, in the northern parts, should not " be thought sufficient ground for his majesty to " put in such a person of honour, fortune, and un" blemished reputation, as the earl of Newcastle was " known to be, into a town and fort of his own,
 " where his own magazine lay; and yet the same
 " rumour be warrant enough to commit the same
 " town and fort, without his consent, to the hands " of sir John Hotham, with such a power as was " now too well known, and understood? How his " refusal to have that magazine removed, upon the " petition of both houses, could give any advan" tage against him, to have it taken from him, and
 " whether it was a refusal, all men would easily " understand, who read his answer to that peti" tion; to which it had not been yet thought fit to " make any reply.

" For the condition of those persons, who pre" sented the petition to him at York (whom that " declaration called, some few ill-affected persons
 " about the city of York) to continue the magazine
 " at Hull; he said, he made no doubt, but that " petition would appear to be attested, both in " number and weight, by persons of honour and
 " integrity, and much more conversant with the " affections of the whole country, than most of " those petitions, which had been received with so " much consent and approbation. And for their " presumption of interposing their advice, his ma" jesty the more wondered at that exception, when " such encouragement had been given, and thanks
 " declared to multitudes of mean, unknown people,
 " apprentices, and porters, who had accompanied
 " petitions of very strange natures.

" For the manner of his going to Hull, he said,
 " he had clearly set forth the same, in his message
 " to both houses of that business; and for any in" telligence given to sir John Hotham of an inten"tion to deprive him of his life, as he knew there was no such intention in him, having given him all possible assurance of the same, at his being there, so he was confident, no such intelligence was given, or if it were, it was by some villain, who had nothing but malice or design to fright him from his due obedience, to warrant him; and sir John Hotham had all the reason to assure himself, that his life would be in much more danger by refusing to admit his king into his own town and fort, than by yielding him that obedience, which he owed by his oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and the protestation, which he knew was due and warrantable, by the laws of the land. For the number of his attendants, though that could be no warrant for such a disobedience in a subject, he said, it was well known (as his majesty had expressed in his message to both houses, to which credit ought to have been given) that he offered to go into the town with twenty horse only, his whole train being unarmed; and whosoever thought that too great an attendance for his majesty and his two sons, had sure an intention to bring him to a meaner retinue, than they would yet avow.

"Here then, he said, was his case, of which all the world should judge: his majesty endeavoured to visit a town and fort of his own, wherein his own magazine lay: a subject, in defiance of him, shuts the gates against him; with armed men resists, denies, and opposes his entrance; tells him, in plain terms, he should not come in. He said, he did not pretend to understand much law, yet, in the point of treason, he had had much learning taught him this parliament; and if the sense of the statute of the 25th year of Edward III. chap. 2. were not very differing from the letter, sir John Hotham's act was no less than plain high treason: and he had been contemptibly stupid, if he had, after all those circumstances of grace and favour then shewed to him, made any scruple to proclaim him traitor. And whether he were so, or no, if he would render himself, his majesty would require no other trial, than that which the law had appointed to every subject, and which he was confident he had not, in the least degree, violated in those proceedings; no more than he had done the privilege of parliament, by endeavouring, in a just way, to challenge his own unquestionable privileges. For that, in such case, the declaring him traitor, being a member of the house of commons, without process of law, should be a breach of privilege of parliament, (of which he was sure none extended to treason, felony, or breach of peace,) against the liberty of the subject, or against the law of the land, he must have other reasons than bare votes. He said, he would know if sir John Hotham had, with the forces by which he kept him out of his town of Hull, pursued him to the gates of York, which he might as legally have done, whether his majesty must have staid from declaring him traitor till process of law might have issued against him? Would fears and jealousies dispense with necessary and real forms? And must his majesty, when actual war is levied upon him, observe forms which the law itself doth not enjoin? The case, he said, was truly stated, let all the world judge (unless the mere sitting of a parliament did suspend all laws, and

"his majesty was the only person in England against whom treason could not be committed) where the fault was; and whatsoever course he should be driven to for the vindication of that his privilege, and for the recovery and maintenance of his known undoubted rights, he doth promise, in the presence of Almighty God, and as he hopes for his blessing in his success, that he would, to the utmost of his powers, defend and maintain the true protestant profession, the law of the land, the liberty of the subject, and the just privilege and freedom of parliament.

"For the order of assistance given to the committee of both houses, concerning their going to Hull, he said, he should say no more, but that those persons, named in that order, he presumed, would give no commands, or his good subjects obey other, than what were warranted by the law, (how large the directions are, or the instructions might be,) for to that rule he should apply his own actions, and by it require an account from other men; and that all his good subjects might the better know their duty in matters of this nature, he wished them carefully to peruse the statute of the eleventh year of king Henry VII. ch. 1. He said, he would conclude with Mr. Pym's own words: If the prerogative of the king overwhelm the liberty of the people, it will be turned to tyranny; if liberty undermine the prerogative, it would grow into anarchy."

Besides their declaration, votes, and orders in the justification of sir John Hotham, for his better encouragement, and for a ground of his son's residence at Hull, in whom they had in truth a firmer confidence than in the father, they ordered, "That if, by any force or accident, sir John Hotham should lose his life, or otherwise die in that service, that his son should succeed him in the government;" and having thus declared themselves, they thought fit at last to send some particular answer to the king upon that business; which they were the rather inclined to do, that under that pretence they might send down a committee of their own to reside at York: whereby they might receive constant animadversions of what happened, and what was designed, and their friends and dependents in that large, populous, and rich county, be the better confirmed in their affections and devotions to them; and, to that purpose, they sent down the lord Howard of Escrick, the lord Fairfax, sir Hugh Cholmely, (a fast friend to sir John Hotham,) sir Philip Stapleton, who had likewise married Hotham's daughter, and sir Harry Cholmely, who presented their answer in writing to his majesty; the which, being of a mould unusual, and a dialect higher and rougher than even themselves had yet used, I have thought fit to insert in the same words it was delivered; thus:

"Your majesty may be pleased to understand, that we, your great council, finding manifold evidences of the wicked counsels and practices of some in near trust and authority about you, to put the kingdom into a combustion, by drawing your majesty into places of strength, remote from “ your parliament, and by exciting your people to commotions, under pretence of serving your majesty against your parliament, lest this malignant party, by the advantage of the town and magazine of Hull, should be enabled to go through with their mischievous intentions, did, in discharge of the great trust that lies upon us, and by that power which in cases of this nature resides in us, command the town of Hull to be secured by a garrison of the adjoining trained band, under the government of sir John Hotham; requiring him to keep the same for the service of your majesty and the kingdom: wherein we have done nothing contrary to your royal sovereignty in that town, or legal propriety in the magazine.

“ Upon consideration of sir John Hotham's proceeding at your majesty's being there, we have upon very good grounds adjudged, that he could not discharge the trust, upon which, nor make good the end, for which he was placed in the guard of that town and magazine, if he had let in your majesty with such counsellors and company as were then about you.

“ Wherefore, upon full resolution of both houses, we have declared sir John Hotham to be clear from that odious crime of treason; and have avowed, that he hath therein done nothing but in obedience to the command of both houses of parliament; assuring ourselves, that, upon mature deliberation, your majesty will not interpret his obedience to such authority to be an affront to your majesty, or to be of that nature, as to require any justice to be done upon him, or satisfaction to be made to your majesty: but that you will see just cause of joining with your parliament, in preserving and securing the peace of the kingdom; suppressing this wicked and malignant party; who, by false colours, and pretensions of maintaining your majesty's prerogative against the parliament, (wherein they fully agree with the rebels of Ireland,) have been the causes of all our distempers and dangers.

“ For prevention whereof we know no better remedy, than settling the militia of the kingdom, according to the bill, which we have sent your majesty, without any intention of deserting, or declining the validity, or observance of that ordinance, which passed both houses, upon your majesty's former refusal: but we still hold that ordinance to be effectual by the laws of this kingdom. And we shall be exceeding glad, if your majesty, by approving these our just, dutiful, and necessary proceedings, shall be pleased to entertain such counsel, as we assure ourselves, by God's blessing, will prove very advantageous for the honour and greatness of your majesty; the safety and peace of your people; amongst which we know none more likely to produce such good effects, than a declaration from your majesty of your purpose to lay aside all thoughts of going into Ireland, and to make a speedy return into these parts, to be near your parliament. Which, as it is our most humble desire, and earnest petition, so shall it be seconded with our most dutiful care for the safety of your royal person, and constant prayers, that it may prove honourable and successful, in the happiness of your majesty, and all your kingdoms.”

To this answer, with all formality delivered to his majesty by the committee, the king returned a quick reply:

“ That he had been in good hope, that the reason, why they had so long deferred their answer to his messages concerning Hull, had been; that they might the better have given him satisfaction therein, which now added the more astonishment, finding their answer, after so long advisement, to be of that nature, which could not but rather increase than diminish the present distractions, if constantly adhered to by the parliament. He asked them, whether it was not too much, that his town of Hull had a garrison put into it, to the great charge of the country, and inconvenience to the poor inhabitants, without his consent and approbation, under colour at that time of foreign invasion, and apprehensions of the popish party; but that now the reasons thereof should be enlarged with a scandal to his majesty, and his faithful servants, only to bring in the more specious pretext for the avowing sir John Hotham's insolence and treason?

“ He said, he had often heard of the great trust, that, by the law of God and man, was committed to the king for the defence and safety of his people; but as yet he never understood, what trust or power was committed to either or both houses of parliament, without the king; they being summoned to counsel and advise the king. But by what law or authority they possess themselves of his majesty's proper right and inheritance, he was confident, that as they had not, so they could not shew. He told them, that he had not hitherto given the least interruption to public justice; but they, rather than suffer one of their members to come so much as to a legal trial for the highest crime, would make use of an order of parliament to countenance treason, by declaring him free from that guilt, which all former ages never accounted other; and that without so much as inquiring the opinion of the judges; for he was confident, they would have mentioned their opinion, if they had asked it.

“ Therefore he expected, that upon further and better consideration of the great and necessary consequence of the business of Hull, and seriously weighing, how much it did concern the peace and quiet of the kingdom, they would, without further instance from his majesty, give him full and speedy justice against sir John Hotham. And he said, he would leave all his good people to think, what hope of justice there was left for them, when they refused, or delayed, to give their own sovereign satisfaction. And, as he had already said, till that should be done, he would intend no business whatsoever, other than that of Ireland.

“ And he said, he likewise expected that they would not put the militia in execution, until they could shew him by what law they had authority to do the same, without his consent; or if they did, he was confident, that he should find much more obedience according to law, than they would do against law. And he should esteem all those, who should obey them therein, to be disturbers of the peace of the kingdom; and would, in due season, call them to a legal account for the same.

“ Concerning his return, he told them, he never heard that the slandering of a king's government, and his faithful servants, the refusing of him justice, and in a case of treason, and the seeking to take away his undoubted and legal authority,

"under the pretence of putting the kingdom into a posture of defence, were arguments to induce a king to come near, or hearken to his parliament."

The king despatched this answer the sooner, that the country might be freed from the impression, the presence and activity of the committee made in them: but when he delivered it to them, and required them to make all convenient haste with it to the houses, they told him, "they would send it by an express, but that themselves were required and appointed to reside still at York." The king told them, "that he liked not to have such supervisors near him, and wished them to be very careful in their carriage; that the country was visibly then very well affected; and if he found any declension, he well knew to whom to impute it; and should be compelled to proceed in another manner against them, than, with reference to their persons," (for they were all then reputed moderate men, and had not been thought disaffected to the government of the church or state,) "he should be willing to do." They answered with a sullen confidence, "that they should demean themselves according to their instructions; and would perform the trust reposed in them by the two houses of parliament." Yet such was the ticklishness of the king's condition, that, though it was most evident that their coming, and staying there, was to pervert and corrupt the loyalty and affections of those parts, and to infuse into them inclinations contrary to their allegiance, it was not thought counsellable at that time, either to commit them to prison, or to expel them from that city, or to inhibit them the freedom of his own court and presence; and so they continued for the space of above a month, in York, even in defiance of the king.

The militia was the argument, which they found made deepest impression in the people, being totally ignorant what it was, or what the consequence of it might be; and so believing whatsoever they told them concerning it. And therefore they resolved to drive that nail home; and though, for want of their imminent danger, and during the time of the king's treaty, and overture of a bill, they had forbore the execution of their ordinance; yet the frequent musters of volunteers without order, almost in all countries, by the bare authority of their votes, gave them sufficient evidence how open the people were to their commands; at least, how unprepared authority was to resist and oppose them: and therefore, after the king had displaced their favourites, and refused to pass the bill for the militia, and sir John Hotham had refused to let the king come into the town of Hull, and they had justified him for so doing, they prepared a declaration concerning the whole state of the militia, as the resolution of the lords and commons upon that matter; in which they said,

"That holding it necessary for the peace and safety of the kingdom, to settle the militia thereof, they had, for that purpose, prepared an ordinance of parliament, and with all humility had presented the same to his majesty for his royal assent. Who, notwithstanding the faithful advice of his parliament, and the several reasons offered by them, of the necessity thereof for the securing of his majesty's person, and the peace and safety of his people, did refuse to give his consent; and thereupon they were necessitated, in discharge of "the trust reposed in them, as the representative body of the kingdom, to make an ordinance, by the authority of both houses, to settle the militia, warranted thereunto by the fundamental laws of the land: that his majesty, taking notice thereof, did, by several messages, invite them to settle the same by act of parliament; affirming in his message sent in answer to the petition of both houses, presented to his majesty at York, March 26, that he always thought it necessary the same should be settled, and that he never denied the thing, only denied the way; and for the matter of it, took exceptions only to the preface, as a thing not standing with his honour to consent to; and that himself was excluded in the execution, and for a time unlimited: whereupon the lords and commons, being desirous to give his majesty all satisfaction that might be, even to the least tittle of form and circumstances, and when his majesty had pleased to offer them a bill ready drawn, had, for no other cause, than to manifest their hearty affection to comply with his majesty's desires, and obtain his consent, entertained the same, and in the mean time no way declining their ordinance; and, to express their earnest zeal to correspond with his majesty's desire, (in all things that might consist with the peace and safety of the kingdom, and the trust reposed in them,) did pass that bill, and therein omitted the preamble inserted before the ordinance; limited the time to less than two years; and confined the authority of the lieutenants to these three particulars; namely, rebellion, insurrection, and foreign invasion; and returned the same to his majesty for his royal assent: but all these expressions of affection and loyalty, all those desires and earnest endeavours to comply with his majesty, had, to their great grief and sorrow, produced no better effects than an absolute denial, even of that which his majesty, by his former messages, as they conceived, had promised: the advice of evil and wicked counsels receiving still more credit with him, than that of his great council of parliament, in a matter of so high importance, that the safety of his kingdom, and peace of his people, depended upon it.

"But now, what must be the exceptions to that bill? Not any sure that [were] to the ordinance; for a care had been taken to give satisfaction in all those particulars. Then the exception was, because that the disposing and execution thereof was referred to both houses of parliament, and his majesty excluded; and now that, by the bill, the power and execution was ascertained, and reduced to particulars, and the law of the realm made the rule thereof, his majesty would not trust the persons. The power was too great, too unlimited, to trust them with. But what was that power? Was it any other, but, in express terms, to suppress rebellion, insurrection, and foreign invasion? And who were those persons? Were not they such as were nominated by the great council of the kingdom, and assented to by his majesty? And was it too great a power, to trust those persons with the suppression of rebellion, insurrection, and foreign invasion? Surely, they said, the most wicked of them who advised his majesty to that answer, could not suggest, but that it was necessary for the safety of his majesty's royal person, and the peace of the kingdom, such a power should be put in some

"hands; and there was no pretence for exception to the persons. They said, his majesty had, for the space of above fifteen years together, not thought a power, far exceeding that, to be too great to intrust particular persons with, to whose will the lives and liberties of his people, by martial laws, were made subject; for such was the power given to lord lieutenants, and deputy lieutenants, in every county of this kingdom, and that without the consent of the people, or authority of law. But now in case of extreme necessity, upon the advice of both houses of parliament, for no longer space than two years, a lesser power, and that for the safety of king and people, was thought too great to trust particular persons with, though named by both houses of parliament, and approved by his majesty himself: and surely, if there were a necessity to settle the militia, (which his majesty was pleased to confess,) the persons could not be intrusted with less power than that, to have it effectual. And the precedents of former ages, when there happened a necessity to raise such a power, never straitened that power to a narrower compass; witness the commissions of array in several kings' reigns, and often issued out by the consent and authority of parliament.

"The lords and commons therefore, intrusted with the safety of the kingdom, and peace of the people, (which, they called God to witness, was their only aim,) finding themselves denied those their so necessary and just demands, and that they could never be discharged before God or man, if they should suffer the safety of the kingdom, and peace of the people, to be exposed to the malice of the malignant party at home, or the fury of enemies from abroad: and knowing no other way to encounter the imminent and approaching danger, but by putting the people into a fit posture of defence, did resolve to put their said ordinance in present execution; and did require all persons in authority, by virtue of the said ordinance, forthwith to put the same in execution, and all others to obey it, according to the fundamental laws of the kingdom in such cases, as they tendered the upholding of the true protestant religion, the safety of his majesty's person, and his royal posterity, the peace of the kingdom, and the being of this commonwealth." This declaration (being in answer to a message from his majesty) was printed, and, with the usual care and dexterity, dispersed throughout the kingdom, without so much as sending it to the king; and, thereupon, warrants and directions issued into all parts, for the exercising the militia.

This being the first declaration they had in plain terms published against the king, without ever communicating it, or presenting it to him, as they had done all the rest, his majesty was the more troubled how to take notice of it; but conceiving it necessary to apply some antidote to this poison, the violent operation whereof he had reason to apprehend, he published a declaration by way of answer to that declaration, in which he said, "That he very well understood, how much it was below the high and royal dignity (wherein God had placed him) to take notice of, much more to trouble himself with answering, those many scandalous, seditious pamphlets, and print"ed papers, which were scattered, with such great license, throughout the kingdom, (notwithstanding his majesty's earnest desire, so often in vain pressed, for a reformation,) though he found it evident, that the minds of many of his weak subjects had been, and still were, poisoned by those means; and that so general a terror had possessed the minds and hearts of all men, that whilst the preesses swarmed [with], and every day produced, new tracts against the established government of the church and state, most men wanted the courage, or the conscience, to write, or the opportunity and encouragement to publish, such composed, sober animadversions, as might either preserve the minds of his good subjects from such infection, or restore and recover them, when they were so infected: but, his majesty said, he was contented to let himself fall to any office, that might undeceive his people, and to take more pains that way by his own pen, than ever king had done, when he found any thing that seemed to carry the reputation and authority of either or both houses of parliament, and would not have the same refuted, or disputed by vulgar and common pens, till he should be thoroughly informed whether those acts had in truth that countenance and warrant they pretend: which regard of his, his majesty doubted not but, in time, would recover that due reverence (the absence whereof he had too much reason to complain [of]) to his person and his messages, which in all ages had been paid, and, no doubt, was due to the crown of England.

"He said, he had therefore taken notice of a printed paper, entitled, a Declaration of both Houses, in answer to his last message concerning the militia, published by command; the which he was unwilling to believe (both for the matter of it, the expressions in it, and the manner of publishing it) could result from the consent of both houses; neither did his majesty know by what lawful command, such uncomely, irreverent mention of him could be published to the world: and, though declarations of that kind had of late, with too much boldness, broken in upon his majesty and the whole kingdom, when one or both houses had thought fit to communicate their counsels and resolutions to the people; yet, he said, he was unwilling to believe, that such a declaration as that could be published in answer to his message, without vouchsafing at least to send it to his majesty as their answer: their business, for which they were met by his writ and authority, being to counsel him for the good of his people, not to write against him to his people; nor had any consent of his majesty for their long continuing together enabled them to do any thing, but what they were first summoned by his writ to do. At least he would believe, though misunderstanding and jealousy (the justice of God, he said, would overtake the fomenters of that jealousy, and the promoters and contrivers of that misunderstanding) might produce, to say no worse, those very untoward expressions, that if those houses had contrived that declaration as an answer to his message, they would have vouchsafed some answer to the questions proposed in his, which, he professed, did, and must evidently prevail over his understanding; and, in their wisdom and gravity, they would "have been sure to have stated the matters of fact, as (at least to ordinary understandings) might be unquestionable; neither of which was done by that declaration.

"His majesty had desired to know, why he was by that act absolutely excluded from any power or authority in the execution of the militia: and, he said, he must appeal to all the world, whether such an attempt were not a greater and juster ground for fear and jealousy in him, than any one that was avowed for those destructive fears and jealousies which were so publicly owned, almost, to the ruin of the kingdom. But his majesty had been told, that he must not be jealous of his great council of both houses of parliament. He said, he was not, no more than they were of his majesty, their king; and hitherto they had not avowed any jealousy of, or disaffection to, his person; but imputed all to his evil counsellors, to a malignant party, that was not of their minds; so his majesty did (and, he said, he did it from his soul) profess no jealousy of his parliament, but of some turbulent, seditious, and ambitious natures; which, being not so clearly discerned, might have an influence even upon the actions of both houses: and if that declaration had passed by that consent, (which he was not willing to believe,) he said, it was not impossible, but that the apprehension of such tumults, which had driven his majesty from his city of London, for the safety of his person, might make such an impression upon other men, not able to remove from the danger, to make them consent, or not to own a dissent, in matters not agreeable to their conscience or understanding.

"He said, he had mentioned, in that his answer, his dislike of putting their names out of the bill, whom before they recommended to his majesty, in their pretended ordinance, and the leaving out, by special provision, the present lord mayor of London: to all which the declaration afforded no answer; and therefore he could not suppose it was intended for an answer to that his message, which whosoever looked upon, would find to be in no degree answered by that declaration; but it informed all his majesty's subjects, after the mention with what humility the ordinance was prepared, and presented to his majesty, (a matter very evident in the petitions, and messages concerning it,) and his refusal to give his consent, notwithstanding the several reasons offered, of the necessity thereof for the securing of his person, and the peace and safety of his people, (whether any such reasons were given, the weight of them, and whether they were not clearly and candidly answered by his majesty, the world would easily judge,) that they were at last necessitated to make an ordinance by authority of both houses, to settle the militia, warranted thereunto by the fundamental laws of the land. But, his majesty said, if that declaration had indeed intended to have answered him, it would have told his good subjects what those fundamental laws of the land were, and where to be found; and would, at least, have mentioned one ordinance, from the first beginning of parliaments to this present parliament, which endeavoured to impose any thing upon the subject without the king's consent; for of such, he said, all the inquiry he could make could never produce him one instance. And if there were such a secret of "the law, which had lain hid from the beginning of the world to that time, and now was discovered to take away the just, legal power of the king, he wished there were not some other secret (to be discovered when they pleased) for the ruin and destruction of the liberty of the subject. For, he said, there was no doubt if the votes of both houses had any such authority to make a new law, it had the same authority to repeal the old; and then, what would become of the long established rights of the king and subject, and particularly of Magna Charta, would be easily discerned by the most ordinary understanding.

"He said, it was true, that he had (out of tenderness of the constitution of the kingdom, and care of the law, which he was bound to defend, and being most assured of the unjustifiableness of the pretended ordinance) invited, and desired both houses of parliament to settle whatsoever should be fit of that nature by act of parliament. But was he therefore obliged to pass whatsoever should be brought to him of that kind? He did say in his answer to the petition of both houses, presented to him at York the 26th of March last, (and he had said the same in other messages before,) that he always thought it necessary that the business of the militia should be settled, and that he never denied the thing, only denied the way; and he said the same still; and that since the many disputes and votes, upon lords lieutenants and their commissions, (which had not been begun by his majesty, nor his father,) had so discountenanced that authority, which for many years together was looked upon with reverence and obedience by the people, his majesty did think it very necessary, that some wholesome law should be provided for that business; but he had declared in his answer to the pretended ordinance, that he expected, that that necessary power should be first invested in his majesty, before he consented to transfer it to other men; neither could it ever be imagined that he would consent that a greater power should be in the hands of a subject, than he was thought worthy to be trusted with himself. And if it should not be thought fit to make a new act or declaration in the point of the militia, he doubted not but he should be able to grant such commissions as should very legally enable those he trusted, to do all offices for the peace and quiet of the kingdom, if any disturbance should happen.

"But it was said, he had been pleased to offer them a bill ready drawn, and that they, to express their earnest zeal to correspond with his desire, did pass that bill; and yet all that expression of affection and loyalty, all that earnest desire of theirs to comply with his majesty, produced no better effect than an absolute denial, even of what by his former messages his majesty had promised; and so that declaration, he said, proceeded, under the pretence of mentioning evil and wicked councils, to censure and reproach his majesty in a dialect, that, he was confident, his good subjects would read, on his behalf, with much indignation. But, his majesty said, sure if that declaration had passed the examination of both houses of parliament, they would never have affirmed, that the bill he had refused to pass was the same he had sent to them, or have thought that his message, wherein the difference and con-

"trariety between the two bills was so particularly set down, would be answered with the bare averring them to be one and the same bill: nor would they have declared, when his exceptions to the ordinance, and the bill, were so notoriously known to all, that care being taken to give satisfaction in all the particulars he had excepted against in the ordinance, he had found new exceptions to the bill; and yet that very declaration confessed, that his exception to the ordinance was, that, in the disposing and execution thereof, his majesty was excluded: and was not that an express reason, in his answer, for his refusal of the bill; which that declaration would needs confute?"

"But the power was no other than to suppress rebellion, insurrection, and foreign invasion; and the persons trusted, no other than such as were nominated by the great council of the kingdom, and assented to by his majesty: and they asked, if that were too great a power to trust those persons with? Indeed, his majesty said, whilst so great liberty was used in voting, and declaring men to be enemies to the commonwealth, (a phrase his majesty scarce understood,) and in censuring men for their service, and attendance upon his majesty's person, and in his lawful commands, great heed must be taken into what hands he committed such a power to suppress insurrection and rebellion; and if insurrection and rebellion had found other definitions than what the law had given, his majesty must be sure, that no lawful power should justify those definitions: and if there were learning found out to make sir John Hotham's taking arms against him, and keeping his majesty's town and fort from him, to be no treason or rebellion, he knew not whether a new discovery might not find it rebellion in his majesty to defend himself from such arms, and to endeavour to recover what was so taken from him; and therefore, he said, it concerned him, till the known laws of the land were allowed to be judge between them, to take heed into what hands he committed such power.

"Besides, he asked, whether it could be thought, that because he was willing to trust certain persons, that he was obliged to trust them in whatsoever they were willing to be trusted? He said, no private hands were fit for such a trust; neither had he departed from any thing, in the least degree, he had offered or promised before; though he might with as much reason have withdrawn his trust from some persons, whom before he had accepted, as they had done from others, whom they had recommended. For the power which he was charged to have committed to particular persons, for the space of fifteen years, by his commissions of lieutenancy, it was notoriously known, that it was not a power created by his majesty, but continued very many years, and in the most happy times this kingdom had enjoyed, even those of his renowned predecessors, queen Elizabeth, and his father of happy memory; and whatever authority had been granted by those commissions, which had been kept in the old forms, the same was determinable at his majesty's pleasure; and he knew not, that they produced any of those calamities, which might give his good subjects cause to be so weary of them, as to run the hazard of so much mischief, as that "bill, which he had refused, might possibly have produced.

"For the precedents of former ages in the commissions of array, his majesty doubted not, but that when any such had issued out, that the king's consent was always obtained, and the commissions determinable at his pleasure; and then what the extent of power was, would be nothing applicable to that case of the ordinance.

"But whether that declaration had refuted his majesty's reasons for his refusal to pass the bill, or no, it resolved, and required all persons in authority thereby to put the ordinance in present execution; and all others to obey it according to the fundamental laws of the land. But, his majesty said, he, whom God had trusted to maintain and defend those fundamental laws, which, he hoped, God would bless to secure him, did declare, that there was no legal power in either, or both houses, upon any pretence whatsoever, without his majesty's consent, to command any part of the militia of the kingdom; nor had the like ever been commanded by either, or both houses, since the first foundation of the laws of the land; and that the execution of, or the obedience to, that pretended ordinance, was against the fundamental laws of the land, against the liberty of the subject, and the right of parliaments, and a high crime in any that should execute the same: and his majesty did therefore charge and command all his loving subjects, of what degree or quality soever, upon their allegiance, and as they tendered the peace of the kingdom, from thenceforth not to muster, levy, or array, or summon, or warn any of the trained bands to rise, muster, or march, by virtue, or under colour, of that pretended ordinance: and to that declaration and command of his majesty's, he said, he expected and required a full submission and obedience from all his loving subjects, upon their allegiance, as they would answer the contrary at their perils, and as they tendered the upholding of the true protestant religion, the safety of his person, and his royal posterity, the peace, and being of the kingdom."

Notwithstanding these sharp declarations, (infallible symptoms of sharper actions,) which were with equal diligence dispersed by either side amongst the people, save that the agents for the parliament took as much care to suppress the king's, as to publish their own, whereas the king's desire was that they might be both impartially read and examined, and to that purpose always caused those from the parliament to be printed with his own, they had the power and skill to persuade men, who, but by that persuasion, could not have been seduced, and without seducing of whom they could have made a very sorry progress in mischief, "that all would be well; that they were well assured that the king would, in the end, yield to what they desired; at least, that they should prevail for a good part, if not for all, and that there should be no war:" though themselves well knew, that the fire was too much kindled to be extinguished without a flame, and made preparations accordingly. For the raising and procuring of money (besides the vast sums collected and contributed for Ireland, which they disbursed very leisurely, the supplies for that kingdom, notwithstanding the importunity and complaint from thence, being not despatched thither, both in quantity and quality, with that expedition as was pretended) they sent out very strict warrants for the gathering all those sums of money, which had been granted by any bills of subsidy, or poll-bill; in the collection of all which there had been great negligence, probably that they might have it the more at their own disposal in their need; by which they now recovered great sums into their hands. For the raising of men, (though it was not yet time for them to avow the raising an army,) besides the disposing the whole kingdom to subject themselves to their ordinance of the militia, and, by that, listing in all places companies of volunteers, who would be ready when they [were] called, they made more haste than they had done in the levies of men, both horse and foot, for the relief of Ireland, under officers chosen or approved by themselves; and proposed the raising an army apart, of six or eight thousand, under the command of the lord Wharton, (a man very fast to them,) for Munster, under the style of the adventurers' army, and to have no dependence upon, nor be subject to, the lord lieutenant of Ireland, but only to receive orders from the two houses, and from a committee to be appointed by them, which should be always with that army: but the king, easily discerning the consequence of that design, refused to grant such a commission as they desired; so that they were forced to be content, only with the advantage of new exclamations against the king, "for hindering the supplies for Ireland," upon the occasion of his denial of that unreasonable commission, and to proceed in their levies the ordinary way; which they did with great expedition. To confirm and encourage the factious and schismatical party of the kingdom, which thought the pace towards the reformation was not brisk and furious enough, and was with great difficulty contained in so slow a march, they had, a little before, published a declaration:

"That they intended a due and necessary reformation of the government and liturgy of the church, and to take away nothing in the one or the other, but what should be evil, and justly offensive, or at least unnecessary, and burdensome: and, for the better effecting thereof, speedily to have consultation with godly and learned divines: and, because that would never of itself attain the end sought therein, they would therefore use their utmost endeavours to establish learned and preaching ministers, with a good and sufficient maintenance throughout the whole kingdom; wherein many dark corners were miserably destitute of the means of salvation, and many poor ministers wanted necessary provision."

This declaration, printed, and appointed to be published by the sheriffs in their several counties, in all the market-towns within the kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, was not more intended to the hearkening of those who were impatient for a reformation, (who in truth had so implicit a faith in their leaders, that they expected another manner of reformation than was publicly promised,) than to the lulling those asleep, who began to be awake with the apprehension of that confusion, they apprehended from the practice and license, they saw practised against the received government, and doctrine of the church; and to be persuaded, that it was time to oppose that current. And in this project they were not disappointed: for though this warily worded declaration was evidence enough to wise men, what they intended, and logically comprehended, an alteration as great as hath been since attempted and made; yet to lazy and quiet men, who could not discern consequences, and were not willing to antedate their miseries, by suspecting worse was to come than they felt, or saw in their view, their fears were much abated, and the intentions of the parliament seemed not so bad as they had been told by some that they were: and as this very declaration of a due reformation to be made of the government of the church, and the liturgy, would, a year before, have given great umbrage and scandal to the people, when, generally, there was a due submission to the government, and a singular reverence of the liturgy of the church of England; so now, when there was a general fear and apprehension inculcated into them, of a purpose utterly to subvert the government, and utterly to abolish the liturgy, they thought the taking away nothing in the one or the other, but what should be evil, and justly offensive, or, at least, unnecessary and burdensome, was an easy composition; and so, by degrees, they suffered themselves to be still prevailed on towards ends they extremely abhorred; and what at first seemed profane and impious to them, in a little time appeared only inconvenient; and what, in the beginning, they thought matter of conscience and religion, shortly after they looked upon as somewhat rather to be wished than positively insisted on; and consequently not to be laid in the balance with the public peace, which they would imagine to be endangered by opposing the sense that then prevailed; and so, by undervaluing many particulars, (which they truly esteemed,) as rather to be consented to, than that the general should suffer, they brought, or suffered the public to be brought to all the sufferings it since underwent.

And now they shewed what consultation they meant to have with godly and learned divines, and what reformation they intended, by appointing the knights and burgesses to bring in the names of such divines for the several counties, as they thought fit to constitute an assembly for the framing a new model for the government of the church, which was done accordingly; those who were true sons of the church, not so much as endeavouring the nomination of sober and learned men, abhorring such a reformation, as begun with the invasion and suppression of the church's rights in calling a synod, as well known as Magna Charta: and if any well affected member, not enough considering the scandal and the consequence of that violation, did name an orthodox and well reputed divine, to assist in that assembly, it was argument enough against him, that he was nominated by a person in whom they had no confidence; and they only had reputation enough to commend to this consultation, who were known to desire the utter demolishing of the whole fabric of the church: so that of about one hundred and twenty, of which that assembly was to consist, (though, by the recommendation of two or three members of the commons, whom they were not willing to displease, and by the authority of the lords, who added a small number to those named by the house of commons, a few very reverend and worthy men were inserted; yet of the whole number) they were not above twenty, who were not declared and avowed enemies to the doctrine or discipline of the church of England; many of them infamous in their lives and conversations; and most of them of very mean parts in learning, if not of scandalous ignorance; and of no other reputation, than of malice to the church of England; so that that convention hath not since produced any thing, that might not then reasonably have been expected from it.

But that which gave greatest power and strength to their growing faction, was the severity they used against all those, of what quality or degree soever, who opposed their counsels and proceedings. If any lord, who had any place of honour or trust from the king, concurred not with them, they made an inquisition into the whole passages of his life; and if they could find no fault, or no folly (for any levity, or indiscretion, served for a charge) to reproach him with, it was enough, "that they could not confide in him:" so they threatened the earl of Portland, who with extraordinary vivacity crossed their consultations, "that they would remove him from his charge and government of the Isle of Wight," (which, at last, they did de facto, by committing him to prison, without so much as assigning a cause,) and to that purpose objected all the acts of good fellowship; all the waste of powder, and all the waste of wine, in the drinking of healths; and other acts of jollity, whenever he had been at his government, from the first hour of his entering upon it: so that the least inconvenience a man in their disfavour was to expect, was to have his name and reputation used, for two or three hours, in the house of commons, with what license and virulency they pleased. None were persecuted with more rigour than the clergy; whereof whosoever publicly, or privately, censured their actions, or suspected their intentions, was either committed to prison, or compelled to a chargeable and long attendance, as inconvenient as imprisonment. And this measure of proceeding was equally, if not with more animosity, applied to those, who, in former times, had been looked upon by that party with most reverence. On the contrary, whoever concurred, voted, and sided with them, in their extravagant conclusions, let the infamy of his former life, or present practice, be what it would, his injustice and oppression never so scandalous and notorious, he was received, countenanced, and protected, with marvellous demonstrations of affection: so that, between those that loved them, and those that feared them, those that did not love the church, and those that did not love some churchmen; those whom the court had oppressed, and those who had helped the court to oppress others; those who feared their power, and those who feared their justice; their party was grown over the kingdom, but especially in the city, justly formidable.

In the mean time, the king omitted no opportunity to provide against the storm he saw was coming; and, though he might not yet own the apprehension of that danger he really found himself in, he neglected not the provision of what he thought most necessary for his defence; he caused all his declarations, messages, and answers, to be industriously communicated throughout his dominions; of which he found good effects; and, by their reception, discovered that the people universally were not so irrecoverably poisoned, as he

before had cause to fear: he caused private intimations to be given, and insinuations to be made to the gentry, "that their presence would be acceptable to him;" and to those, who came to him, he used much gracious freedom, and expressed all possible demonstrations, that he was glad of their attendance: so that, in a short time, the resort to York was very great; and, at least, a good face of a court there.

Beyond the seas, the queen was as intent to do her part; and to provide that so good company, as she heard was daily gathered together about the king, should not be dissolved for want of weapons to defend one another: and therefore, with as much secrecy as could be used in those cases, and in those places where she had so many spies upon her, she caused, by the sale or pawning of her own, and some of the crown jewels, a good quantity of powder and arms to be in a readiness in Holland, against the time that it should be found necessary to transport it to his majesty: so that both sides, whilst they entertained each other with discourses of peace, (which always carried a sharpness with them, that whetted their appetite to war,) provided for that war, which they saw would not be prevented.

Hitherto the greatest acts of hostility, saving that at Hull, were performed by votes and orders; for there was yet no visible, formal execution of the ordinance for the militia, in any one county of England: for the appearance of volunteers in some factious corporations [was] rather countenanced than positively directed and enjoined by the houses; and most places pretended an authority, granted by the king in the charters, by which those corporations were erected, or constituted: but now they thought it time to satisfy the king, and the people, that they were in earnest, (who were hardly persuaded, that they had in truth the courage to execute their own ordinance,) and resolved, "that, on the tenth of May, they would have all the trained bands of London mustered in the fields, "where that exercise usually was performed;" and accordingly, on that day, their own new officer, sergeant-major-general Skippon, appeared in Finsbury fields, with all the trained bands of London, consisting of above eight thousand soldiers, disposed into six regiments, and under such captains and colonels, as they had cause to confide in. At this first triumphant muster, the members of both houses appeared in gross, their being a tent purposely set up for them, and an entertainment at the charge of the city to the value of near a thousand pounds; all men presuming that this example of London, with such ceremony and solemnity, would be easily followed throughout the kingdom; and many believing they had made no small progress towards the end they aimed at, by having engaged the very body of the city in a guilt equal to their own: for though they had before sufficient evidence of the inclinations of the mean and common people to them, and reasonable assurance, that those in authority would hardly be able to contain them; yet, till this day, they had no instance of the concurrence of the city in an act expressly unlawful. But now they presumed all difficulties were over; and so sent their directions to the counties adjacent, speedily to execute the same ordinance: and appointed all the magazines of the several counties of England and Wales, to such custody, as their lord lieutenants, or their deputy lieutenants, should appoint; and that not only the counties should increase those magazines to what proportion soever they thought convenient, but that any private persons, that were well affected, should supply themselves with what arms and ammunition they pleased. By which means, besides the king's magazines, all which were in their possession, they caused great quantities of all sorts of arms to be provided, and disposed to such places and persons, as they thought fittest to be trusted; especially in those factious corporations, which had listed most volunteers for their service.

The king now saw the storm coming apace upon him; that (notwithstanding his proclamations published against the ordinance of the militia, in which he set down the laws and statutes, which were infringed thereby, and by which the execution of that ordinance would be no less than high treason) the votes and declaration of both houses, "that those proclamations were illegal, and that those acts of parliament could not control the acts and orders of both houses, (which the subjects were, by the fundamental laws of the kingdom, to obey,)" prevailed so far, that obedience was given to them; that he was so far from being like to have Hull restored to him, that the garrison there daily increased, and forced the country to submit to such commands they pleased to lay on them; and that sir John Hotham was more likely to be able to take York, than his majesty to recover Hull; he thought it, therefore, high time, by their example, to put himself into a posture of defence; the danger being much more imminent to his majesty, than to those who had begot that ordinance. Hereupon, at a public meeting of the country, his majesty declared, "that he was resolved, in regard of the public distempers, and the neighbourhood of Hull, to have a guard for his person; but of such persons, and with such circumstances, as should administer no occasion of jealousy to the most suspicious; and wished the gentlemen of quality, who attended, to consider, and advise of the way:" who shortly after (notwithstanding the opposition given by the committee, which still resided there; and the factious party of the county, which was inflamed, and governed by them) expressed a great alacrity to comply with his majesty's desire, in whatsoever should be proposed to them; and a sense, "that they thought a sufficient guard was very necessary for the security of his majesty's person." Hereupon, the king appointed such gentlemen as were willing to list themselves into a troop of horse, and made the prince of Wales their captain; and made choice of one regiment of the trained bands, consisting of about six hundred, whom he caused, every Saturday, to be paid at his own charge; when he had little more in his coffers than would defray the weekly expense of his table: and this troop, with this regiment, was the guard of his person; it being first declared by his majesty, "that no person should be suffered, either in the troop, or the regiment, who did not, before his admission into the service, take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy;" that so he might be free from the scandal of entertaining papists for his security.

But this caution would not serve; the fears and jealousies were capable of no other remedies, than such as were prescribed by those physicians, who were practised in the disease. As soon as the intelligence was arrived at London, that the king actually had a guard, (though the circumstances were as well known that were used in the raising it,) both houses published these three votes, and dispersed them:

1. "That it appeared, that the king, seduced by wicked counsel, intended to make war against the parliament; who, in all their consultations and actions, had proposed no other end unto themselves, but the care of his kingdoms, and the performance of all duty and loyalty to his person.

2. "That whensoever the king maketh war upon the parliament, it is a breach of the trust reposed in him by his people; contrary to his oath; and tending to the dissolution of the government.

3. "That whosoever should serve him, or assist him in such wars, are traitors by the fundamental laws of the kingdom; and have been so adjudged by two acts of parliament, 2 Rich. II. and 1 Hen. IV. and ought to suffer as traitors."

These lusty votes they sent to the king to York, together with a short petition, in which they told him,

"That his loyal subjects, the lords and commons in parliament, did humbly represent unto his majesty, that notwithstanding his frequent professions to his parliament and the kingdom, that his desire and intention was only the preserving the true protestant profession, the laws of the land, the liberty of his people, and the peace of the kingdom; nevertheless, they perceived with great grief, by his speech of the twelfth of May, and the paper printed in his majesty's name, in the form of a proclamation, bearing date the fourteenth of May, and other evidences, that, under colour of raising a guard to secure his person, of which guard (considering the fidelity and care of his parliament) there could be no use, his majesty did command troops, both of horse and foot, to assemble at York; the very beginnings whereof were apprehended by the inhabitants of that county to be an affrightment and disturbance of his liege people, as appeared by their petition presented to him; the continuing and increasing of which forces was to his parliament, and must needs be, a just cause of great jealousy, and danger to his whole kingdom.

"Therefore they did humbly beseech his majesty to disband all such forces, as, by his command, were assembled, and relying for his security (as his predecessors had done) upon the laws, and affections of his people, he would be pleased to desist from any further designs of that nature, contenting himself with his usual and ordinary guards; otherwise, they should hold themselves bound in duty towards God, and the trust reposed in them by the people, and the fundamental laws and constitutions of the kingdom, to employ their care and utmost power to secure the parliament, and to preserve the peace and quiet of the kingdom."

To this petition, delivered publicly, and read with an equal confidence, by their lieger committee, his majesty answered,

"That he could not but extremely wonder, that the causeless jealousies concerning his majesty, raised and fomented by a malignant party in the kingdom, which desired nothing more than to

"snatch to themselves particular advantages out of a general combustion, (which means of advantage was never ministered to them by his fault, or seeking,) should not only be able to seduce a weak party in the kingdom, but seem to find so much countenance even from both houses, as that his raising of a guard, without further design than for the safety of his person, an action so legal, in a manner so peaceable, upon causes so evident and necessary, should not only be looked upon, and petitioned against by them, as a cause of jealousy; but declared to be raising of a war against them, contrary to his former professions of his care of religion and law: and he no less wondered, that that action of his should be said to be apprehended by the inhabitants of that county, as an affrightment and disturbance to his people, having been as well received there, as it was every where to be justified; and (he spake of the general, not of a few seduced particulars) assisted and sped by that county with that loyal affection and alacrity, as was a most excellent example, set to the rest of the kingdom, of their care of his safety upon all occasions; and should never be forgotten by him, nor, he hoped, by his posterity; but should be ever paid to them, in that, which is the proper expression of a prince's gratitude, a perpetual, vigilant care to govern them justly, and to preserve the only rule, by which they can be so governed, the law of the land: and, he said, he was confident, that if they were themselves eye-witnesses, they would so see the contrary, as to give little present thanks, and, hereafter, little credit to their informers; and, if they had no better information and intelligence of the inclinations and affections of the rest of the kingdom, certainly the minds of his people (which to some ends and purposes they did represent) were but ill represented unto them.

"He asked them, when they had so many months together not contented themselves to rely for security, as their predecessors had done, upon the affection of the people, but by their own single authority had raised to themselves a guard, (and that sometimes of no ordinary numbers, and in no ordinary way,) and yet all those pikes and protestations, that army, on one side, and that navy, on the other, had not persuaded his majesty [to command them] to disband their forces, and to content themselves with their ordinary, that was, no guard; or work in him an opinion, that they appeared to levy war against him, or had any further design; how it was possible, that the same persons should be so apt to suspect and condemn his majesty, who had been so unapt, in the same matter, upon much more ground, to tax or suspect them? This, he said, was his case, notwithstanding the care and fidelity of his parliament: his fort was kept by armed men against him; his proper goods first detained from him, and then, contrary to his command, by strong hand offered to be carried away; in which, at once, all his property as a private person, all his authority as a king, was wrested from him: and yet for him to secure himself in a legal way, that sir John Hotham might not by the same forces, or by more, raised by pretence of the same authority, (for he daily raised some, and it was no new thing for him to pretend orders, which he could not shew,) continue the war that he had levied against his majesty; and as well imprison his person, as detain his goods; and as well shut him up in York, as shut him out of Hull; was now said to be esteemed a cause of great jealousy to the parliament, a raising war against them, and of danger to the whole kingdom: whilst these injustices, and indignities offered to him, were countenanced by them, who ought to be most forward in his vindication, and their punishment, in observation of their oaths, and trust reposed in them by the people, and to avoid the dissolution of the present government. Upon which case, he said, the whole world was to judge, whether his majesty had not reason, not wholly to rely upon the care and fidelity of his parliament, being so strangely blinded by malignant spirits, as not to perceive his injuries; but to take some care of his own person, and, in order to that, to make use of that authority, which the laws declared to be in his majesty: and, whether that petition, with such a threatening conclusion, accompanied with more threatening votes, gave him not cause, rather to increase, than to diminish his guards; especially, since he had seen, before the petition, a printed paper, dated the seventeenth of May, underwritten by the clerk of the house of commons, commanding, in the name of both lords and commons, the sheriffs of all counties to raise the power of all those counties, to suppress such of his subjects, as, by any of his majesty's commands, should be drawn together, and put (as that paper called it) in a posture of war; charging all his majesty's officers and subjects to assist them in it, at their perils. For though, he said, he could not suspect, that that paper, or any bare votes, not grounded upon law or reason, or quotations of repealed statutes, as those were of the 2 Rich. II. and 1 Hen. IV. should have any ill influence upon his good people, who knew their duties too well not to know, that to take up arms against those, who, upon a legal command of his majesty, came together to a most legal end, (that was, his majesty's security and preservation,) was to levy war against his majesty; yet, if that paper were really the act of both houses, he could not but look upon it as the highest of scorns and indignities; first, to issue commands of force against him; and, after those had appeared useless, to offer, by petition, to persuade him to that, which that force should have effected.

"He said, he concluded his answer to their petition with his counsel to them, that they would join with him in exacting satisfaction for that unparalleled, and yet unpunished, action of sir John Hotham; and that they would command his fort and goods to be returned to his own hands: that they would lay down all pretences (under pretence of necessity, or declaring what is law) to make laws without his majesty, and, by consequence, but a cipher of his majesty: that they would declare effectually against tumults, and call in such pamphlets, (punishing the authors and publishers of them,) as seditiously endeavour to disable his majesty from protecting his people, by weakening, by false assertions, and new false doctrines, his authority with them, and their confidence in him: the particulars of which tumults and pamphlets, he "said, he would long since have taken care his learned council should have been enabled to give in evidence, if, upon his former offer, his majesty had received any return of encouragement from them in it: and, he said, if they did that, they would then, and hardly till then, persuade the world, that they had discharged their duty to God, the trust reposed in them by the people, and the fundamental laws and constitutions of the kingdom; and employed their care, and utmost power, to secure the parliament, (for, he said, he was still a part of the parliament, and should be, till this well-tempered monarchy was turned to a democracy,) and to preserve the peace and quiet of the kingdom; which, together with the defence of the protestant religion, the laws of the land, and his own just prerogative,) as a part of, and a defence to, those laws,) had been the main end, which, in his consultations and actions, he had proposed to himself."

It will be wondered at hereafter, that in a judging and discerning state, where men had, or seemed to have, their faculties of reason and understanding at the height; in a kingdom then unapt, and generally uninclined to war, (how wantonly soever it hath since seemed to throw away its peace,) those men who had the skill and cunning, out of froward and peevish humours and indispositions, to compound fears and jealousies, and to animate and inflame those fears and jealousies into the most prodigious and the boldest rebellion, that any age or country ever brought forth; who very well saw and felt, that the king had not only, to a degree, wound himself out of that labyrinth, in which, four months before, they had involved him, with their privileges, fears, and jealousies; but had even so well informed the people, that they began to question both their logic and their law, and to suspect and censure the improvement and gradation of their fears, and the extent and latitude of their privileges; and that they were not only denied by the king, what they required, but that the king's reasons of his denial made very many conclude the unreasonableness of their demands: I say, it may seem strange, that these men could entertain the hope and confidence to obtrude such a declaration and vote upon the people, "that the king did intend to make war against the parliament;" when they were so far from apprehending, that he would be able to get an army to disturb them, that they were most assured, he would not be able to get bread to sustain himself three months, without submitting all his counsels to their conduct and control; and that the offering to impose it did not awaken the people to an indignation, which might have confounded them: for, besides their presumption in endeavouring to search what the scripture itself told them was unsearchable, the heart of the king; the very law of the land, whose defence they pretended, makes no conclusion of the intention of the meanest subject, in a matter of the highest and tenderest consideration, even treason itself against the life of the king, without some overt, unlawful act, from whence, and other circumstances, the ill intention may be reasonably made appear; and therefore, to declare that the king intended to make war against his parliament, when he had neither ship, harbour, arms, nor money, and knew not how to get either, and when he offered to grant any thing to them, which they could pretend a justifiable reason for asking, was an undertaking of that nature, that even the almightiness of a parliament might have despaired to succeed in.

But, notwithstanding all this, they very well knew what they did, and understood what infinite advantage that vote would (as it did) bring to them; and that a natural way would never bring them to their unnatural end. The power and reputation of parliament, they believed, would implicitly prevail over many; and amaze and terrify others from disputing or censuring what they did, and upon what grounds they did it. The difficulty was, to procure the judgment of parliament; and to incline those different constitutions, and different affections, to such a concurrence, as the judgment might not be discredited, by the number of the dissenters; nor wounded, or prejudged, by the reasons and arguments given against it: and then, their judgments of the cure being to be grounded upon the nature and information of the disease, it was necessary to confine and contract their fancies and opinions within some bounds and limits: the mystery of rebellion challenging the same encouragement with other sciences, to grow by; that there may be certain postulata, some principles and foundations, upon which the main building may subsist. So, in the case of the militia, an imminent danger must be first supposed, by which the kingdom is in an apparent danger, and then the king's refusal to apply any remedy against that danger, before the two houses would pretend to the power of disposing that militia; it being too ridiculous to have pretended the natural and ordinary jurisdiction over it: but, in case of danger, and danger so imminent, that the usual recourse would not serve the turn, and for the saving of a kingdom, which must otherwise be lost, many good men thought it was reasonable to apply a very extraordinary prevention, without imagining such a supposition might possibly engage them in any action, contrary to their own inclinations; and, without doubt, very many, who frankly voted that imminent necessity, were induced to it, as an argument, that the king should be therefore importuned to consent to the settlement; which would not have appeared so necessary a request, if the occasion had not been important; never suspecting, that it would have proved an argument to them, to adventure the doing it without the king's consent. And it is not here unseasonable, (how merry soever it may seem to be,) as an instance of the incogitancy and inadvertency of those kind of votes and transactions, to remember, that the first resolution of the power of the militia being grounded upon a supposition of an imminent necessity, the ordinance first sent up from the commons to the lords, for the execution of the militia, expressed an eminent necessity; whereupon, some lords, who understood the difference of the words, and that an eminent necessity might be supplied by the ordinary provision, which, possibly, an imminent necessity might not safely attend, desired a conference with the commons for the amendment; which, I remember, was at last, with great difficulty, consented to: many (who, I presume, are not yet grown up to conceive the difference) supposing it an unnecessary contention for a word, and so yielding to them, for saving of time, rather than of the great moment of the thing.

They, who contrived this scene, never doubted that, after a resolution what was to be done upon a suppositions, necessity, they should easily, when they found it convenient, make that necessity real. It was no hard matter to make the fearful, apprehensive of dangers; and the jealous, of designs; and they wanted not evidence of all kinds; [of] letters from abroad, and discoveries at home, to make those apprehensions formidable enough; and then, though, before the resolution, there was a great latitude in law and reason, what was lawfully to be done, they had now forejudged themselves, and resolved of the proper remedy, except they would argue against the evidence; which usually would have been to discountenance or undervalue some person of notable reputation, or his correspondence; and always to have opposed that that was of such an alloy, as, in truth, did operate upon the major part. So, in the case upon which we now discourse, if they had, in the most advantageous article of their fury, professed the raising an army against the king, there was yet that reverence to majesty, and that spirit of subjection and allegiance in most men, that they would have looked upon it with opposition and horror: but defensive arms were more plausible divinity, and if the king should commit such an outrage, as to levy war against his parliament, to destroy the religion, laws, and liberty of the kingdom, good men were persuaded, that such a resistance might be made, as might preserve the whole; and he that would have argued against this thesis, besides the impertinency of arguing against a supposition, that was not like to be real, and in which the corrupt consideration of safety seemed to bribe most men, could never escape the censure of promoting tyranny and lawless dominion. Then to incline men to concur in the declaration "of the king's intention to make war against the parliament," they were persuaded it might have a good, could have no ill, effect: the remedies, that were to be applied upon an actual levying of war, were not justifiable upon the intention; and the declaring this intention, and the dangers it carried with it to the king himself, and to all those who should assist him, would be a probable means of reforming such intention, and preventing the execution: inconvenience it could produce none, (for the disquieting or displeasing the king was not thought inconvenient,) if there were no progress in the supposed intention; if there were, it were fit the whole kingdom should stand upon its guard, and not be surprised to its confusion.

By these false and fallacious mediums, the clearness of men's understandings were dazzled; and, upon the matter, all their opinions, and judgments for the future, captivated and preengaged by their own votes and determinations. For, how easy a matter was it to make it appear to that man, who consented that the king intended to make war against the parliament, that when he should do it, he had broken his oath, and dissolved his government; and, that whosoever should assist him were traitors; I say, how easy was it to persuade that man, that he was obliged to defend the parliament; to endeavour to uphold that government; and to resist those traitors? and, whosoever considers that the nature of men, especially of men in authority, is inclined rather to commit two errors, than to retract one, will not marvel, that from this root of unadvisedness, so many and tall branches of mischief have proceeded. And therefore it were to be wished, that those, who have the honour to be trusted in public consultations, were endued with so much natural logic, to discern the consequences of every public act and conclusion; and with so much conscience and courage, to watch the first impressions upon [their] understanding and compliance: and, neither out of the impertinency of the thing, which men are too apt to conclude out of impatience of despatch; or out of stratagem to make men odious, (as in this parliament many forbore to oppose unreasonable resolutions, out of an opinion, that they would make the contrivers odious,) or upon any other (though seeming never so politic) considerations, [they] consent to any propositions, by which truth or justice are invaded. And I am confident, with very good warrant, that many men have, from their souls, abhorred every article of this rebellion; and heartily deprecated the miseries and desolation we have suffered by it, who have themselves, with great alacrity and some industry, contributed to, if not contrived, those very votes and conclusions, from whence the evils they abhor have most naturally and regularly flowed, and been deduced; and which they could not reasonably, upon their own concessions, contradict and oppose.

But to conclude, a man shall not unprofitably spend his contemplation, that, upon this occasion, considers the method of God's justice, (a method terribly remarkable in many passages, and upon many persons, which we shall be compelled to remember in this discourse,) that the same principles, and the same application of those principles, should be used to the wresting all sovereign power from the crown, which the crown had a little before made use of for the extending its authority and power beyond its bounds, to the prejudices of the just rights of the subject. A supposed necessity was then thought ground enough to create a power, and a bare averment of that necessity, to beget a practice to impose what tax they thought convenient upon the subject, by writs of ship-money never before known; and a supposed necessity now, and a bare averment of that necessity, is as confidently, and more fatally, concluded a good ground to exclude the crown from the use of any power, by an ordinance never before heard of; and the same maxim of salus populi suprema lex, which had been used to the infringing the liberties of the one, made use of for the destroying the rights of the other: only that of the psalmist is yet inverted; for many of those, who were the principal makers of the first pit, are so far from falling into it, that they have been the chiefest diggers of the second ditch, in which so many have been confounded.

Though they had yet no real apprehension, that the king would be able, in the least degree, to raise a force against them, yet they were heartily enraged to find that he lived more like a king, than they wished he should; that there was so great resort to him from all parts; and that whereas, little more than two months before, his own servants durst hardly avow the waiting on him, now the chief gentlemen of all counties travelled to him, to tender their service; which implied a disapprobation, at least, if not a contempt of their carriage towards him. Therefore, to prevent this mischief, they easily found exception to, and information against, some persons, who had resorted to York; whom they sent the sergeant of the house of commons to apprehend, and bring them before the house as delinquents, to answer such matters as should be objected against them. In this number there was one Beckwith, a gentleman of Yorkshire, who, as sir John Hotham had sent them word, had endeavoured to corrupt some officers of the garrison to deliver Hull up to the king; this they declared to be a very heinous crime, and little less than high treason; and therefore concluded him a delinquent, and to be sent for to attend them: it was thought strangely ridiculous by standers by, that sir John Hotham should be justified for keeping the town against the king, and another gentleman be voted a delinquent for designing to recover it to its allegiance; and that they, who, but few days before, when the king had sent a warrant to require serjeant-major Skippon to attend his majesty at York, resolved, and published their resolutions in print, (as they did all things, which they conceived might diminish the reputation of the king, or his authority,) "that such command from his majesty was against the law of the land, and the liberty of the subject, and likewise (the person being employed by them to attend their service) against the privilege of parliament; and therefore, that their serjeant-major-general of the forces of London (that was his style) should continue to attend the service of both houses according to their former commands;" should expect that their warrant should be submitted to by those, who were waiting on the king, whose known legal authority, severed from any thing that might be understood to relate to the parliament, or its privileges, they had so flatly contradicted and contemned, that the same day on which they redeemed their officer Skippon from his allegiance, and duty of going to the king, being informed, that the king had sent a writ to adjourn the term (Midsummer term) to York from Westminster, which was as much in his power legally to do as to make a knight, they declared, "that the king's removing of the term to York from Westminster, sitting the parliament, was illegal;" and ordered, "that the lord keeper should not issue out any writs, or seal any proclamation, to that purpose;" which was by him observed accordingly, notwithstanding the king's command for the adjournment.

When their officer came to York for the apprehension of the delinquents, he found the same neglect there of the parliament, as he found above of the king; and was so ill intreated by those, whom he looked upon as his prisoners, that, if the king's extraordinary provision had not been interposed, the messenger would scarce have returned to have reported how uncurrent such warrants were like to be in York, and how perilous such voyages might prove to the adventurers: but how amazed or surprised soever they seemed to be with this new contradiction, it was no more than they looked for; for their dilemma was, if their messenger returned with his prize, all the resort to, and all the glory of York was determined; for no man would repair thither, from whence the bare voting him a delinquent would remove him with those other inconvenient circumstances of censure and imprisonment: if he returned neglected and affronted, as they presumed he would, they had a new reproach for the king, "of protecting delinquents against the justice of parliament;" which would be a new breach of their privileges, as heinous and unpopular, as had yet been made, and for the vindication whereof their protestation would no less oblige them, than it had done on the behalf of the five members. And such votes they passed upon the return of their officer; and had in readiness prepared two voluminous declarations to the people, which they published about the same time; in the one filled with all the reiterated complaints, and envenomed repetitions, of what had been done, or been thought to have been done amiss in the whole reign of the king, to render his person odious, or unacceptable; and in the other by undervaluing his royal power, and declaring against it, to make his authority despised, at least not feared.

The first was of the nineteenth of May, in which they declared, "That the infinite mercy and providence of the Almighty God had been abundantly manifested, since the beginning of this parliament, in great variety of protections and blessings; whereby he had not only delivered them from many wicked plots and designs, which, if they had taken effect, would have brought ruin and destruction upon the kingdom; but, out of those attempts, had produced divers evident and remarkable advantages, to the furtherance of those services, which they had been desirous to perform to their sovereign lord the king, and to the church and state, in providing for the public peace, and prosperity of his majesty, and all his realms; which, in the presence of the same all-seeing Deity, they protested to have been, and still to be, the only end of all their counsels and endeavours; wherein they had resolved to continue freed and enlarged from all private aims, personal respects, or passions whatsoever.

"In which resolution, they said, they were nothing discouraged, although the heads of the malignant party disappointed of their prey, the religion and liberty of the kingdom, which they were ready to seize upon and devour before the beginning of this parliament, had still persisted, by new practices, both of force and subtilty, to recover the same again; for which purpose they had made several attempts for bringing up the army; they afterwards projected the false accusation of the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the house of commons, which being in itself of an odious nature, they had yet so far prevailed with his majesty, as to procure him to take it upon himself; but when the unchangeable duty and faithfulness of the parliament could not be wrought upon, by such a fact as that, to withdraw any part of their reverence and obedience from his majesty, they had, with much art and industry, advised his majesty to suffer divers unjust scandals and imputations upon the parliament, to be published in his name, whereby they might make it odious to the people, and, by their help, to destroy that, which hitherto had been the only means of their own preservation.

"For this purpose, they had drawn his majesty into the northern parts far from the parliament; that so false rumours might have time to get credit, and the just defences of the parliament find a more tedious, difficult, and disadvantageous access, after those false imputations and slanders had been first rooted in the apprehension of his majesty and his subjects; which the more speedily to effect, they had caused a press

“ by the most ancient law of the kingdom, even “ that which is fundamental and essential to the “ constitution and subsistence of it.
 “ Although they never desired, they said, to “ encourage his majesty to such replies as might “ produce any contestation between him and his “ parliament, of which they never found better “ effect, than loss of time, and hinderance of the “ public affairs; yet they had been far from telling “ him of how little value his words would be with “ them, much less when they were accompanied “ with actions of love and justice. They said, he “ had more reason to find fault with those wicked “ counsellors, who had so often bereaved him of “ the honour, and his people of the fruit of many “ gracious speeches, which he had made to them,
 “ such as those in the end of the last parliament;
 “ that, in the word of a king, and as he was a “ gentleman, he would redress the grievances of “ his people, as well out of parliament as in it.

 “ and Mr. Crew; the continued oppressions by “ ship-money, coat and conduct money; with the “ manifold imprisonments, and other vexations “ thereupon, and other ensuing violations of the “ laws and liberties of the kingdom, (all which “ were the effects of evil counsel, and abundantly “ declared in their remonstrance of the state of the “ suitable to such words as those?

 “ As gracious was his majesty’s speech in the “ beginning of this parliament; that he was re“ solved to put himself freely and clearly upon the “ love and affection of his English subjects. They “ asked whether his causeless complaints and jea-

 “ of love and justice, than those in his answer to “ the message sent to the house of commons, the “ thirty-first of December, 1641: We do engage “ unto you solemnly the word of a king, that the “ security of all and every one of you from violence “ is, and ever shall be, as much our care, as the “ preservation of us, and our children? And could

 “ than that of the attorney general, in falsely “ accusing the six members of parliament, and the “ other proceedings thereupon, within three or four “ days after that message? For the full view “ whereof, they desired the declaration made of “ those proceedings might be perused; and by “ those instances (they could add many more) the “ world might judge who deserved to be taxed “ with disvaluing his majesty’s words, they who “ Amongst divers writings of that kind, they “ said, they, the lords and commons in parliament, “ had taken into their consideration two printed “ papers; the first containing a declaration, which “ they had received from his majesty, in answer to “ that which had been presented to his majesty

 “ from both houses at Newmarket, the ninth of “ March, 1641; the other, his majesty’s answer “ to the petition of both houses, presented to his “ majesty the twenty-sixth of March, 1642. Both “ which were filled with harsh censures, and cause“ less charges upon the parliament; concerning “ which they held it necessary to give satisfaction
 “ to the kingdom; seeing they found it very diffi“ cult to satisfy his majesty, whom, to their great “ grief, they had found to be so engaged to, and “ possessed by those misapprehensions, which evil “ counsellors have wrought in him, that their most “ humble and faithful remonstrances had rather “ irritated and embittered, than any thing allayed, “ or mitigated, the sharp expressions, which his “ majesty had been pleased to make in answer to “ them; for the manifestation whereof, and of their “ own innocence, they desired that all his majesty’s “ loving subjects might take notice of these “ particulars:
 “ They knew no occasion given by them, which “ might move his majesty to tell them, that in “ their declaration, presented at Newmarket, there “ were some expressions different from the usual “ language to princes: neither did they tell his “ majesty, either in words or in effect, that if he “ did not join with them in an act, which he con“ ceived might prove prejudicial and dangerous to “ himself and the whole kingdom, they would make “ a law without him, and impose it upon the people.
 “ That which they desired, they said, was, that, in “ regard of the imminent danger of the kingdom, “ the militia, for the security of his majesty and his “ people, might be put under the command of such “ noble and faithful persons, as they had all cause
 “ to confide in: and such was the necessity of this “ preservation, that they declared, that, if his ma“ jesty should refuse to join with them therein,
 “ the two houses of parliament, being the supreme “ court, and highest council of the kingdom, were “ enabled, by their own authority, to provide for “ the repulsing of such imminent and evident dan“ ger, not by any new law of their own making, as “ had been untruly suggested to his majesty, but

"The king, they said, had been pleased to disavow the having any such evil counsel or counsellors, as were mentioned in their declaration, to his knowledge; and they held it their duty humbly to avow there were such; or else they must say, that all the ill things done of late in his majesty's name had been done by himself; wherein they should neither follow the direction of the law, nor the affection of their own hearts, which was, as much as might be, to clear his majesty from all imputation of misgovernment, and to lay the fault upon his ministers. The false accusing of six members of parliament; the justifying Mr. Attorney, in that false accusation; the violent coming to the house of commons; the denial of the militia; the sharp messages to both houses, contrary to the customs of former kings; the long and remote absence of his majesty from parliament; the heavy and wrongful taxes upon both houses; the cherishing and countenancing a discontented party in the kingdom against them, were certainly the fruits of very evil counsels, apt to put the kingdom into a combustion, to hinder the supplies of Ireland, and to countenance the proceedings and pretensions of the rebels there: and the authors of these evil counsels, they conceived, must needs be known to his majesty; and they hoped their labouring with his majesty, to have those discovered, and brought to a just censure, would not so much wound his honour in the opinion of his good subjects, as his labouring to preserve and conceal them.

"And whereas his majesty had said, he could wish that his own immediate actions, which he avowed, and his own honour, might not be so roughly censured under that common style of evil counsellors; they said, that they could also heartily wish that they had not cause to make that style so common; but how often and undutifully soever those wicked counsellors should fix their dishonour upon the king, by making his majesty the author of those evil actions, which were the effects of their own evil counsels, they, his majesty's loyal and dutiful subjects, could use no other style, according to that maxim of the law, the king can do no wrong; but if any ill were committed in matter of state, the council; if in matter of justice, the judges must answer for it.

"They said, they had laid no charge upon his majesty, which should put him upon that apology, concerning his faithful and jealous affection of the protestant profession: neither did his majesty endeavour to clear those in greatest authority about him, by whom they had said that design had been potentially carried on for divers years; and they rather wished that the mercies of heaven, than the judgments, might be manifested upon them; but that there had been such, there were such plentiful and frequent evidences, that they believed there was none, either protestant or papist, who had had any reasonable view of the passages of latter times, but, either in fear or hope, did expect a sudden issue of that design.

"They said, they had no way transgressed against the Act of Oblivion, by remembering the intended war against Scotland, as a branch of that design to alter religion by those wicked counsels, from which God did then deliver them, which they ought never to forget.

"That the rebellion in Ireland was framed and cherished by the popish and malignant party in England, was not only affirmed by the rebels, but, they said, might be cleared by many other proofs: the same rebellious principles of pretended religion, the same politic ends were apparent in both, and their malicious designs and practices were masked and disguised with the same false colour of their earnest zeal to vindicate his majesty's prerogative, from the supposed oppression of the parliament. How much those treacherous pretences had been countenanced, by some evil council about his majesty, might appear in this, that the proclamation, whereby they were declared traitors, was so long withheld, as to the second of January, though the rebellion brake forth in October before, and then no more than forty copies appointed to be printed; with a special command from his majesty not to exceed that number; and that none of them should be published, till his majesty's pleasure was further signified, as by the warrant appears, a true copy whereof was annexed to this declaration; so that a few only could take notice of it; which was made more observable, by the late contrary proceedings against the Scots, who were in a very quick and sharp manner proclaimed; and those proclamations forthwith dispersed, with as much diligence as might be, throughout all the kingdom, and ordered to be read in all churches, accompanied with public prayers and execrations. Another evidence of favour and countenance to the rebels in some of power about his majesty, was this, that they had put forth, in his majesty's name, a causeless complaint against the parliament, which speaks the same language of the parliament which the rebels do, thereby to raise a belief in men's minds, that his majesty's affections were alienated, as well as his person was removed, from that his great council. All which, they said, did exceedingly retard the supplies of Ireland, and more advance the proceedings of the rebels, than any jealousy or misapprehension begotten in his subjects, by the declaration of the rebels, injunction of Rosetti, or information of Tristram Whetcomb; so that, considering the present state and temper of both kingdoms, his royal presence was far more necessary here, than it could be in Ireland, for redemption or protection of his subjects there.

"And whether there were cause of his majesty's great indignation, for being reproached to have intended force or threatening to the parliament, they desired them to consider who should read their declaration, in which there was no word tending to any such reproach; and certainly, they said, they had been more tender of his majesty's honour in that point, than he, whosoever he was, that did write that declaration; where, in his majesty's name, he did call God to witness, he never had any such thought, or knew of any such resolution of bringing up the army; which truly, they said, would seem strange to those, who should read the deposition of Mr. Goring, information of Mr. Percy, and divers other examinations of Mr. Wilmot, Mr. Pollard, and others; the other examination of Captain Leg, sir Jacob Ashley, and sir John Conyers; and consider the condition and nature of the petition, which was sent unto sir Jacob Ashley, under the approbation of C. R. which his majesty had now

"acknowledged to be his own hand; and, being "full of scandal to the parliament, might have "proved dangerous to the whole kingdom, if the "army should have interposed betwixt the king
"and them, as was desired.

"They did not affirm that his majesty's warrant "was granted for the passage of Mr. Jermyn, after "the desire of both houses for restraint of his ser"vants; but only that he did pass over, after that "restraint, by virtue of such a warrant. They "knew the warrant bore date the day before their "desire; yet, they said, it seemed strange to those,
"who knew how great respect and power Mr.
"Jermyn had in court, that he should begin his "journey in such haste, and in apparel so unfit for "travel, as a black satin suit, and white boots, if "his going away was designed the day before.

"The accusation of the lord Kimbolton, and the "five members of the house of commons, was "called a breach of privilege; and truly so it was,
"and a very high one, far above any satisfaction
"that had been yet given: for, they asked, how it "could be said to be largely satisfied, so long as "his majesty laboured to preserve Mr. Attorney "from punishment, who was the visible actor in it?
"So long as his majesty had not only justified
"him, but by his letter declared, that it was his "duty to accuse them, and that he would have "punished him, if he had not done it? So long as "those members had not the means of clearing
"their innocence, and the authors of that mali"cious charge undiscovered, though both houses "of parliament had several times petitioned his "majesty to discover them, and that, not only upon
"grounds of common justice, but by act of parlia"ment, his majesty was bound to do it? So long "as the king refused to pass a bill for their dis"charge, alleging that the narrative in that bill "was against his honour; whereby he seemed still
"to avow the matter of that false and scandalous
"accusation, though he deserted the prosecution,
"offering to pass a bill for their acquittal; yet
"with intimation that they must desert the avow-
"ing their own innocence, which would more
"wound them in honour, than secure them in law?
"And in vindication of that great privilege of parlia"ment, they did not know that they had in"vaded any privilege belonging to his majesty, as "had been alleged in that declaration.

"But, they said, they looked not upon that only "in the notion of a breach of privilege, which "might be, though the accusation were true or "false; but under the notion of a heinous crime
"in the attorney, and all other subjects, who had "a hand in it; a crime against the law of nature,
"against the rules of justice; that innocent men
"should be charged with so great an offence as "treason, in the face of the highest judicatory of "the kingdom, whereby their lives and estates,
"their blood and honour, were endangered, with"out witness, without evidence, without all possi"bility of reparation in a legal course; yet a crime
"of such a nature, that his majesty's command can
"so more warrant, than it can any other act of "injustice. These things, which were evil in their "own nature, such as a false testimony, or false
"accusation, could not be the subject of any com"mand, or induce any obligation of obedience
"upon any man, by any authority whatsoever:
"therefore the attorney, in that case, was bound
"to have refused to execute such a command,

"unless he had some such evidence or testimony,
"as might have warranted him against the parties,
"and be liable to make satisfaction, if it should "prove false; and it was sufficiently known to "every man, and adjudged in parliament, that the "king could be neither the relater, informer, or "witness. If it should rest as it was, without "further satisfaction, no future parliament could "be safe, but that the members might be taken,
"and destroyed at pleasure; yea the very prin"ciples of government and justice would be in "danger to be dissolved.

"They said, they did not conceive, that numbers
"did make an assembly unlawful, but when either
"the end, or manner of their carriage should be "unlawful. Divers just occasions might draw the "citizens to Westminster; where many public and "private petitions, and other causes, were depend"ing in parliament; and why that should be found "more faulty in the citizens, than the resort every "day in the term of great numbers to the ordinary
"courts of justice, they knew not: that those citi"zens were notoriously provoked, and assaulted at "Westminster by colonel Lunsford, captain Hyde,
"and others, and by some of the servants of the "archbishop of York, was sufficiently proved;
"and that afterwards they were more violently
"wounded, and most barbarously mangled with "swords, by the officers and soldiers near White"hall, many of them being without weapons, and "giving no cause of distaste, was likewise proved
"by several testimonies; but of any scandalous
"or seditious misdemeanours of theirs, that might "give his majesty good cause to suppose his own
"person, or those of his royal consort or children,
"to be in apparent danger, they had no proof ever "offered to either house; and if there had been "any complaint of that kind, it was no doubt the "houses would have been as forward to join in "an order, for the suppressing of such tumults,
"as they were, not long before, upon another "occasion, when they made an order to that pur"pose; whereas those officers and soldiers, which "committed that violence upon so many of the "citizens at Whitehall, were cherished and fostered
"in his majesty's house; and when, not long after,
"the common council of London presented a peti"tion to his majesty for reparation of those inju"ries, his majesty's answer was, without hearing
"the proof of the complainants, that if any citizen "were wounded, or ill entreated, his majesty was "confidently assured, that it happened by their "own evil and corrupt demeanours.

"They said, they hoped, it could not be thought
"contrary to the duty and wisdom of a parliament,
"if many concurring, and frequently reiterated
"and renewed advertisements from Rome, Venice,
"Paris, and other parts, if the solicitations of the "pope's nuncio, and their own discontented fugi"tives, did make them jealous and watchful for "the safety of the state: and they had been very "careful to make their expressions thereof so easy,
"and so plain to the capacity and understanding "of the people, that nothing might justly stick "with them, with reflection upon the person of his "majesty: wherein they appealed to the judgment "of any indifferent person, who should read and
"peruse their own words.

"They said, they must maintain the ground of "their fears to be of that moment, that they could "not discharge the trust and duty that lay upon “ them, unless they did apply themselves to the use “ of those means, to which the law had enabled “ them in cases of that nature, for the necessary “ defence of the kingdom ; and as his majesty did “ graciously declare, that the law should be the “ measure of his power ; so did they most heartily “ profess, that they should always make it the rule “ of their obedience. Then they observed, that “ there were certain prudent omissions in his ma-“ jesty’s answer ; and said, that the next point of “ their declaration was, with much caution, arti“ ficially passed over by him who drew his ma-“ jesty’s answer ; it being indeed the foundation “ of all their misery, and his majesty’s trouble, “ that he was pleased to hear general taxes upon

 “ his parliament, without any particular charge, “ to which they might give satisfaction ; and that “ he had often conceived displeasure against par“ ticular persons, upon misinformation ; and al“ though those informations had been clearly “ proved to be false, yet he would never bring “ the accusers to question ; which did lay an im“ possibility upon honest men of clearing them“ selves, and gave an encouragement to false and “ unworthy persons to trouble him with untrue
 “ and groundless informations. Three particulars
 “ they had mentioned in their declaration, which “ the penner of his majesty’s answer had good “ cause to omit : the words supposed to be spoken
 “ at Kensington ; the pretended articles against “ the queen ; and the groundless accusation of “ the six members of the parliament ; there being “ nothing to be said in defence, or denial of any “ of them.

“ Concerning his majesty’s desire to join with “ his parliament, and with his faithful subjects, in “ defence of religion, and public good of the king“ dom, they said, they doubted not he would do it “ fully, when evil counsellors should be removed “ from about him ; and until that should be, as “ they had shewed before of words, so must they “ also say of laws, that they could not secure “ them : witness the Petition of Right, which had “ been followed with such an inundation of illegal “ taxes, that they had just cause to think, that the “ payment of eight hundred and twenty thousand “ pounds, was an easy burden to the common“ wealth in exchange of them ; and they could not “ but justly think, that if there were a continuance “ of such ill counsellors, and favour to them, they “ would, by some wicked device or other, make “ the bill for the triennial parliament, and those “ other excellent laws mentioned in his majesty’s “ declaration, of less value than words. That ex“ cellent bill for the continuance of this parliament, “ they said, was so necessary, that without it they “ could not have raised so great sums of money “ for the service of his majesty and the common“ wealth, as they had done, and without which the “ ruin and destruction of the kingdom must needs “ have followed : and, they were resolved, the “ gracious favour of his majesty, expressed in that “ bill, and the advantage and security which thereby
 “ they had from being dissolved, should not encour“ age them to do any thing, which otherwise had “ not been fit to have been done. And they were “ ready to make it good before all the world, that “ although his majesty had passed many bills very “ advantageous for the subject, yet in none of “ them had they bereaved his majesty of any just, “ necessary, or profitable prerogative of the crown.

“ They said, they so earnestly desired his ma-“ jesty’s return to London, that upon it, they con“ ceived, depended the very safety and being of “ both his kingdoms : and therefore they must “ protest, that, as for the time past, neither the “ government of London, nor any laws of the land, “ had lost their life and force for his security, so
 “ for the future they should be ready to do or say “ any thing, that might stand with the duty or “ honour of a parliament, which might raise a “ mutual confidence between his majesty and them,
 “ as they did wish, and as the affairs of the king“ dom did require.

“ Thus far, they said, the answer to that, which “ was called his majesty’s declaration, had led “ them. Now they came to that, which was “ entitled his majesty’s answer to the petition of “ both houses, presented to him at York, the “ twenty-sixth of March, 1642. In the beginning “ whereof, his majesty wished, that their privileges “ on all parts were so stated, that that way of “ correspondence might be preserved with that “ freedom, which had been used of old. They said, “ they knew nothing introduced by them, that “ gave any impediment thereunto ; neither had “ they affirmed their privileges to be broken, when “ his majesty denied them any thing, or gave a “ reason why he could not grant it ; or that those,
 “ who advised such denial, were enemies to the “ peace of the kingdom, and favourers of the Irish “ rebellion ; in which aspersion, that was turned to “ a general assertion, which, in their votes, was “ applied to a particular case ; wherefore they must “ maintain their votes, that those who advised his “ majesty to contradict that, which both houses, “ in the question concerning the militia, had de“ clared to be law, and command it should not “ be obeyed, is a high breach of privilege, and that “ those, who advised his majesty to absent himself
 “ from his parliament, were enemies to the peace “ of the kingdom, and justly to be suspected to be “ favourers of the rebellion in Ireland. The rea“ sons of both were evident, because in the first
 “ there was as great a derogation from the trust
 “ and authority of parliament ; and, in the second,
 “ as much advantage to the proceedings and hopes
 “ of the rebels, as might be ; and they held it a “ very causeless imputation upon the parliament, “ that they had therein any way impeached, much “ less taken away the freedom of his majesty’s “ vote ; which did not import a liberty in his ma“ jesty, to deny any thing how necessary soever
 “ for the preservation of the kingdom, much less a “ license to evil counsellors, to advise any thing, “ though never so destructive to his majesty and “ his people.

“ By the message of the twentieth of January,
 “ his majesty had propounded to both houses of “ parliament, that they would, with all speed, fall “ into a serious consideration of all those particulars “ which they thought necessary, as well for the “ upholding and maintaining of his majesty’s just
 “ and regal authority, and for the settling his “ revenue, as for the present and future establishing “ their privileges ; the free and quiet enjoying “ their estates ; the liberties of their persons ; the “ security of the true religion, professed in the “ church of England ; and the settling of cere“ monies, in such a manner, as might take away
 “ all just offence, and to digest it into one entire “ body.

“ To that point of upholding and maintaining his royal authority, they said, nothing had been done to the prejudice of it, that should require any new provision : to the other of settling the revenue, the parliament had no way abridged or disordered his just revenue ; but it was true, that much waste and confusion of his majesty’s estate had been made by those evil and unfaithful ministers, whom he had employed in the managing of it ; whereby his own ordinary expenses would have been disappointed, and the safety of the kingdom more endangered, if the parliament had not, in some measure, provided for his household, and for some of the forts, more than they were bound to do ; and they were still willing to settle such a revenue upon his majesty, as might make him live royally, plentifully, and safely ; but they could not, in wisdom and fidelity to the commonwealth, do that, till he should choose such counsellors and officers, as might order and dispose it to the public good, and not apply it to the ruin and destruction of his people, as heretofore it had been. But that, and the other matters concerning themselves, being works of great importance, and full of intricacy, would require so long a time of deliberation, that the kingdom might be ruined before they could effect them : therefore they thought it necessary, first to be suitors to his majesty, so to order the militia, that, the kingdom being secured, they might, with more ease and safety, apply themselves to debate of that message, wherein they had been interrupted, by his majesty’s denial of the ordinance concerning the same ; because it would have been in vain for them to labour in other things, and in the mean time to leave themselves naked to the malice of so many enemies, both at home and abroad ; yet they had not been altogether negligent of those things, which his majesty had been pleased to propound in that message : they had agreed upon a book of rates in a larger proportion, than had been granted to any of his majesty’s predecessors, which was a considerable support of his majesty’s public charge ; and had likewise prepared divers propositions, and bills, for preservation of their religion and liberties, which they intended shortly to present to his majesty ; and to do whatsoever was fit for them, to make up that unpleasant breach between his majesty and the parliament.

“ Whereas divers exceptions had been taken concerning the militia ; first, that his majesty never denied the thing, but accepted the persons, (except for corporations,) only that he denied the way ; to which they answered, that that exception took off London, and all other great towns and cities, which makes a great part of the kingdom ; and for the way of ordinance, it is ancient, more speedy, more easily alterable, and, in all these and other respects, more proper, and more applicable to the present occasion, than a bill ; which his majesty called the good old way of imposing upon the subjects. It should seem, that neither his majesty’s royal predecessors, nor their ancestors, had heretofore been of that opinion ; 37 Edw. III. they said, they found this record : The chancellor made declaration of the challenge of the parliament ; the king desires to know the griefs of his subjects, and to redress enormities. The last day “ of the parliament, the king demanded of the whole estates, whether they would have such things as they agreed on, by way of ordinance, or statute ? who answered, by way of ordinance, for that they might amend the same at their pleasures ; and so it was.

“ But his majesty objected further, that there was somewhat in the preface, to which he could not consent with justice to his honour and innocence ; and that thereby he was excluded from any power in the disposing of it. These objections, they said, might seem somewhat, but indeed would appear nothing, when it should be considered, that nothing in the preamble laid any charge upon his majesty, or in the body of the ordinance, that excludes his royal authority in the disposing or execution of it : but only it was provided, that it should be signified by both houses of parliament, as that channel, through which it would be best derived, and most certainly to those ends for which it was intended ; and let all the world judge whether they had not reason to insist upon it, that the strength of the kingdom should rather be ordered according to the advice or direction of the great council of the land, intrusted by the king, and by the kingdom, than that the safety of the king, parliament, and kingdom, should be left at the devotion of a few unknown counsellors, many of them not intrusted at all by the king in any public way, nor at all confided in by the kingdom.

“ They wished the danger were not imminent, or not still continuing, but could not conceive, that the long time spent in that debate was evidence sufficient, that there was no such necessity or danger, but a bill might easily have been prepared ; for, when many causes do concur to the danger of a state, the interruption of any one might hinder the execution of the rest, and yet the design be still kept on foot, for better opportunities. Who knew, whether the ill success of the rebels in Ireland had not hindered the insurrection of the papists here ? Whether the preservation of the six members of the parliament, falsely accused, had not prevented that plot of the breaking the neck of this parliament, of which they were informed from France, not long before they were accused ; yet since his majesty had been pleased to express his pleasure rather for a bill, than an ordinance, and that he sent in one for that purpose, they readily entertained it ; and, with some small and necessary alterations, speedily passed the same. But contrary to the custom of parliament, and their expectation, grounded upon his majesty’s own invitation of them to that way, and the other reasons manifested in their declaration concerning the militia, of the fifth of May, instead of the royal assent, they met with an absolute refusal.

“ For their votes of the fifteenth and sixteenth of March, they said, if the matter of those votes were according to law, they hoped his majesty would allow the subjects to be bound by them, because he had said, he would make the law the rule of his power ; and if the question were, whether that were law, which the lords and commons had once declared to be so, who should be the judge ? Not his majesty ; for the king judgeth not of matters of law, but by his courts ; and his courts, though sitting by his authority, "expected not his assent in matters of law: not any other courts; for they could not judge in that case, because they were inferior, no appeal lying to them from parliament, the judgment whereof is, in the eye of the law, the king's judgment in his highest court, though the king in his person be neither present, nor assenting thereunto.

"The votes at which his majesty took exception were these:

1. "That the king's absence so far remote from his parliament, was not only an obstruction, but might prove a destruction to the affairs of Ireland.

2. "That when the lords and commons shall declare what the law of the land is, to have this not only questioned and controverted, but contradicted, and a command that it should not be obeyed, was a high breach of the privilege of parliament.

3. "That those persons, who advised his majesty to absent himself from the parliament, are enemies to the peace of the kingdom, and justly may be suspected to be favourers of the rebellion in Ireland.

4. "That the kingdom had been of late, and still was, in so eminent danger, both from enemies abroad, and a popish and discontented party at home, that there was an urgent and inevitable necessity of putting his majesty's subjects into a posture of defence, for the safeguard both of his majesty and his people.

5. "That the lords and commons, fully apprehending this danger, and being sensible of their own duty, to provide a suitable prevention, had, in several petitions, addressed themselves to his majesty, for the ordering and disposing the militia of the kingdom in such a way, as was agreed, by the wisdom of both houses, to be most effectual, and proper for the present exigence of the kingdom, yet could not obtain it; but his majesty did, several times, refuse to give his royal assent thereunto.

6. "That, in this case of extreme danger, and his majesty's refusal, the ordinance of parliament, agreed upon by both houses, for the militia, doth oblige the people, and ought to be obeyed, by the fundamental laws of this kingdom.

"By all which, they said, it did appear, that there had been no colour of that tax, that they went about to introduce a new law, much less to exercise an arbitrary power, but indeed to prevent it: for this law was as old as the kingdom; that the kingdom must not be without a means to preserve itself; which that it might be done without confusion, this nation had intrusted certain hands with a power to provide, in an orderly and regular way, for the good and safety of the whole; which power, by the constitution of the kingdom, was in his majesty, and in his parliament together: yet since the prince, being but one person, is more subject to accidents of nature and chance, whereby the commonwealth may be deprived of the fruit of that trust, which was, in part, reposed in him; in cases of such necessity, that the kingdom may not be enforced presently to return to its first principles, and every man left to do what is right in his own eyes, without either guide or rule; the wisdom of this state

"hath intrusted the houses of parliament with a power to supply what should be wanting on the part of the prince, as is evident by the constant custom and practice thereof, in cases of nonage, natural disability, and captivity; and the like reason doth and must hold for the exercise of the same power in such cases, where the royal trust cannot be, or is not discharged, and that the kingdom runs an evident and imminent danger thereby; which danger having been declared by the lords and commons in parliament, there needs not the authority of any person or court to affirm, nor is it in the power of any person or court to revoke that judgment.

"They said, they knew the king had ways enough, in his ordinary courts of justice, to punish such seditious pamphlets and sermons, as were any ways prejudicial to his rights, honour, and authority; and if any of them had been so insolently violated and vilified, his majesty's own council and officers had been to blame, and not the parliament: they never had restrained any proceedings of that kind in other courts, nor refused any fit complaint to them. The Protestation Protested had been referred by the commons' house to a committee, and, the author being not produced, the printer committed to prison, and the book voted by that committee to be burned; but sir Edward Deering, who was to make that report of the votes of that committee, neglected to make it. The Apprentices' Protestation was never complained of: but the other seditious pamphlet, To your tents, O Israel, was once questioned, and the full prosecution of it was not interrupted by any fault of either house, whose forwardness to do his majesty all right therein might plainly appear, in that a committee of lords and commons was purposely appointed, to take such informations as the king's council should present concerning seditious words, practices, or tumults, pamphlets or sermons, tending to the derogation of his majesty's rights or prerogative, and his council had been enjoined by that committee, to inquire and present them; who several times met thereupon, and received this answer and declaration from the king's council, that they knew of no such thing as yet.

"They said, if his majesty had used the service of such a one in penning that answer, who understood the laws and government of this kingdom, he would not have thought it legally in his power to deny his parliament a guard, when they stood in need of it; since every ordinary court hath it: neither would his majesty, if he had been well informed of the laws, have refused such a guard as they desired, it being in the power of inferior courts to command their own guard; neither would he have imposed upon them such a guard, under a commander which they could not have confided in; which is clearly against the privileges of parliament, and of which they found very dangerous effects; and therefore desired to have it discharged; but such a guard, and so commanded, as the houses of parliament desired, they could never obtain of his majesty; and the placing a guard about them, contrary to their desire, was not to grant a guard to them, but in effect to set one upon them: all which considered, they believed, in the judgment of any indifferent persons, it would “not be thought strange, if there were a more “than ordinary resort of people at Westminster, “of such as came willingly, of their own accord,

 “to be witnesses and helpers of the safety of “them, whom all his majesty’s good subjects are “bound to defend from violence and danger; or “that such a concourse as that (they carrying “themselves quietly and peaceably, as they did) “ought in his majesty’s apprehension, or could,
 “in the interpretation of the law, be held tu-“multuary and seditious.

“They said, when his majesty, in that question
 “of violation of the laws, had expressed the obser“vation of them indefinitely, without any limita“tion of time, although they never said, or thought “any thing, that might look like a reproach to his “majesty, yet they had reason to remember that “it had been otherwise, lest they should seem to “desert their former complaints, and proceedings “thereupon, as his majesty did seem but little to “like or approve of them: for though he did ac“knowledge here that great mischief, that grew
 “by that arbitrary power then complained of; yet
 “such were continually preferred and counte“nanced, as were friends or favourers, or related “unto the chief authors and actors of that arbi“trary power, and of those false colours, and “suggestions of imminent danger and necessity, “whereby they did make it plausible unto his “majesty: and, on the other side, such as did ap“pear against them were daily discountenanced
 “and disgraced: which whilst it should be so,
 “they had no reason to believe the disease to be “yet killed, and dead at root, and therefore no “reason to bury it in oblivion; and, whilst they “beheld the spawns of those mischievous princi“ples cherished and fostered in that new genera“tion of counsellors, friends, and abettors of the “former, or at least concurring with them in their “malignancy against the proceedings of this par“liament, they could not think themselves secure “from the like, or a worse danger.

“They observed, the penner of his majesty’s “answer bestowed here an admonition upon the “parliament, bidding them take heed they fell not “upon the same error, upon the same suggestions;
 “but, they said, he might well have spared that,
 “till he could have shewed wherein they had exer“cised any power, otherwise than by the rule of “the law; or could have found a more authentic,
 “or a higher judge in matters of law, than the “high court of parliament.

“It was declared, in his majesty’s name, that “he resolved to keep the rule himself, and, to his “power, to require the same of all others. They “said, they must needs acknowledge, that such a “resolution was like to bring much happiness and “blessing to his majesty, and all his kingdoms; “yet, with humility, they must confess, they had “not the fruit of it in that case of the lord Kim-“bolton, and the other five members, accused con“trary to law, both common law and the statute “law; and yet remained unsatisfied: which case
 “had been remembered, in their declaration, as a “strange and unheard of violation of their laws:
 “but the penner of that answer thought fit to “pass it over, hoping that many would read
 “his majesty’s answer, which had been so care“fully dispersed, who would not read their de“claration.

“Whereas, after their ample thanks and ac“knowledge of his majesty’s favour in passing “many good bills, they had said, that truth and “necessity enforced them to add this, that in or “about the time of passing those bills, some design

 “or other had been on foot, which, if it had taken “effect, would not only have deprived them of the “fruit of those bills, but would have reduced them “to a worse condition of confusion, than that “wherein the parliament found them: it was now “told them, that the king must be most sensible “of what they cast upon him, for requital of those “good bills; whereas, out of their usual tender“ness of his majesty’s honour, they did not men“tion him at all; but so injurious, they said, were “those wicked counsellors to the name and honour “of their master and sovereign, that, as much as “they could, they laid their own infamy and guilt “upon his shoulders.

“Here, they observed, God also was called to “witness his majesty’s upright intentions at the “passing of those laws; which, they said, they “would not question, neither did they give any “occasion of such a solemn asseveration as that “was; the Devil was likewise defied to prove
 “there was any design, with his majesty’s know“ledge or privity. That might well have been “spared; for they spake nothing of his majesty:
 “but since they were so far taxed, as to have it “affirmed, that they had laid a false and notorious “imputation upon his majesty, they thought it “necessary, for the just defence of their own inno“cency, to cause the oaths and examinations, “which had been taken, concerning the design, to “be published in a full narration, for satisfaction “of all his majesty’s subjects; out of which they “would now offer some few particulars, whereby
 “the world might judge, whether they could pro“ceed with more tenderness towards his majesty,
 “than they had done. Mr. Goring confessed, “that the king first asked him, whether he were “engaged in any cabal concerning the army? and “commanded him to join with Mr. Percy, and “Mr. Jermyn, and some others whom they should “find at Mr. Percy’s chamber; where they took “the oath of secrecy, and then debated of a design “proposed by Mr. Jermyn, to secure the Tower, “and to consider of bringing up the army to “London: and captain Leg confessed, he had re“ceived the draught of a petition, in the king’s “presence; and his majesty acknowledgeth, it “was from his own hand: and whosoever reads
 “the sum of that petition, as it was proved by the “testimony of sir Jacob Ashley, sir John Conyers,
 “and captain Leg, will easily perceive some points
 “in it, apt to beget in them some discontents
 “against the parliament. And could any man “believe there was no design in the accusation of “the lord Kimbolton, and the rest, in which his “majesty doth avow himself to be both a com“mander and an actor? These things being so,
 “it would easily appear to be as much against the “rules of prudence, that the penner of that answer “should entangle his majesty in that unnecessary
 “apology, as it was against the rules of justice,
 “that any reparation from them should be either “yielded or demanded.

“It was professed, in his majesty’s name, that “he is truly sensible of the burdens of his people;
 “which made them hope that he would take that “course, which would be most effectual to ease “them of those burdens; that was, to join with his “parliament in preserving the peace of the kingdom, which, by his absence from them, had been much endangered; and which, by hindering the voluntary adventures for the recovery of Ireland, and disabling the subjects to discharge the great tax imposed on them, was like to make the war much more heavy to the kingdom. And for his majesty’s wants, the parliament had been no cause of them; they had not diminished his just revenue, but had much eased his public charge, and somewhat his private; and they should be ready, in a parliamentary way, to settle his revenue in such an honourable proportion, as might be answerable to both, when he should put himself into such a posture of government, that his subjects might be secure to enjoy his just protection for their religion, laws, and liberties.

“They said, they never refused his majesty’s gracious offer, of a free and general pardon; only they said, it could be no security to their present fears and jealousies: and they gave a reason for it; that those fears did not arise out of any guilt of their own actions, but out of the evil designs and attempts of others; and they left the world to judge, whether they therein had deserved so heavy a tax and exclamation? (That it was a strange world, when princes’ proffered favours were counted reproaches: such were the words of his majesty’s answer,) who did esteem that offer as an act of princely grace and bounty, which, since the parliament began, they had humbly desired they might obtain, and did still hold it very necessary and advantageous for the generality of the subject, upon whom the taxes and subsidies lie heaviest: but, they said, they saw, upon every occasion, how unhappy they were in his majesty’s misapprehensions of their words and actions.

“They said, they were fully of the king’s mind, as it was there declared, that he might rest so secure of the affections of his subjects, that he should not stand in need of foreign force to preserve him from oppression; and were confident, that he should never want an abundant evidence of the good wishes and assistance of his whole kingdom; especially if he would be pleased to hold to that gracious resolution of building upon that sure foundation, the law of the land: but why his majesty should take it ill, that they, having received informations so deeply concerning the safety of the kingdom, and should think them fit to be considered of, they could not conceive; for although the name of the person was unknown, yet that which was more substantial to the probability of the report was known, that is, that he was servant to the lord Digby; who, in his presumptuous letter to the queen’s majesty, and other letters to sir Lewis Dives, had intimated some wicked proposition, suitable to that information; but that this should require reparation, they held it as far from justice, as it was from truth, that they had mixed any malice with those rumours, thereby to feed the fears and jealousies of the people.

“It was affirmed, that his majesty was driven from them, but not by them; yet perchance, they said, hereafter, if there should be opportunity of gaining more credit, there would not be wanting who would suggest unto his majesty, that it was done by them: and if his majesty were driven from them, they hoped it was not

“by his own fears, but by the fears of the lord Digby, and his retinue of cavaliers; and that no fears of any tumultuary violence, but of their just punishment for their manifold insolence, and intended violence against the parliament: and this was expressed by the lord Digby himself, when he told those cavaliers, that the principal cause of his majesty’s going out of town, was to save them from being trampled in the dirt: but of his majesty’s person there was no cause of fear; in the greatest heat of the people’s indignation, after the accusation, and his majesty’s violent coming to the house, there was no show of any evil intention against his regal person; of which there could be no better evidence than this, that he came the next day without a guard into the city, where he heard nothing but prayers and petitions, no threatenings, or irreverent speeches, that might give him any just occasions of fear, that they had heard of, or that his majesty expressed; for he staid near a week after at Whitehall, in a secure and peaceable condition: whereby they were induced to believe, that there was no difficulty, or doubt at all, but his majesty’s residence near London might be as safe, as in any part of the kingdom. They said, they were most assured of the faithfulness of the city and suburbs; and for themselves, they should quicken the vigour of the laws, the industry of the magistrate, the authority of parliament, for the suppressing of all tumultuary insolencies whatsoever, and for the vindicating of his honour from all insupportable and insolent scandals, if any such shall be found to be raised upon him, as were mentioned in that answer: and therefore they thought it altogether unnecessary, and exceeding inconvenient, to adjourn the parliament to any other place.

“Where the desire of a good understanding betwixt the king and the parliament was on both sides so earnest, as was there professed by his majesty to be in him, and they had sufficiently testified to be in themselves, it seemed strange they should be, they said, so long asunder; it could be nothing else but evil and malicious counsel misrepresenting their carriage to his majesty, and in disposing his favour to them. And as it should be far from them to take any advantage of his majesty’s supposed straits, as to desire, much less to compel him to that, which his honour or interest might render unpleasant, or grievous to him; so, they hoped, his majesty would not make his own understanding or reason the rule of his government; but would suffer himself to be assisted with a wise and prudent council, that might deal faithfully betwixt him and his people: and that he would remember, that his resolutions did concern kingdoms; and therefore ought not to be moulded by his own, much less by any other private person, which was not alike proportionable to so great a trust: and therefore they still desired and hoped, that his majesty would not be guided by his own understanding, or to think those courses, straits and necessities, to which he should be advised by the wisdom of both houses of parliament, which are the eyes in this politic body, whereby his majesty was, by the constitution of the kingdom, to discern the differences of those things, which concern the public peace and safety thereof.

"to say, that they did meanly value the discharge of his public duty; whatsoever acts of grace or justice had been done, they proceeded from his majesty by the advice and counsel of his parliament, yet they had and should always answer them with constant gratitude, obedience, and affection; and although many things had been done, since this parliament, of another nature, yet they should not cease to desire the continued protection of Almighty God upon his majesty, and most humbly petition him to cast from him all those evil and contrary counsels, which had, in many particulars formerly mentioned, much detracted from the honour of his government, the happiness of his own estate, and prosperity of his people.

"And having passed so many dangers from abroad, so many conspiracies at home, and brought on the public work so far, through the greatest difficulties that ever stood in opposition to a parliament, to such a degree of success, that nothing seemed to be left in the way able to hinder the full accomplishment of their desires, and endeavours for the public good, unless God in his justice did send such a grievous curse upon them, as to turn the strength of the kingdom against itself, and to effect that by their own folly and credulity, which the power and subtilty of their enemies could not attain, that was, to divide the people from the parliament, and to make them serviceable to the ends and aims of those who would destroy them: therefore they desired the kingdom to take notice of that last most desperate and mischievous plot of the malignant party, that was acted and prosecuted in many parts of the kingdom, under plausible notions of stirring them up to a care of preserving the king's prerogative; maintaining the discipline of the church; upholding and continuing the reverence and solemnity of God's service; [and] encouraging of learning: and, upon those grounds, divers mutinous petitions had been framed in London, Kent, and other counties; and sundry of his majesty's subjects had been solicited to declare themselves for the king against the parliament; and many false and foul aspersions had been cast upon their proceedings, as if they had been not only negligent, but averse in those points; whereas they desired nothing more, than to maintain the purity and power of religion, and to honour the king in all his just prerogatives; and for encouragement and advancement of piety and learning, they had very earnestly endeavoured, and still did, to the uttermost of their power, that all parishes might have learned, pious, and sufficient preachers, and all such preachers, competent livings.

"Other bills and propositions, they said, were in preparation, for the king's profit and honour, the people's safety and prosperity; in the proceedings whereof, they were much hindered by his majesty's absence from the parliament; which was altogether contrary to the use of his predecessors, and the privilege of parliament, whereby their time was consumed by a multitude of unnecessary messages, and their innocence wounded by causeless and sharp invectives; yet they doubted not but they should overcome all this at last, if the people suffer not themselves to be deluded with false and specious shows, and so drawn to betray them to their own undoing, who had ever been willing to hazard the undoing of themselves, that they might not be betrayed, by their neglect of the trust reposed in them: but if it were possible they should prevail herein, yet they would not fail, through God's grace, still to persist in their duties, and to look beyond their own lives, estates, and advantages, as those who think nothing worth the enjoying without the liberty, peace, and safety of the kingdom; nor any thing too good to be hazarded in discharge of their consciences, for the obtaining of it: and should always repose themselves upon the protection of Almighty God, which, they were confident, should never be wanting to them, (while they sought his glory,) as they had found it, hitherto, wonderfully going along with them, in all their proceedings."

With this declaration they published the examinations of Mr. Goring, Mr. Percy's letter to the earl of Northumberland; which were the great evidence they had of the plot of bringing up the army, to awe the parliament; and several other letters and depositions, or rather such parts of depositions, as contributed most to their purpose. For the truth is, as they never published, so much as to the houses which were to judge, many depositions of witnesses, whose testimonies, in a manner, vindicated the king from those aspersions, which they had a mind should stick upon him, (for many such there were,) so of those which they did publish, they left out many parts, which, being added, would either have obscured, or contradicted, or discredited much of that, out of which they made the people believe much to the king's disservice. And yet with all those ill arts and omissions, I presume many, who without passion do now read those depositions, (for they are in all hands to be read,) do much marvel how such conclusions could result to his majesty's disadvantage, out of the worst part of all that evidence; which could not naturally carry that sense to which it was wrested.

About this time (which I shall mention before the other declaration, because it intervened) there happened an accident that gave them much trouble, and the more, because unlooked for, by the lord keeper's quitting them, and resorting to York, by which the king got the possession of his own great seal; which by all parties was, at that time, thought a most considerable advantage. The king was very much unsatisfied with the lord keeper Littleton; who did not appear so useful for his service as he expected, and, from the time of the accusing the members, had lost all his vigour, and, instead of making any oppositions to any of their extravagant debates, he had silently suffered all things to be carried; and had not only declined the performing the office the king had enjoined him, with reference to the earls of Essex and Holland, (before mentioned,) but very much complied with and courted that party of both houses, which frequently resorted to him; and of late in a question, which had been put in the house of peers, in the point of the militia, he had given his vote both against the king and the law, to the infinite offence and scandal of all those who adhered to the king.

He was a man of great reputation in the profession of the law; for learning, and all other advantages, which attend the most eminent men; he was of a very good extraction in Shropshire, and inherited a fair fortune, and inheritance from his father; he was a handsome and a proper man, of a very graceful presence, and notorious for courage, which, in his youth, he had manifested with his sword; he had taken great pains in the hardest and most knotty parts of the law, as well as that which was more customary; and was not only very ready and expert in the books, but exceedingly versed in records, in studying and examining whereof, he had kept Mr. Selden company, with whom he had great friendship, and who had much assisted him; so that he was looked upon as the best antiquary of the profession, who gave himself up to practice; and, upon the mere strength of his own abilities, he had raised himself into the first rank of the practisers in the common law courts, and was chosen recorder of London before he was called to the bench, and grew presently into the highest practice in all the other courts, as well as those of the law. When the king looked more narrowly into his business, and found that he should have much to do in Westminster-hall, he removed an old, useless, illiterate person, who had been put into that office by the favour of the duke of Buckingham, and made Littleton his solicitor general, much to his honour, but not to his profit; the obligation of attendance upon that office depriving him of much benefit he used to acquire by his practice, before he had that relation. Upon the death of the lord Coventry, and Finch being made keeper, he was made chief justice of the common pleas, then the best office of the law, and that which he was wont to say, in his highest ambition, in his own private wishes, he had most desired; and it was indeed the sphere in which he moved most gracefully, and with most advantage, being a master of all that learning and knowledge, which that place required, and an excellent judge, of great gravity, and above all suspicion of corruption.

Whilst he held this place, he was by the favour of the archbishop of Canterbury, and the earl of Strafford, who had a great esteem of him, recommended to the king to be called to the council table, where he kept up his good name; and, upon the lord Finch's leaving the kingdom, in the beginning of the parliament, he was thought, in many respects, to be the fittest to be intrusted in that office; and, upon the desire of the earl of Strafford, after he was in the Tower, was created a baron, out of expectation that, by his authority and knowledge of the law, he would have been of great use in restraining those extraordinary and unwarrantable proceedings: but, from the time he had the great seal, he seemed to be out of his element, and in some perplexity and irresolution in the chancery itself, though he had great experience in the practice and proceedings of that court; and made not that despatch, that was expected, at the council table; and in the parliament he did not preserve any dignity; and appeared so totally dispirited, that few men shewed any respect to him, but they who most opposed the king, who indeed did exceedingly apply themselves to him, and were with equal kindness received by him. This wonderful alteration in him, his friends believed to have proceeded from a great sickness, which had seized upon him very soon after he was created a baron, inasmuch as every man believed he would die; and by this means, he did not attend the house in some months; and so performed none of those offices toward the earl of Strafford, the expectation whereof had been the sole motive to that promotion: from that time he never did appear the same man; but sure there were other causes for it, and he was possessed with some melancholy apprehensions, which he could not master, and had no friend to whom he durst entirely communicate [them].

Mr. Hyde, one of those who was most trusted by the king in the house of commons, and had always had a great respect for the keeper, was as much troubled at his behaviour, as any man; and using frequently to go to him, went upon that occasion; and with great freedom and plainness told him, "how much he had lost the esteem of all good men, and that the king could not but be exceedingly dissatisfied with him;" and discoursed over the matter of that vote. Though he did not know, that the king did at that time put so great a secret trust in Mr. Hyde, yet he knew well, that the king had a very good opinion of him, and had heard his majesty often, from the beginning of the parliament, when the discourse happened to be of the lawyers of the house, take occasion from thence to mention Mr. Hyde, as a man of whom he heard very well; which the keeper had many times taken notice of to him: and then he knew the friendship that was between the lord Falkland and him [Mr. Hyde], and had heard the many jealousies which were contracted, upon the great communication he had with the two new counsellors; and so no doubt believed, that he knew much of the king's mind. And so as soon as he had entered upon this discourse, which he heard with all attention, (they being by themselves in his study at Exeter house,) he rose from his chair, and went to the door; and finding some persons in the next room, he bade them to withdraw; and so locking both the door of that room, and of his study, he sat down himself, and making Mr. Hyde sit down in another chair, he began "with giving him many thanks for his friendship to him, which, he said, he had ever esteemed, and he could not more manifest the esteem he had of it and him, than by using that freedom again with him, which he meant to do. Then he lamented his own condition; and that he had been preferred from the common pleas, where he knew both the business and the persons he had to deal with, to the other high office he now held, which obliged him to converse and transact with another sort of men, who were not known to him, and in affairs which he understood not, and had not one friend amongst them, with whom he could confer upon any doubt which occurred to him."

He spake then of the unhappy state and condition of the king's business; how much he had been, and was still, betrayed by persons who were about him; and with all possible indignation against the proceedings of the parliament; and said, "they would never do this, if they were not resolved to do more: that he knew the king too well, and observed the carriage of particular men too much, and the whole current of public transactions these last five or six months, not to foresee that it could not be long before there would be a war between the king and the two houses; and of the importance, in that season, that the great seal should be with the king." Then he fell into many expressions of his duty and affection to the king's person, as well as to his high degree: and "that no man should be more ready to perish with and for his majesty, than he would be;

"that the prospect he had of this necessity had made him carry himself towards that party with so much compliance, that he might be gracious with them, at least, that they might have no distrust of him; which, he knew, many had endeavoured to infuse into them; and that there had been a consultation within few days, whether, in regard he might be sent for by the king, or that the seal might be taken from him, it would not be best to appoint the seal to be kept in some such secure place, as that there might be no danger of losing it; and that the keeper should always receive it, for the execution of his office; they having no purpose to disoblige him. And the knowledge he had of this consultation, and fear he had of the execution of it, had been the reason, why, in the late debate upon the militia, he had given his vote in such a manner, as, he knew, would make very ill impressions with the king, and many others who did not know him very well; but that, if he had not, in that point, submitted to their opinion, the seal had been taken from him that night; whereas by this compliance in that vote, which could only prejudice himself, and not the king, he had gotten so much into their confidence, that he should be able to preserve the seal in his own hands, till the king required it; and then he would be as ready to attend upon his majesty with it."

Mr. Hyde was very well pleased with this discourse; and asked him, "whether he would give him leave, when there should be a fit occasion, that required it, to assure the king, that he would perform this service, when the king should require it?" He desired, "that he would do so, and pass his word for the performance of it, as soon as his majesty pleased;" and so they parted.

It was within very few days after, that the king, exceedingly displeased and provoked with the keeper's behaviour, sent an order to the lord Falkland, "to require the seal from him;" in which the king was very positive, though he was not resolved to what hand to commit it. His majesty wished them (for he always included the other two in such references) to consider, "whether he should give it to the lord chief justice Banks," (against whom he made some objection himself,) "or into the hands of Mr. Selden; and to send their opinion to him." The order was positive for the requiring it from the present officer, but they knew not how to advise for a successor. The lord [chief justice] Banks appeared to be as much afraid, as the other; and not thought equal to that charge, in a time of so much disorder; though, otherwise, he was a man of great abilities, and unblemished integrity: they did not doubt of Mr. Selden's affection to the king, but withal they knew him so well, that they concluded he would absolutely refuse the place, if it were offered to him. He was in years, and of a tender constitution; he had for many years enjoyed his ease, which he loved; was rich; and would not have made a journey to York, or have lain out of his own bed, for any preferment; which he had never affected.

Being all the three of one mind, that it would not be fit to offer it to the one or the other; hereupon Mr. Hyde told them the conference he had had with the keeper, and the professions he had made; and was very confident, that he would very punctually perform it; and therefore proposed, that "they might, with their opinions of the other persons, likewise advise his majesty to suspend his resolution concerning the lord keeper, and rather to write kindly to him, to bring the seal to his majesty, instead of sending for the seal itself, and to cast him off;" and offered to venture his own credit with the king, upon the keeper's complying with his majesty's command. Neither of them were of his opinion; and had both no esteem of the keeper, nor believed that he would go to his majesty, if he were sent for, but that he would find some trick to excuse himself; and therefore were not willing, that Mr. Hyde should venture his reputation upon it. He desired them then "to consider how absolutely necessary it was, that the king should first resolve into what hand to put the seal, before he removed it; for that it could not be unemployed one hour, but that the whole justice of the kingdom would be out of order, and draw a greater and a juster clamour than had been yet: that there was as much care to be taken, that it should not be in the power of any man to refuse it, which would be yet more prejudicial to his majesty. He desired them above all, to weigh well, that the business consisted only in having the great seal in the place, where his majesty resolved to be; and if the keeper would keep his promise, and desired to serve and please the king, it would be unquestionably the best way, that he and the seal were both there: if, on the other side, he were not an honest man, and cared not for offending the king, he would then refuse to deliver it; and inform the lords of it; who would justify him for his disobedience, and reward and cherish him; and he must then hereafter serve their turn; the mischief whereof would be greater than could be easily imagined: and his [majesty's] own great seal should be every day used against him, nor would it be possible in many months to procure a new one to be made."

These objections appeared of weight to them; and they resolved to give an account of the whole to the king, and to expect his order: and both the lord Falkland and Mr. Hyde writ to his majesty, and sent their letters away that very night. The king was satisfied with the reasons, and was very glad that Mr. Hyde was so confident of the keeper; though, he said, he remained still in doubt; and resolved, "that he would, such a day of the week following, send for the keeper, and the seal;" and that it should be, as had been advised, upon a Saturday afternoon, as soon as the house of lords should rise; because then no notice could be taken of it till Monday. Mr. Hyde, who had continued to see the keeper frequently, and was confirmed in his confidence of his integrity, went now to him; and finding him firm to his resolution, and of the opinion, in regard of the high proceedings of the houses, that it should not be long deferred; he told him, "that he might expect a messenger the next week, and that he should once more see him, when he would tell him the day; and that he would then go himself away before him to York;" with which he was much pleased, and it was agreed between the three, that it was now time, that he should be gone (the king having sent for him some time before) after a day or two; in which time the declaration of the nineteenth of May would be passed.

On the Saturday following, between two and three of the clock in the afternoon, Mr. Elliot, a groom of the bedchamber to the prince, came to the keeper, and found him alone in the room where he used to sit, and delivered him a letter from the king in his own hand; wherein he required him, with many expressions of kindness and esteem, "to make haste to him; and if his indisposition" (for he was often troubled with gravel and sharpness of urine) "would not suffer him to make such haste upon the journey, as the occasion required, that he should deliver the seal to the person who gave him the letter; who, being a strong young man, would make such haste as was necessary; and that he might make his own journey, by those degrees which his health required." The keeper was surprised with the messenger, whom he did not like; and more when he found that he knew the contents of the letter, which, he hoped, would not have been communicated to any man who should be sent: he answered him with much reservation; and when the other with bluntness, as he was no polite man, demanded the seal of him, which he had not thought of putting out of his own hands; he answered him, "that he would not deliver it into any hands, but the king's:" but presently recollecting himself, and looking over his letter again, he quickly considered, that it would be hazardous to carry the seal himself such a journey; and that if by any pursuit of him, which he could not but suspect, he should be seized upon, the king would be very unhappily disappointed of the seal, which he had reason so much to depend upon; and that his misfortune would be wholly imputed to his own fault and infidelity, (which, without doubt, he abhorred with his heart;) and the only way to prevent that mischief, or to appear innocent under it, was to deliver the seal to the person trusted by the king himself to receive it; and so, without telling him any thing of his own purpose, he delivered the seal into his hands; and he forthwith put himself on his horse, and with wonderful expedition presented the great seal into his majesty's own hands, who was infinitely pleased with it, and with the messenger.

The keeper, that evening, pretended to be indisposed, and that he would take his rest early, and therefore that nobody should be admitted to speak with him: and then he called sergeant Lee to him, who was the sergeant who waited upon the seal, and in whom he had great confidence, as he well might; and told him freely, "that he was resolved, the next morning, to go to the king, who had sent for him; that he knew well how much malice he should contract by it from the parliament, which would use all the means they could to apprehend him; and he himself knew not how he should perform the journey, therefore he put himself entirely into his hands; that he should cause his horses to be ready against the next morning, and only his own groom to attend them, and he to guide the best way, and that he would not impart it to any other person." The honest sergeant was very glad of the resolution, and cheerfully undertook all things for the journey; and so sending the horses out of the town, the keeper put himself in his coach very early the next morning, and as soon as they were out of the town, he and the sergeant, and one groom, took their horses, and made so great a journey that day, it being about the beginning of June, that before the end of the third day he kissed the king's hands at York.

He had purposely procured the house of peers to be adjourned to a later hour in the morning for Monday, than it used to be. Sunday passed without any man's taking notice of the keeper's being absent; and many, who knew that he was not at his house, thought he had been gone to Cranford, his country house, whither he frequently went on Saturday nights, and was early enough at the parliament on the Monday mornings; and so the lords the more willingly consented to the later adjournments for those days. But on Monday morning, when it was known when, and in what manner, he had left his house, the confusion in both houses was very great; and they who had thought that their interest was so great in him, that they knew all his thoughts, and had valued themselves, and were valued by others, upon that account, hung down their heads, and were even distracted with shame: however they could not but conclude, that he was out of their reach before the lords met; yet to shew their indignation against him, and it may be in hope that his infirmities would detain him long in the journey, (as nobody indeed thought that he could have performed it with that expedition,) they issued out such a warrant for the apprehending him, as had been in the case of the foulest felon or murderer; and printed it, and caused it to be dispersed, by expresses, over all the kingdom, with great haste. All which circumstances, both before and after the keeper's journey to York, are the more particularly and at large set down, out of justice to the memory of that noble person; whose honour suffered then much in the opinion of many, by the confident report of the person, who was sent for and received the seal, and who was a loud and a bold talker, and desired to have it believed, that his manhood had ravished the great seal from the keeper, even in spite of his teeth; which, how impossible soever in itself, found too much credit; and is therefore cleared by this very true and punctual relation, which in truth is but due to him.

But the trouble and distraction, which at this time possessed them, was visibly very great; and their dejection such, that the same day the lord of Northumberland (who had been of another temper) moved, "that a committee might be appointed, to consider how there might be an accommodation between the king and his people, for the good, happiness, and safety of both king and kingdom;" which committee was appointed accordingly.

This temper of accommodation troubled them not long, new warmth and vigour being quickly infused into them by the unbroken or undaunted spirits of the house of commons; which, to shew how little they valued the power or authority of the king, though supported by having now his great seal by him, on the twenty-sixth of May agreed on a new remonstrance to the people; in which, the lords concurring, they informed them,

"That although the great affairs of the kingdom, and the miserable bleeding condition of the kingdom of Ireland, afforded them little leisure to spend their time in declarations, and in answers, and replies, yet the malignant party about his majesty taking all occasions to multiply calumnies upon the houses of parliament, and to publish sharp invectives, under his majesty's name, against them, and their proceedings, (a new engine they had invented to heighten the distractions of this kingdom, and to beget and increase distrust and disaffection between the king, and his parliament, and the people,) they could not be so much wanting to their own innocency, or to the duty of their trust, as not to clear themselves from those false aspersions, and (which was their chiefest care) to disabuse the people's minds, and open their eyes, that, under the false shows, and pretexes of the law of the land, and of their own rights and liberties, they may not be carried into the road way, that leadeth to the utter ruin and subversion thereof. A late occasion that those wicked spirits of division had taken to defame, and indeed to arraign the proceedings of both houses of parliament, had been from their votes of the twenty-eighth of April, and their declaration concerning the business of Hull, which because they put forth, before they could send their answer concerning that matter unto his majesty, those mischievous instruments of dissension, between the king, and the parliament, and the people, whose chief labour and study was to misrepresent their actions to his majesty, and to the kingdom, would needs interpret this as an appeal to the people, and a declining of all intercourse between his majesty and them; as if they thought it to no purpose, to endeavour any more to give his majesty satisfaction; and, without expecting any longer their answer, under the name of a message from his majesty to both houses, they themselves had indeed made an appeal to the people, as the message itself did in a manner grant it to be, offering to join issue with them in that way, and in the nature thereof did clearly shew itself to be no other; therefore they would likewise address their answer to the kingdom, not by way of appeal, (as they were charged,) but to prevent them from being their own executioners, and from being persuaded under false colours of defending the law, and their own liberties, to destroy both with their own hands, by taking their lives, liberties, and estates out of their hands, whom they had chosen, and intrusted therewith, and resigning them up unto some evil counsellors, about his majesty, who could lay no other foundation of their own greatness, but upon the ruin of this, and, in it, of all parliaments; and, in them, of the true religion, and the freedom of this nation. And these, they said, were the men that would persuade the people, that both houses of parliament, containing all the peers and representing all the commons of England, would destroy the laws of the land, and liberties of the people; wherein, besides the trust of the whole, they themselves, in their own particulars, had so great an interest of honour and estate, that they hoped it would gain little credit with any, that had the least use of reason, that such, as must have so great a share in the misery, should take so much pains in the procuring thereof; and spend so much time, and run so many hazards to make themselves slaves, and to destroy the property of their estates. But that they might give particular satisfaction to the several imputations cast upon them, they would take them in order, as they were laid upon them in that message.

First, they were charged for the avowing that act of sir John Hotham; which was termed unparalleled, and an high and unheard of affront unto his majesty, and as if they needed not to have done it; he being able, as was alleged, to produce no such command of the houses of parliament. They said, although sir John Hotham had not an order, that did express every circumstance of that case, yet he might have produced an order of both houses, which did comprehend this case, not only in the clear intention, but in the very words thereof; which they knowing in their consciences to be so, and to be most necessary for the safety of the kingdom, they could not but in honour and justice avow that act of his; which, they were confident, would appear to all the world to be so far from being an affront to the king, that it would be found to have been an act of great loyalty to his majesty, and to his kingdom.

The next charge upon them was, that, instead of giving his majesty satisfaction, they published a declaration concerning that business, as an appeal to the people, and as if their intercourse with his majesty, and for his satisfaction, were now to no more purpose; which course was alleged to be very unagreeable to the modesty and duty of former times, and not warrantable by any precedents, but what themselves had made. They said, if the penner of that message had expected a while, or had not expected that two houses of parliament (especially burdened, as they were at that time, with so many pressing and urgent affairs) should have moved as fast as himself, he would not have said, that declaration was instead of an answer to his majesty; which they did despatch with all the speed and diligence they could, and had sent it to his majesty by a committee of both houses; whereby it appeared, that they did it not upon that ground, that they thought it was no more to any purpose, to endeavour to give his majesty satisfaction.

And as for the duty and modesty of former times, from which they were said to have varied, and to want the warrant of any precedents therein, but what themselves had made: if they had made any precedents this parliament, they had made them for posterity, upon the same, or better grounds of reason and law, than those were upon, which their predecessors first made for them: and as some precedents ought not to be rules for them to follow, so none could be limits to bound their proceedings; which might and must vary, according to the different condition of times. And for that particular, of setting forth declarations for the satisfaction of the people, who had chosen, and intrusted them with all that was dearest to them: if there were no example for it, it was because there were never any such monsters before, that ever attempted to disaffect the people from a parliament, or could ever harbour a thought that it might be effected. Were there ever such practices to poison the people with an ill apprehension of the parliament? Were there ever such imputations and scandals laid upon the proceedings of both houses? Were there ever so many and so great breaches of privilege of parliament? Were there ever so many and so desperate designs of force and violence against the parliament, and the members thereof? If "they had done more than ever their ancestors had done, they said, they had suffered more than ever they had suffered; and yet, in point of modesty and duty, they would not yield to the best of former times; and they would put that in issue, whether the highest and most unwarrantable precedents of any of his majesty's predecessors did not fall short, and much below, what had been done to them this parliament? And, on the other side, whether, if they should make the highest precedents of other parliaments their patterns, there would be cause to complain of want of modesty and duty in them; when they had not so much as suffered such things to enter into their thoughts, which all the world knew they had put in act?

"Another charge which was laid very high upon them, and which were indeed a very great crime if they were found guilty thereof, was, that, by avowing that act of sir John Hotham, they did, in consequence, confound and destroy the title and interest of all his majesty's good subjects to their lands and goods; and that upon this ground; that his majesty had the same title to his town of Hull, which any of his subjects had to their houses or lands, and the same to his magazine and munition there, that any man had to his money, plate, or jewels: and, therefore, that they ought not to have been disposed of, without or against his consent, no more than the house, land, money, plate, or jewels, of any subject ought to be, without or against his will.

"Here, they said, that was laid down for a principle, which would indeed pull up the very foundation of the liberty, property, and interest of every subject in particular, and of all the subjects in general, if they should admit it for a truth, that his majesty had the same right and title to his towns, and to his magazines, (bought with the public monies, as they conceived that at Hull to have been,) that every particular man hath to his house, lands, and goods. For his majesty's towns were no more his own, than his kingdom was his own; and his kingdom was no more his own, than his people are his own; and if the king had a propriety in all his towns, what would become of the subjects' propriety in their houses therein? and if he had a propriety in his kingdom, what would become of the subjects' propriety in their lands throughout the kingdom? or of their liberties, if his majesty had the same right in their persons, that every subject hath in his lands and goods? and what would become of all the subjects' interests in the towns and forts of the kingdom, and in the kingdom itself, if his majesty might sell, or give them away, or dispose of them at his pleasure, as a particular man might do with his lands and with his goods? This erroneous maxim being infused into princes, that their kingdoms are their own, and that they may do with them what they will, as if their kingdoms were for them, and not they for their kingdoms, was, they said, the root of all the subjects' misery, and of the invading of their just rights and liberties; whereas, indeed, they are only intrusted with their kingdoms, and with their towns, and with their people, and with the public treasure of the commonwealth, and whatsoever is bought therewith; and, by the known law of this kingdom, the very jewels of the crown

"are not the king's proper goods, but are only intrusted to him for the use and ornament thereof: as the towns, forts, treasure, magazines, offices, and the people of the kingdom, and the whole kingdom itself is intrusted unto him, for the good, and safety, and best advantage thereof: and as this trust is for the use of the kingdom, so ought it to be managed by the advice of the houses of parliament, whom the kingdom hath trusted for that purpose; it being their duty to see it discharged according to the condition and true intent thereof; and as much as in them lies, by all possible means, to prevent the contrary; which, if it had been their chief care, and only aim, in the disposing of the town and magazine of Hull in such manner as they had done, they hoped it would appear clearly to all the world, that they had discharged their own trust, and not invaded that of his majesty's, much less his property; which, in that case, they could not do.

"But admitting his majesty had indeed had a property in the town and magazine of Hull; who doubted but that a parliament may dispose of any thing, wherein his majesty, or any subject, hath a right, in such a way, as that the kingdom may not be exposed to hazard or danger thereby? which was their case, in the disposing of the town and magazine of Hull. And whereas his majesty did allow this, and a greater power to a parliament, but in that sense only, as he himself was a part thereof; they appealed to every man's conscience, that had observed their proceedings, whether they disjoined his majesty from his parliament, who had in all humble ways sought his concurrence with them, as in that particular about Hull, and for the removal of the magazine there, so also in all other things; or whether those evil councils about him had not separated him from his parliament; not only in distance of place, but also in the discharge of the joint trust with them, for the peace and safety of the kingdom in that, and some other particulars.

"They had given no occasion to his majesty, they said, to declare with so much earnestness his resolution, that he would not suffer either, or both houses by their votes, without or against his consent, to enjoin any thing that was forbidden by the law, or to forbid any thing that was enjoined by the law; for their votes had done no such thing: and as they should be very tender of the law, (which they did acknowledge to be the safeguard and custody of all public and private interests,) so they would never allow a few private persons about the king, nor his majesty himself in his own person, and out of his courts, to be judge of the law, and that contrary to the judgment of the highest court of judicature. In like manner, that his majesty had not refused to consent to any thing, that might be for the peace and happiness of the kingdom, they could not admit it in any other sense, but as his majesty taketh the measure of what will be for the peace and happiness of his kingdom, from some few ill affected persons about him, contrary to the advice and judgment of his great council of parliament. And because the advice of both houses of parliament had, through the suggestions of evil counsellors, been so much undervalued of late, and so absolutely rejected and refused, they said, they held it fit to declare unto the kingdom, whose honour and interest was so much concerned in it,

" what was the privilege of the great council of parliament herein ; and what was the obligation that lay upon the kings of this realm, to pass such bills, as are offered to them by both houses of parliament, in the name, and for the good, of the whole kingdom, whereunto they stand engaged, both in conscience and in justice, to give their royal assent : in conscience, in regard of the oath, that is or ought to be taken by the kings of this realm at their coronation, as well to confirm by their royal assent such good laws, as the people shall choose, and to remedy by law such inconveniences, as the kingdom may suffer ; as to keep and protect the laws already in being ; as may appear both by the form of the oath upon record, and in books of good authority, and by the statute of the 25 of Edward III. entitled, the Statute of Provisors of Benefices ; the form of which oath, and the clause of the statute that concerneth it, are as followeth :

Servabis ecclesiæ Dei, cleroque, et populo, pacem ex integro, et concordiam in Deo, secundum vires tuas ?

Facies fieri in omnibus judiciis tuis æquam, et rectam justitiam, et discretionem in misericordia et veritate, secundum vires tuas ?

Respondēbit, Faciam.

Concedis justas leges, et consuetudines esse tenendas ; et promittis per te eas esse protegendas, et ad honorem Dei corroborandas, quas vulgus elegerit, secundum vires tuas ?

A clause in the preamble of a statute made the 25 Edw. III. entitled, the Statute of Provisors of Benefices.

Whereupon the said commons have prayed our said lord the king, that sith the right of the crown of England, and the law of the said realm is such, that upon the mischiefs and damages, which happen to this realm, he ought, and is bound by his oath, with the accord of his people in his parliament, thereof to make remedy and law, and in removing the mischiefs and damages which thereof ensue, that it may please him thereupon to ordain remedy.

Our lord the king seeing the mischiefs and damages before mentioned, and having regard to the statute made in the time of his said grandfather, and to the causes contained in the same, which statute holdeth always his force, and was never defeated, repealed, nor annulled in any point, and by so much he is bounden by his oath to cause the same to be kept as the law of his realm, though that, by sufferance and negligence, it hath been sithence attempted to the contrary : also having regard to the grievous complaints made to him by his people, in divers his parliaments holden heretofore, willing to ordain remedy for the great damages and mischiefs, which have happened, and daily do happen, to the church of England by the said cause :

" Here, they said, the lords and commons claim " it directly as the right of the crown of England, " and of the law of the land, and that the king is " bound by his oath, with the accord of his people " in parliament, to make remedy, and law, upon " the mischiefs and damages, which happen to this " realm ; and the king doth not deny it, although " he take occasion from a statute formerly made " by his grandfather, which was laid as part of the " grounds of this petition, to fix his answer upon " another branch of his oath, and pretermits that " which is claimed by the lords and commons ; " which he would not have done, if it might have " been excepted against.

" In justice, they said, they are obliged there- " unto, in respect of the trust reposed in them ; " which is as well to preserve the kingdom by the " making new laws, where there shall be need, as " by observing of laws already made ; a kingdom " being, many times, as much exposed to ruin for " the want of a new law, as by the violation of " those that are in being : and this is so clear a " right, that, no doubt, his majesty would acknow- " ledge it to be as due to his people, as his protec- " tion. But how far forth he was obliged to follow " the judgment of his parliament therein, that is " the question. And certainly, besides the words " in the king's oath, referring unto such laws as " the people shall choose, as in such things which " concern the public weal and good of the kingdom, " they are the most proper judges, who are sent " from the whole kingdom for that very purpose ; " so they did not find, that since laws have passed " by way of bills, (which are read thrice in both " houses, and committed ; and every part and cir- " cumstance of them fully weighed, and debated " upon the commitment, and afterwards passed in " both houses,) that ever the kings of this realm " did deny them, otherwise than is expressed in " that usual answer, Le roy s'avisera ; which sig- " nifies rather a suspension, than a refusal of the " royal assent. And in those other laws, which " are framed by way of petitions of right, the " houses of parliament have taken themselves to " be so far judges of the right claimed by them, " that when the king's answer hath not, in every " point, been fully according to their desire, they " have still insisted upon their claim, and never " rested satisfied, till such time as they had an " answer according to their demand ; as had been " done in the late Petition of Right, and in former " times upon the like occasion. And if the parlia- " ment be judge between the king and his people " in the question of right, (as by the manner in the " claim in petitions of right, and by judgments in " parliament, in cases of illegal impositions and " taxes, and the like, it appears to be,) why should " they not be so also, in the question of the common " good, and necessity of the kingdom ; wherein the " kingdom hath as clear a right also to have the " benefit and remedy of law, as in any thing what- " soever ? And yet they did not deny, but that in " private bills, and also in public acts of grace, as

"pardons, and the like grants of favour, his majesty might have a greater latitude of granting, or denying, as he should think fit.

"All this considered, they said, they could not but wonder, that the contriver of that message should conceive the people of this land to be so void of common sense, as to enter into so deep a mistrust of those, whom they have, and his majesty ought to repose so great a trust in, as to despair of any security in their private estates, by descents, purchases, assurances, or conveyances; unless his majesty should, by his vote, prevent the prejudice they might receive therein by the votes of both houses of parliament; as if they, who are especially chosen, and intrusted for that purpose, and who themselves must needs have so great a share in all grievances of the subject, had wholly cast off all care of the subject's good, and his majesty had solely taken it up; and as if it could be imagined, that they should, by their votes, overthrow the rights of descents, purchases, or of any conveyance or assurance, in whose judgment the whole kingdom hath placed all their particular interests, if any of them should be called in question, in any of those cases; and that (as not knowing where to place them with greater security) without any appeal from them to any other person or court whatsoever.

"But indeed they were very much to seek, how the case of Hull could concern descents and purchases, or conveyances and assurances; unless it were in procuring more security to men in their private interests, by the preservation of the whole from confusion and destruction; and much less did they understand how the sovereign power was resisted and despised therein. Certainly no command from his majesty, and his high court of parliament, (where the sovereign power resides,) was disobeyed by sir John Hotham; nor yet was his majesty's authority derived out of any other court, nor by any legal commission, or by any other way, wherein the law had appointed his majesty's commands to be derived to his subjects; and of what validity his verbal commands are, without any such stamp of his authority upon them, and against the order of both houses of parliament, and whether the not submitting thereunto be a resisting and despising of the sovereign authority, they would leave to all men to judge, that do at all understand the government of this kingdom.

"They acknowledged that his majesty had made many expressions of his zeal and intentions against the desperate designs of the papists; but yet it was also as true, that the counsels, which had prevailed of late with him, had been little suitable to those expressions and intentions. For what did more advance the open and bloody design of the papists in Ireland, (whereon the secret plots of the papists here did, in all likelihood, depend,) than his majesty's absenting himself, in that manner that he did, from his parliament; and setting forth such sharp invectives against them, notwithstanding all the humble petitions, and other means, which his parliament had addressed unto him, for his return, and for his satisfaction concerning their proceedings? And what was more likely to give a rise to the designs of the papists, (whereof there were so many in "the north, near to the town of Hull,) and of other malignant and ill affected persons, (which were ready to join with them,) or to the attempts of foreigners from abroad, than the continuing of that great magazine at Hull, at this time, and contrary to the desire and advice of both houses of parliament? So that they had too much cause to believe, that the papists had still some way and means, whereby they had influence upon his majesty's counsels for their own advantage.

"For the malignant party, they said, his majesty needed not a definition of the law, nor yet a more full character of them from both houses of parliament, for to find them out, if he would please only to apply the character, that himself had made of them, to those, unto whom it doth properly and truly belong. Who are so much disaffected to the peace of the kingdom, as they that endeavour to disaffect his majesty from the houses of parliament, and persuade him to be at such a distance from them, both in place and affection? Who are more disaffected to the government of the kingdom, than such as lead his majesty away from hearkening to his parliament; which, by the constitution of the kingdom, is his greatest and best council; and persuade him to follow the malicious counsels of some private men, in opposing and contradicting the wholesome advices and just proceedings of that his most faithful council and highest court? Who are they, that not only neglect and despise, but labour to undermine the law, under colour of maintaining it, but they that endeavour to destroy the fountain and conservatory of the law, which is the parliament? And who are they that set up other rules for themselves to walk by, than such as are according to law, but they that will make other judges of the law than the law hath appointed; and so dispense with their obedience to that, which the law calleth authority, and to their determinations and resolutions, to whom the judgment doth appertain by law? For, when private persons shall make the law to be their rule according to their own understandings, contrary to the judgment of those that are the competent judges thereof, they set up unto themselves other rules than the law doth acknowledge. Who those persons were, none knew better than his majesty himself: and if he would please to take all possible caution of them, as destructive to the commonwealth and himself, and would remove them from about him, it would be the most effectual means to compose all the distractions, and to cure the distempers of the kingdom.

"For the lord Digby's letter, they said, they did not make mention of it as a ground to hinder his majesty from visiting his own fort; but they appealed to the judgment of any indifferent man, that should read that letter, and compare it with the posture that his majesty then did, and still doth, stand in towards the parliament, and with the circumstances of that late action of his majesty in going to Hull, whether the advisers of that journey intended only a visit of that fort and magazine?

"As to the ways and overtures of accommodation, and the message of the twentieth of January last, so often pressed, but still in vain, as was al“leged: their answer was, that although so often as that message of the twentieth of January had been pressed, so often had their privileges been clearly infringed, that a way and method of proceeding should be prescribed to them, as well for the settling of his majesty's revenue, as for the presenting of their own desires, (a thing, which, in former parliaments, had always been excepted against, as a breach of privilege,) yet, in respect to the matter contained in that message, and out of their earnest desire to beget a good understanding between his majesty and them, they swallowed down all matters of circumstance; and had ere that time presented the chief of their desires to his majesty, had they not been interrupted with continual denials, even of those things that were necessary for their present security and subsistence; and had not those denials been followed with perpetual invectives against them and their proceedings; and had not those invectives been heaped upon them so thick one after another, (who were in a manner already taken up wholly with the pressing affairs of this kingdom, and of the kingdom of Ireland,) that as they had little encouragement from thence, to hope for any good answers to their desires, so they had not so much time left them to perfect them in such a manner, as to offer them to his majesty.

“They confessed it a resolution most worthy of a prince, and of his majesty, to shut his ears against any that would incline him to a civil war; and to abhor the very apprehension of it. But they could not believe that mind to have been in them, that came with his majesty to the house of commons; or in them, that accompanied his majesty to Hampton-court, and appeared in a warlike manner at Kingston upon Thames; or in divers of them, who followed his majesty lately to Hull; or in them, who after drew their swords in York, demanding, Who would be for the king? nor in them, that advised his majesty to declare sir John Hotham a traitor, before the message was sent concerning that business to the parliament, or to make propositions to the gentlemen of the county of York to assist his majesty to proceed against him in a way of force, before he had, or possibly could receive an answer from the parliament, to whom he had sent to demand justice of them against sir John Hotham for that fact: and if those malignant spirits should ever force them to defend their religion, the kingdom, the privileges of parliament, and the rights and liberties of the subjects, with their swords; the blood, and destruction that should ensue thereupon, must be wholly cast upon their account; God and their own consciences told them, that they were clear; and they doubted not, but God and the whole world would clear them therein.

“For captain Leg, they had not said that he was accused, or that there was any charge against him, for the bringing up of the army; but that he was employed in that business. And for that concerning the earl of Newcastle, mentioned by his majesty, which was said to have been asked long since, and that it was not easy to be answered: they conceived it was a question of more difficulty, and harder to be answered, why, when his majesty held it necessary, upon the same grounds that first moved from the houses of parliament, that a governor should be placed in that “town, sir John Hotham, a gentleman of known fortune and integrity, and a person of whom both houses of parliament had expressed their confidence, should be refused by his majesty; and the earl of Newcastle, (who, by the way, was so far named in the business of bringing up the army, that although there was not ground enough for a judicial proceeding, yet there was ground of suspicion; at least his reputation was not left so unblemished thereby, as that he should be thought the fittest man in England for that employment of Hull) should be sent down, in a private way, from his majesty to take upon him that government? And why he should disguise himself under another name, when he came thither, as he did? But whosoever should consider, together with those circumstances, that of the time when sir John Hotham was appointed, by both houses of parliament, to take upon him that employment, which was presently after his majesty's coming to the house of commons, and upon the retiring himself to Hampton-court, and the lord Digby's assembling of cavaliers at Kingston upon Thames, would find reason enough, why that town of Hull should be committed rather to sir John Hotham, by the authority of both houses of parliament, than to the earl of Newcastle, sent from his majesty in that manner that he was. And for the power that sir John Hotham had from the two houses of parliament, the better it was known and understood, they were confident the more it would be approved and justified: and as they did not conceive, that his majesty's refusal to have that magazine removed could give any advantage against him to have it taken from him; and as no such thing was done, so they could not conceive, for what other reason any should counsel his majesty, not to suffer it to be removed, upon the desire of both houses of parliament; except it were, that they had an intention to make use of it against them.

“They said, they did not except against those that presented a petition to his majesty at York, for the continuance of the magazine at Hull, in respect of their condition, or in respect of their number; because they were mean persons, or because they were few; but because they being but a few, and there being so many more in the county of as good quality as themselves, (who had, by their petition to his majesty, disavowed that act of theirs,) that they should take upon them the style of all the gentry, and inhabitants of that county; and, under that title, should presume to interpose their advice contrary to the votes of both houses of parliament: and, if it could be made to appear, that any of those petitions, that are said to have been presented to the houses of parliament, and to have been of a strange nature, were of such a nature as that, they were confident, that they were never received with their consent and approbation.

“Whether there was an intention to deprive sir John Hotham of his life, if his majesty had been admitted into Hull; and whether the information were such, as that he had ground to believe it, they would not bring into question; for that was not, nor ought to have been, the ground for doing what he did: neither was the number of his majesty's attendants, for being more or fewer, much considerable in this case; for although it

"were true, that if his majesty had entered with twenty horse only, he might happily have found means for to have forced the entrance of the rest of his train; who, being once in the town, would not have been long without arms; yet that was not the ground, upon which sir John Hotham was to proceed; but upon the admittance of the king into the town at all, so as to deliver up the town and magazine unto him, and to whomsoever he should give the command thereof, without the knowledge and consent of both houses of parliament, by whom he was intrusted to the contrary: and his majesty having declared that to be his intention concerning the town, in a message that he sent to the parliament, not long before he went to Hull; saying, that he did not doubt, but that town should be delivered up to him, whensoever he pleased, as supposing it to be kept against him; and in like manner concerning his magazine, in his message of the twenty-fourth of April, wherein it is expressed, that his majesty went thither, with a purpose to take into his hands the magazine, and to dispose of it in such manner, as he should think fit: upon those terms, sir John Hotham could not have admitted his majesty, and have made good his trust to the parliament, though his majesty would have entered alone, without any attendants at all of his own, or of the prince or duke, his sons; which they did not wish to be less than they were in their number, but could heartily wish that they were generally better in their conditions.

"In the close of that message, his majesty stated the case of Hull; and thereupon inferred, that the act of sir John Hotham was levying war against the king; and, consequently, that it was no less than high treason, by the letter of the statute of the 25 Edw. III. ch. 2, unless the sense of that statute were very far differing from the letter thereof.

"In the stating of that case, they said, divers particulars might be observed, wherein it was not rightly stated: as,

1. "That his majesty's going to Hull was only an endeavour to visit a town and fort of his: whereas it was indeed to possess himself of the town and magazine there, and to dispose of them, as he himself should think good, without, and contrary to the advice and orders of both houses of parliament; as did clearly appear by his majesty's own declaration of his intentions therein, by his messages to both houses, immediately before and after that journey. Nor could they believe, that any man, who should consider the circumstances of that journey to Hull, could think, that his majesty would have gone thither at that time, and in that posture that he was pleased to put himself in towards the parliament, if he had intended only a visit of the town and magazine.

2. "It was said to be his majesty's own town, and his own magazine, which being understood in that sense, as was before expressed, as if his majesty had a private interest of propriety therein, they could not admit it to be so.

3. "Which was the main point of all, sir John Hotham was said to have shut the gates against his majesty, and to have made resistance with armed men, in defiance of his majesty; whereas it was indeed in obedience to his majesty, and

"his authority, and for his service, and the service of the kingdom; for which use only, all that interest is, that the king hath in the town; and it is no further his to dispose of, than he useth it for that end: and sir John Hotham being commanded to keep the town and magazine, for his majesty and the kingdom, and not to deliver them up, but by his majesty's authority, signified by both houses of parliament, all that was to be understood by those expressions, of his denying and opposing his majesty's entrance, and telling him in plain terms, that he should not come in, was only this, that he humbly desired his majesty to forbear his entrance, till he might acquaint the parliament; and that his authority might come signified to him by both houses of parliament, according to the trust reposed in him. And certainly, if the letter of the statute of the 25 Edw. III. ch. 2, be thought to import this; that no war can be levied against the king, but what is directed and intended against his person, or that every levying of forces, for the defence of the king's authority, and of his kingdom, against the personal commands of the king opposed thereunto, though accompanied with his presence, is levying war against the king, it is very far from the sense of that statute; and so much the statute itself speaks, (besides the authority of book cases; precedents of divers traitors condemned upon that interpretation thereof.) For if the clause of levying of war had been meant only against the king's person, what need had there been thereof after the other branch of treason, in the same statute, of compassing the king's death, which would necessarily have implied this? And because the former clause doth imply this, it seems not at all to be intended in this latter branch; but only the levying of war against the king, that is, against his laws and authority: and the levying of war against his laws and authority, though not against his person, is levying war against the king; but the levying of force against his personal commands, though accompanied with his presence, and not against his laws and authority, but in the maintenance thereof, is no levying of war against the king, but for him.

"Here was then, they said, their case: In a time of so many successive plots, and designs of force against the parliament and the kingdom; in a time of probable invasion from abroad, and that to begin at Hull, and to take the opportunity of seizing upon so great a magazine there; in a time of so great distance and alienation of his majesty's affection from his parliament, (and in them from his kingdom, which they represent,) by the wicked suggestions of a few malignant persons, by whose mischievous counsels he was wholly led away from his parliament, and their faithful advices and counsels: in such a time, the lords and commons in parliament command sir John Hotham to draw in some of the trained bands of the parts adjacent to the town of Hull, for the securing that town and magazine for the service of his majesty, and of the kingdom: of the safety whereof there is a higher trust reposed in them, than any where else; and they are the proper judges of the danger thereof.

"This town and magazine being intrusted to sir John Hotham, with express order not to deliver them up, but by the king's authority, signified by “ both houses of parliament ; his majesty, contrary “ to the advice and direction of both houses of “ parliament, without the authority of any court, or “ any legal way, wherein the law appoints the king “ to speak and command, accompanied with the “ same evil council about him that he had before,

 “ by a verbal command requires sir John Hotham
 “ to admit him into the town, that he might dis“ pose of it, and of the magazine there, according “ to his own, or rather according to the pleasure of “ those evil counsellors, who are still in so much “ credit about him ; in like manner as the lord
 “ Digby had continual recourse unto, and counte“ nance from, the queen’s majesty in Holland ; by “ which means he had opportunity still to commu“ nicate his traitorous conceptions and suggestions
 “ to both their majesties ; such as those were con“ cerning his majesty’s retiring to a place of “ strength, and declaring himself, and his own ad“ vancing his majesty’s service in such a way be“ yond the seas, and after that resorting to his “ majesty in such a place of strength ; and divers
 “ other things of that nature, contained in his “ letter to the queen’s majesty, and to sir Lewis “ Dives ; a person that had not the least part in “ this late business of Hull, and was presently de-“ patched away into Holland, soon after his ma-“ jesty’s return from Hull ; for what purpose, they “ left the world to judge.

“ Upon the refusal of sir John Hotham to admit
 “ his majesty into Hull, presently, without any due “ process of law, before his majesty had sent up
 “ the narration of his fact to the parliament, he “ was proclaimed traitor ; and yet it was said, that “ therein was no violation of the subject’s right, “ nor any breach of the law, nor of the privilege of “ parliament, though sir John Hotham be a mem“ ber of the house of commons ; and that his ma“ jesty must have better reason, than bare votes, “ to believe the contrary ; although the votes of “ the lords and commons in parliament, being the “ great council of the kingdom, are the reason of “ the king, and of the kingdom : yet these votes,
 “ they said, did not want clear and apparent reason
 “ for them ; for if the solemn proclaiming him a “ traitor signify any thing, it puts a man, and all “ those that any way aid, assist, or adhere unto “ him, in the same condition of traitors ; and “ draws upon him all the consequences of treason :
 “ and if that might be done by law, without due “ process of law, the subject hath a very poor “ defence of the law, and a very small, if any, por“ tion of liberty thereby. And it is as little “ satisfaction to a man, that shall be exposed to “ such penalties, by that declaration of him to be “ a traitor, to say, he shall have a legal trial af“ terwards, as it is to condemn a man first, and try him “ afterwards. And if there could be a necessity for “ any such proclaiming a man a traitor, without due “ process of law, yet there was none in this case ;
 “ for his majesty might as well have expected the “ judgment of parliament, (which was the right “ way,) as he had leisure to send to them to “ demand justice against sir John Hotham. And
 “ the breach of privilege of parliament was as clear
 “ in this case, as the subversion of the subject’s “ common right : for, though the privileges of par“ liament do not extend to those cases, mentioned “ in the declaration, of treason, felony, and breach “ of peace, so as to exempt the members of par“ liament from punishment, nor from all manner of

“ process and trial, as it doth in other cases ; yet
 “ it doth privilege them in the way and method of “ their trial and punishment ; and that the parlia“ ment should have the cause first brought before “ them, that they may judge of the fact, and of “ the grounds of the accusation, and how far forth
 “ the manner of their trial may concern, or not “ concern, the privilege of parliament. Otherwise
 “ it would be in the power, not only of his ma“ jesty, but of every private man, under preten-“ sions of treasons, or those other crimes, to take “ any man from his service in parliament ; and so
 “ as many one after another as he pleaseth ; and,
 “ consequently, to make a parliament what he will,
 “ when he will ; which would be a breach of so es“ sential a privilege of parliament, as that the very “ being thereof depends upon it. And therefore “ they no ways doubted but every one, that had “ taken the protestation, would, according to his “ solemn vow and oath, defend it with his life and “ fortune. Neither did the sitting of a parliament “ suspend all, or any law, in maintaining that law, “ which upholds the privilege of parliament ; which “ upholds the parliament ; which upholds the king“ dom. And they were so far from believing, that “ his majesty was the only person against whom “ treason could not be committed, that, in some “ sense, they acknowledged he was the only person “ against whom it could be committed ; that is, as “ he is king : and that treason, which is against “ the kingdom, is more against the king, than that “ which is against his person ; because he is king :
 “ for that very treason is not treason, as it is against “ him as a man, but as a man that is a king ; and “ as he hath relation to the kingdom, and stands
 “ as a person intrusted with the kingdom, and dis“ charging that trust.

“ Now, they said, the case was truly stated, and “ all the world might judge where the fault was ;
 “ although they must avow, that there could be no
 “ competent judge of this, or any the like case,
 “ but a parliament. And they were as confident,
 “ that his majesty should never have cause to “ resort to any other court, or course, for the “ vindication of his just privileges, and for the “ recovery and maintenance of his known and un“ doubted rights, if there should be any invasion “ or violation thereof, than to his high court of “ parliament : and, in case those wicked counsel“ lers about him should drive him into any other “ course from and against his parliament, whatever “ his majesty’s expressions and intentions were,
 “ they should appeal to all men’s consciences ; and “ desire, that they would lay their hands upon “ their hearts, and think with themselves, whether “ such persons, as had of late, and still did resort “ unto his majesty, and had his ear and favour
 “ most, either had been or were more zealous “ assertors of the true protestant profession, (al“ though they believed they were more earnest in “ the protestant profession than in the protestant “ religion,) or the law of the land, the liberty of
 “ the subject, and the privileges of the parliament, “ than the members of both houses of parliament ;
 “ who were insinuated to be the deserters, if not the “ destroyers of them : and whether, if they could “ master this parliament by force, they would not “ hold up the same power to deprive us of all par“ liaments ; which are the ground and pillar of the “ subject’s liberty, and that which only maketh “ England a free monarchy.

"For the order of assistance to the committee of both houses, as they had no directions or instructions, but what had the law for their limits, and the safety of the land for their ends, so they doubted not but all persons mentioned in that order, and all his majesty's good subjects, would yield obedience to his majesty's authority, signified therein by both houses of parliament. And that all men might the better know their duty in matters of that nature, and upon how sure a ground they go, that follow the judgment of parliament for their guide, they wished them judiciously to consider the true meaning and ground of that statute made in the eleventh year of king Hen. VII. ch. 1. which was printed at large in the end of his majesty's message of the fourth of May: that statute provides, that none who shall attend upon the king, and do him true service, should be attainted, or forfeit any thing. What was the scope of that statute? To provide that men should not suffer as traitors, for serving the king in his wars according to the duty of their allegiance? If this had been all, it had been a very needless and ridiculous statute. Was it then intended, (as they seemed to take the meaning of it to be, that caused it to be printed after his majesty's message,) that they should be free from all crime and penalty, that should follow the king, and serve him in war in any case whatsoever; whether it were for or against the kingdom, and the laws thereof? That could not be; for that could not stand with the duty of their allegiance; which, in the beginning of the statute, was expressed to be to serve the king for the time being in his wars, for the defence of him and the land; and therefore if it be against the land, (as it cannot be understood to be otherwise, if it be against the parliament, the representative body of the kingdom,) it is a declining from the duty of allegiance; which this statute supposeth may be done, though men should follow the king's person in the war: otherwise there had been no need of such a proviso in the end of the statute, that none should take the benefit thereby, that should decline from their allegiance. That therefore which is the principal verb in this statute is, the serving of the king for the time being; which could not be meant of a Perkin Warbeck, or any that should call himself king; but such a one, as, whatever his title might prove, either in himself or in his ancestors, should be received and acknowledged for such by the kingdom; the consent whereof cannot be discerned but by parliament; the act whereof is the act of the whole kingdom, by the personal suffrage of the peers, and the delegate consent of all the commons of England.

"And Henry VII. a wise king, considering that what was the case of Rich. III. his predecessor, might, by chance of battle, be his own; and that he might at once, by such a statute as this, satisfy such as had served his predecessor in his wars, and also secure those which should serve him, who might otherwise fear to serve him in the wars; lest, by chance of battle, that might happen to him also, (if a duke of York had set up a title against him,) which had happened to his predecessor, he procured this statute to be made; that no man should be accounted a traitor for serving the king, in his wars, for the time "being, that is, which was for the present allowed and received by the parliament in behalf of the kingdom: and, as it is truly suggested in the preamble of the statute, it is not agreeable to reason or conscience, that it should be otherwise; seeing men should be put upon an impossibility of knowing their duty, if the judgment of the highest court should not be a rule and guide to them. And if the judgment thereof should not be followed, where the question is, who is king? much more, what is the best service of the king and kingdom? And therefore those, who should guide themselves by the judgment of parliament, ought, whatever happen, to be secure and free from all account and penalties, upon the grounds and equity of this very statute.

"They said, they would conclude, that although those wicked counsellors about his majesty had presumed, under his majesty's name, to put that dishonour and affront upon both houses of parliament; and to make them the countenancers of treason, enough to have dissolved all the bands and sinews of confidence between his majesty and his parliament, (of whom the maxim of the law is, that a dishonourable thing ought not to be imagined of them,) yet they doubted not, but it should, in the end, appear to all the world, that their endeavours had been most hearty and sincere, for the maintenance of the true protestant religion; the king's just prerogative; the laws and liberties of the land; and the privileges of parliament: in which endeavours, by the grace of God, they would still persist, though they should perish in the work; which if it should be, it was much to be feared, that religion, laws, liberties, and parliaments, would not be long lived after them."

This declaration wrought more upon the minds of men, than all that they had done; for the business at Hull was, by very many, thought to be done before projected; and the argument of the militia to be entered upon at first in passion, and afterwards pursued with that vehemence, insensibly, by being engaged; and that both extravagances had so much weighed down the king's trespasses, in coming to the house and accusing the members, that a reasonable agreement would have been the sooner consented to on all hands. But when, by this declaration, they saw foundations laid, upon which not only what had been already done would be well justified, but whatsoever they should, hereafter, find convenient to second what was already done; and that not only the king, but the regal power, was either suppressed, or deposited in other hands; the irregularity and monstrousness of which principles found little opposition or resistance, even for the irregularity and monstrousness: very many thought it as unsafe to be present at those consultations, as to consent to the conclusions; and so great numbers of the members of both houses absented themselves; and many, especially of the house of peers, resorted to his majesty at York. So that, in the debates of the highest consequence, there were not usually present, in the house of commons, the fifth part of their just numbers; and, very often, not above a dozen or thirteen in the house of peers. In the mean time the king had a full court, and received all comers with great clemency and grace; calling always all the peers to council, and communicating with them all such declarations he thought fit to publish in answer to those of the parliament; and all messages, and whatever else was necessary to be done for the improvement of his condition: and, having now the great seal with him, issued such proclamations, as were seasonable for the preservation of the peace of the kingdom. First he published a declaration in answer to that of the nineteenth of May, in which his majesty said:

"That if he could be weary of taking any pains for the satisfaction of his people, and to undeceive them of those specious, mischievous insinuations, which were daily instilled into them, to shake and corrupt their loyalty and affection to his majesty and his government, after so full and ample declaration of himself and intentions, and so fair and satisfactory answers to all such matters as had been objected to him, by a major part present of both houses of parliament, he might well give over that labour of his pen; and sit still, till it should please God to enlighten the affections and understandings of his good subjects on his behalf, (which he doubted not, but that, in his good time, he would do,) that they might see his sufferings were their sufferings: but since, instead of applying themselves to the method, proposed by his majesty, of making such solid particular propositions, as might establish a good understanding between them, or of following the advice of his council of Scotland, (with whom they communicated their affairs,) in forbearing all means that might make the breach wider, and the wound deeper; they had chosen to pursue his majesty with new reproaches, or rather to continue and improve the old, by adding, and varying little circumstances and language, in matters formerly urged by them, and fully answered by his majesty, he had prevailed with himself, upon very mature and particular consideration of it, to answer the late printed book, entitled a Declaration or Remonstrance of the Lords and Commons, which was ordered, the nineteenth of May last, to be printed and published; hoping then, that they would put his majesty to no more of that trouble, but that that should have been the last of such a nature they would have communicated to his people; and that they would not, as they had done since, have thought fit to assault him with a newer declaration, indeed of a very new nature and learning; which should have another answer: and he doubted not, but that his good subjects would, in short time, be so well instructed in the differences and mistakings between them, that they would plainly discern, without resigning their reason and understanding to his prerogative, or the infallibility of a now major part of both houses of parliament, (infected by a few malignant spirits,) where the fault was.

"His majesty said, though he should, with all humility and alacrity, be always forward to acknowledge the infinite mercy and providence of Almighty God, vouchsafed, so many several ways, to himself and this nation; yet, since God himself doth not allow, that we should fancy and create dangers to ourselves, that we might manifest and publish his mercy in our deliverance; he must profess, that he did not know those deliverances, mentioned in the beginning of that declaration, from so many wicked plots and designs, since the beginning of this parliament, which, if they had taken effect, would have brought ruin and destruction upon this kingdom. His majesty well knew the great labour and skill, which had been used to amuse and affright his good subjects with fears and apprehensions of plots and conspiracies; the several pamphlets published, and letters scattered up and down, full of such ridiculous, contemptible animadversions to that purpose, as (though they found, for what end God knows, very unusual countenance) no sober man would be moved with them. But, he must confess, he had never been able to inform himself of any such pernicious, formed design against the peace of the kingdom, since the beginning of this parliament, as was mentioned in that declaration, or which might be any warrant to those great fears, both houses of parliament seemed to be transported with; but he had great reason to believe, that more mischief and danger had been raised and begotten, to the disturbance of the kingdom, than cured or prevented, by those fears and jealousies. And therefore, however the rumour and discourse of plots and conspiracies might have been necessary to the designs of particular men, they should do well not to pay any false devotions to Almighty God, who discerns whether our dangers are real or pretended.

"For the bringing up of the army to London, as his majesty had heretofore, by no other direction than the testimony of a good conscience, called God to witness, that he never had, or knew of, any such resolution; so he said, upon the view of the depositions now published with that declaration, it was not evident to his majesty, that there was ever such a design; unless every loose discourse, or argument, be evidence enough of a design: and it was apparent, that what had been said of it, was near three months before the discovery to both houses of parliament; so that if there were any danger threatened that way, it vanished without any resistance, or prevention, by the wisdom, power, or authority of them.

"It seemed the intention of that declaration, whatsoever other end it had, was to answer a declaration they had received from his majesty, in answer to that which was presented to his majesty at Newmarket, the ninth of March last; and likewise to his answer to the petition of both houses, presented to him at York, the twenty-sixth of March: but, before it fell upon any particular of his majesty's declaration or answer, it complained that the heads of the malignant party had, with much art and industry, advised him to suffer divers unjust scandals and imputations upon the parliament, to be published in his name, whereby they might make it odious to the people, and, by their help, destroy it: but not instancing in any one scandal, or imputation, so published by his majesty, he was, he said, still to seek for the heads of that malignant party. But his good subjects would easily understand, that if he were guilty of that aspersion, he must not only be active in raising the scandal, but passive in the mischief begotten by that scandal, his majesty being an essential part of the parliament; and he hoped the just defence of himself and his authority, and the necessary vindication of his innocence and justice, from the imputations laid on him, by a major part then present "of either or both houses, should no more be called a scandal upon the parliament, than the opinion of such a part be reputed an act of parliament: and he hoped his good subjects would not be long misled, by that common expression in all the declarations, wherein they usurp the word parliament, and apply it to countenance any resolution or vote some few had a mind to make, by calling it the resolution of parliament; which could never be without his majesty's consent; neither could the vote of either or both houses make a greater alteration in the laws of the kingdom, (so solemnly made by the advice of their predecessors, with the concurrence of his majesty and his ancestors,) either by commanding or inhibiting any thing, (besides the known rule of the law,) than his single direction or mandate could do, to which he did not ascribe that authority.

"But that declaration informed the people, that the malignant party had drawn his majesty into the northern parts, far from his parliament. It might, his majesty said, more truly and properly have said, that it had driven, than drawn him thither; for, he confessed, his journey thither (for which he had no other reason to be sorry, than with reference to the cause of it) was only forced upon him, by the true malignant party; which contrived and countenanced those barbarous tumults, and other seditious circumstances, of which he had so often complained, and hereafter should say more; and which indeed threatened so much danger to his person, and laid so much scandal upon the privilege and dignity of parliament, that he wondered it could be mentioned without blushes or indignation: but of that anon: but why the malignant party should be charged with causing a press to be transported to York, his majesty said, he could not imagine; neither had any papers or writings issued from thence, to his knowledge, but what had been extorted from him by such provocations, as had not been before offered to a king. And, no doubt, it would appear a most trivial and fond exception, when all presses were open to vent whatsoever they thought fit to say to the people, (a thing unwarranted by former custom,) that his majesty should not make use of all lawful means, to publish his just and necessary answers thereunto. As for the authority of the great seal, (though he did not know that it had been necessary to things of that nature,) the same should be more frequently used hereafter, as occasion should require; to which he made no doubt, but the greater and better part of his privy council would concur; and whose advice he was resolved to follow, as far as it should be agreeable to the good and welfare of the kingdom.

"Before that declaration vouchsafed to insist on any particulars, it was pleased to censure both his majesty's declaration and answer to be filled with harsh censures, and causeless charges upon the parliament, (still misapplying the word parliament to the vote of both houses,) concerning which they resolve to give satisfaction to the kingdom, since they found it very difficult to satisfy his majesty. If, as in the usage of the word parliament, they had left his majesty out of their thoughts; so by the word kingdom, they intended to exclude all his people who were not within their walls, (for that was grown another

"phrase of the time, the vote of the major part of both houses, and sometimes of one, was now called the resolution of the whole kingdom,) his majesty believed, it might not be hard to give satisfaction to themselves; otherwise he was confident, (and, he said, his confidence proceeded from the uprightness of his own conscience,) they would never be able so to sever the affections of his majesty and his kingdom, that what could not be satisfaction to the one, should be to the other: neither would the style of humble, and faithful, and telling his majesty that they will make him a great and glorious king, in their petitions and remonstrances, so deceive his good subjects, that they would pass over the reproaches, threats, and menaces they were stuffed with; which surely could not be more gently reprehended by his majesty, than by saying, their expressions were different from the usual language to princes; which that declaration told him he had no occasion to say: but he believed, whosoever looked over that declaration, presented to him at Newmarket, to which his was an answer, would find the language throughout it to be so unusual, that, before this parliament, it could never be paralleled; whilst, under pretence of justifying their fears, they gave so much countenance to the discourse of the rebels of Ireland, as if they had a mind his good subjects should give credit to it: otherwise, being warranted by the same evidence, which they have since published, they would have as well declared, that those rebels publicly threaten the rooting out the name of the English, and that they will have a king of their own, and no longer be governed by his majesty, as that they say, that they do nothing, but by his majesty's authority; and that they call themselves the queen's army. And therefore he had great reason to complain of the absence of justice and integrity in that declaration; besides the unfitness of other expressions.

"Neither did his majesty mistake the substance, or logic of their message to him, at Theobalds, concerning the militia; which was no other, and was stated to be no other, even by that declaration that reproved him, than a plain threat, that if his majesty refused to join with them, they would make a law without him: nor had the practice since that time been other; which would never be justified to the most ordinary (if not partial) understandings, by the mere averring it to be according to the fundamental laws of this kingdom, without giving any directions, that the most cunning and learned men in the laws might be able to find those foundations. And he would appeal unto all the world, whether they might not, with as much justice, and by as much law, have seized upon the estate of every member of both houses, who dissented from that pretended ordinance, (which much the major part of the house of peers did, two or three several times,) as they had invaded that power of his over the militia, because he, upon reasons they had not so much as pretended to answer, refused to consent to that proposition.

"And if no better effects, than loss of time, and hindrance of the public affairs, had been found by his answers and replies, all good men might judge by whose default, and whose want of duty, such effects had been; for as his end, indeed his

"only end, in those answers and replies, had been the settlement and composure of public affairs; so, he was assured, and most men did believe, that if that due regard and reverence had been given to his words, and that consent and obedience to his counsels, which he expected, there had been, before that time, a cheerful calm upon the face of the whole kingdom; every man enjoying his own, with all possible peace and security that can be imagined; which surely those men did not desire, who (after all those acts of justice and favour passed by him this parliament; all those sufferings and affronts endured and undergone by him) thought fit still to reproach him with ship-money, coat and conduct-money, and other things so abundantly declared, as that declaration itself confessed, in the general remonstrance of the state of the kingdom, published in November last; which his majesty wondered to find now avowed to be the remonstrance of both houses; and which, he was sure, was presented to him only by the house of commons; and did never, and, he was confident, in that time could never have passed the house of peers; the concurrence and authority of which was not then thought necessary. Should his majesty believe those reproaches to be the voice of the kingdom of England, that all his loving subjects eased, refreshed, strengthened, and abundantly satisfied with his acts of grace and favour towards them, were willing to be involved in those unthankful expressions? He would appeal to the thanks and acknowledgments published in the petitions of most of the counties of England; to the testimony and thanks he had received from both houses of parliament; how seasonable, how agreeable that usage was to his majesty's merit, or their former expressions.

"His majesty said, he had not at all swerved or departed from his resolutions, or words, in the beginning of this parliament; he had said, he was resolved to put himself freely and clearly upon the love and affection of his English subjects; and he said so still, as far as concerns England. And he called Almighty God to witness, all his complaints and jealousies, which had never been causeless, nor of his houses of parliament, (but of some few schismatical, factious, and ambitious spirits; and upon grounds, as he feared, a short time would justify to the world,) his denial of the militia, his absenting himself from London, had been the effects of an upright and faithful affection to his English subjects; that he might be able, through all the inconveniences he might be compelled to wrestle with, at last to preserve and restore their religion, laws, and liberties unto them.

"Since the proceeding against the lord Kimbolton, and the five members, was still looked upon, and so often pressed, as so great an advantage against his majesty, that no retraction made by him, nor no action, since that time committed against him, and the law of the land, under the pretence of vindication of privilege, could satisfy the contrivers of that declaration, but that they would have his good subjects believe, the accusation of those six members must be a plot for the breaking the neck of the parliament, (a strange arrogance, if any of those members had the penning of that declaration,) and that it was so often urged against him, as if

"by that single, casual mistake of his, in form only, he had forfeited all duty, credit, and allegiance from his people, he said, he would, without endeavouring to excuse that, which in truth was an error, (his going to the house of commons,) give his people a full and clear narration of the matter of fact; assuring himself, that his good subjects would not find his carriage, in that business, such as had been reported.

"His majesty said, that when he resolved, upon such grounds, as, when they should be published, would satisfy the world, that it was fit for his own safety and honour, and the peace of the kingdom, to proceed against those persons; though, he well knew, there was no degree of privilege in that case; yet, to shew his desire of correspondence with the two houses of parliament, he chose rather than to apprehend their persons by the ordinary ministers of justice, (which, according to the opinion and practice of former times, he might have done,) to command his attorney general, to acquaint his house of peers with his intention, and the general matters of his charge, (which was yet more particular, than a mere accusation,) and to proceed accordingly; and at the same time sent a sworn servant, a sergeant at arms, to the house of commons, to acquaint them, that his majesty did accuse, and intended to prosecute, the five members of that house for high treason; and did require, that their persons might be secured in custody. This he did, not only to shew that he intended not to violate or invade their privileges, but to use more ceremony towards them, than he then conceived in justice might be required of him; and expected at least such an answer, as might inform him, if he were out of the way; but he received none at all; only, in the instant, without offering any thing of their privileges to his consideration, an order was made, and the same night published in print, that if any person whatsoever should offer to arrest the person of any member of that house, without first acquainting that house therewith, and receiving further order from that house, that it should be lawful for such member, or any person, to assist them; and to stand upon his or their guard or defence; and to make resistance, according to the protestation taken to defend the privileges of parliament: and this was the first time that he heard the protestation might be wrested to such a sense, or that in any case, though of the most undoubted and unquestionable privilege, it might be lawful for any person to resist, and use violence against a public minister of justice, armed with lawful authority; though his majesty well knew, that even such a minister might be punished for executing such authority.

"Upon viewing that order, his majesty confessed, he was somewhat amazed, having never seen or heard of the like; though he had known members of either house committed, without so much formality as he had used, and upon crimes of a far inferior nature to those he had suggested; and having no course proposed him for his proceeding, he was, upon the matter, only told, that against those persons he was not to proceed at all; that they were above his reach, or the reach of the law. It was not easy for him to resolve what to do: if he employed his ministers of justice in the usual way for their "apprehension, who without doubt would not have refused to have executed his lawful commands, he saw what opposition, and resistance, was like to be made; which, very probably, might have cost some blood: if he sat still, and desisted upon that terror, he should, at the best, have confessed his own want of power, and the weakness of the law. In that strait, he put on a sudden resolution, to try whether his own presence, and a clear discovery of his intentions, which haply might not have been so well understood, could remove those doubts, and prevent those inconveniences, which seemed to have been threatened; and thereupon he resolved to go, in his own person, to the house of commons; which he discovered not, till the very minute of his going; when he sent out, that his servants, and such gentlemen as were then in his court, should attend him to Westminster; but giving them express command, as he had expressed in his answer to the ordinance, that no accidents, or provocation, should draw them to any such action, as might imply a purpose of force in his majesty; and himself, requiring those of his train not to come within the door, went into the house of commons; the bare doing of which, he did not then conceive, would have been thought more a breach of privilege, than if he had gone to the house of peers, and sent for them to come to him: which was the usual custom.

"He used the best expressions he could, to assure them how far he was from any intention of violating their privileges; that he intended to proceed legally and speedily against the persons he had accused; and desired therefore, if they were in the house, that they might be delivered to him; or if absent, that such course might be taken for their forthcoming, as might satisfy his just demands; and so he departed, having no other purpose of force, if they had been in the house, than he had before protested, before God, in his answer to the ordinance. They had an account now of his part of that story fully; his people might judge freely of it. What followed on their part, (though that declaration said, it could not withdraw any part of their reverence and obedience from his majesty; it might be any part of theirs it did not,) he should have too much cause hereafter to inform the world.

"His majesty said, there would be no end of the discourse, and upbraiding him with evil counsellors, if, upon his constant denial of knowing any, they would not vouchsafe to inform him of them; and after eight months amusing the kingdom with the expectation of the discovery of a malignant party, and of evil counsellors, they would not at last name any, nor describe them. Let the actions and lives of men be examined, who had contrived, counselled, actually consented to grieve and burden his people; and if such were now about his majesty, or any against whom any notorious, malicious crime could be proved, if he sheltered and protected any such, let his injustice be published to the world: but till that were done, particularly, and manifestly, (for he should never conclude any man upon a bare, general vote of the major part of either, or both houses, till it were evident, that that major part was without passion or affection,) he must look upon the charge that declaration put on him,

"of cherishing and countenancing a discontented party of the kingdom against them, as a heavier and unjust tax upon his justice and honour, than any he had, or could lay, upon the framers of that declaration. And now, to countenance those unhandsome expressions, whereby usually they had implied his majesty's connivance at, or want of zeal against, the rebellion of Ireland, (so odious to all good men,) they had found a new way of exprobration: that the proclamation against those bloody traitors came not out, till the beginning of January, though that rebellion broke out in October, and then, by special command from his majesty, but forty copies were appointed to be printed. His majesty said, it was well known where he was at that time, when that rebellion brake forth; in Scotland: that he immediately, from thence, recommended the care of that business to both houses of parliament here, after he had provided for all fitting supplies from his kingdom of Scotland: that, after his return hither, he observed all those forms for that service, which he was advised to by his council of Ireland, or both houses of parliament here; and if no proclamation issued out sooner, (of which, for the present, he was not certain; but thought that others, by his directions, were issued before that time,) it was, because the lords justices of the kingdom desired them no sooner; and when they did, the number they desired was but twenty; which they advised might be signed by his majesty; which he, for expedition of the service, commanded to be printed; a circumstance not required by them; thereupon he signed more of them, than his justices desired; all which was very well known to some members of one, or both houses of parliament; who had the more to answer, if they forbore to express it at the passing of that declaration; and if they did express it, he had the greater reason to complain, that so envious an aspersion should be cast on his majesty to his people, when they knew well how to answer their own objection.

"What that complaint was against the parliament, put forth in his name, which was such an evidence and countenance to the rebels, and spoke the same language of the parliament which the rebels did; he said he could not understand. All his answers and declarations had been, and were, owned by himself; and had been attested under his own hand: if any other had been published in his name, and without his authority, it would be easy for both houses of parliament to discover and apprehend the authors: and he wished, that whosoever was trusted with the drawing and penning that declaration, had no more authority, or cunning to impose upon, or deceive a major part of those votes, by which it passed, than any man had to prevail with his majesty to publish in his name any thing, but the sense and resolution of his own heart; or that the contriver of that declaration could, with as good a conscience, call God to witness, that all his counsels and endeavours had been free from all private aims, personal respects or passions whatsoever, as his majesty had done, and did, that he never had, or knew of such resolution of bringing up the army to London.

"And since that new device was found out, in“stead of answering his reasons, or satisfying his just demands, to blast his declarations and answers, as if they were not his own; a bold, senseless imputation; he said he was sure, that every answer and declaration, published by his majesty, was much more his own, than any one of those bold, threatening, and reproachful petitions and remonstrances, were the acts of either, or both houses. And if the penner of that declaration had been careful of the trust reposed in him, he would never have denied, (and thereupon found fault with his majesty's just indignation,) in the text or margin, that his majesty had never been charged with the intention of any force; and that in their whole declaration, there was no one word tending to any such reproach; the contrary whereof was so evident, that his majesty was, in express terms, charged in that declaration, that he had sent them gracious messages, when, with his privy, bringing up the army was in agitation; and, even in that declaration, they sought to make the people believe some such thing to be proved, in the depositions therewith published; wherein, his majesty doubted not, they would as much fail, as they did in their censure of that petition, shewed formerly to his majesty by captain Leg, and subscribed by him with C. R. which, notwithstanding his majesty's full and particular narration of the substance of that petition, the circumstances of his seeing and approving it, that declaration was pleased to say, was full of scandal to the parliament, and might have proved dangerous to the whole kingdom. If they had that dangerous petition in their hands, his majesty said, he had no reason to believe any tenderness towards him had kept them from communicating it; if they had it not, his majesty ought to have been believed: but that all good people might compute their other pretended dangers by their clear understanding of that, the noise whereof had not been inferior to any of the rest, his majesty said, he had recovered a true copy of the very petition he had signed with C. R. which should, in fit time, be published; and which, he hoped, would open the eyes of his good people.

“Concerning his warrant for Mr. Jermyn's passage, his answer was true, and full; but for his black satin suit, and white boots, he could give no account.

“His majesty had complained in his declaration, and, as often as he should have occasion to mention his return, and residence near London, he should complain, of the barbarous and seditious tumults at Whitehall and Westminster; which indeed had been so full of scandal to his government, and danger to his person, that he should never think of his return thither, till he had justice for what was past, and security for the time to come: and if there were so great a necessity, or desire of his return, as was pretended, in all this time, upon so often pressing his desires, and upon causes so notorious, he should at least have procured some order for the future. But that declaration told his majesty he was, upon the matter, mistaken; the resort of the citizens to Westminster was as lawful, as the resort of great numbers every day in the term to the ordinary courts of justice; they knew no tumults. Strange! was the disorderly appear“ance of so many thousand people, with staves and swords, crying through the streets, Westminster-hall, the passage between both houses, (insomuch as the members could hardly pass to and fro,) No bishops, down with the bishops, no tumults? What member was there of either house, that saw not those numbers, and heard not those cries? And yet lawful assemblies! Were not several members of either house assaulted, threatened, and evilly entreated? And yet no tumults! Why made the house of peers a declaration, and sent it down to the house of commons, for the suppressing of tumults, if there were no tumults? And if there were any, why was not such a declaration consented to, and published? When the attempts were so visible, and threats so loud to pull down the abbey at Westminster, had not his majesty just cause to apprehend, that such people might continue their work to Whitehall? Yet no tumults! What a strange time are we in, that a few impudent, malicious (to give them no worse term) men should cast such a mist of error before the eyes of both houses of parliament, as that they either could not, or would not, see how manifestly they injured themselves, by maintaining those visible untruths. His majesty said, he would say no more: by the help of God and the law, he would have justice for those tumults.

“From excepting, how weightily every man might judge, to what his majesty had said, that declaration proceeded to censure him for what he had not said; for the prudent omissions in his answer: his majesty had forborne to say any thing of the words spoken at Kensington; or the articles against his dearest consort, and the accusation of the six members: of the last, his majesty said, he had spoken often; and he thought, enough of the other two; but having never accused any, (though God knew what truth there might be in either,) he had no reason to give any particular answer.

“He said, he did not reckon himself bereaved of any part of his prerogative; which he was pleased freely, for a time, to part with by bill; yet he must say, he expressed a great trust in his two houses of parliament, when he divested himself of the power of dissolving this parliament; which was a just, necessary, and proper prerogative. But he was glad to hear their resolution, that it should not encourage them to do any thing which otherwise had not been fit to have been done: if it did, it would be such a breach of trust, God would require an account for at their hands.

“For the militia, he had said so much in it before, and the point was so well understood by all men, that he would waste time no more in that dispute. He never had said, there was no such thing as an ordinance, though he knew that they had been long disused, but that there was never any ordinance, or could be any, without the king's consent; and that was true: and the unnecessary precedent, cited in that declaration, did not offer to prove the contrary. But enough of that; God and the law must determine that business.

“Neither had that declaration given his majesty any satisfaction concerning the votes of the fifteenth and sixteenth of March last; which he must declare, and appeal to all the world in the point, to be the greatest violation of his majesty's "privilege, the law of the land, the liberty of the subject, and the right of parliament, that could be imagined. One of those votes was, and there would need no other to destroy the king and people, that when the lords and commons (it is well the commons are admitted to their part in judicature) shall declare what the law of the land is, the same must be assented to, and obeyed; that is the sense in few words. Where is every man's property; every man's liberty? If the major part of both houses declare, that the law is, that the younger brother shall inherit; what is become of all the families and estates in the kingdom? If they declare, that, by the fundamental law of the land, such a rash action, such an unadvised word, ought to be punished by perpetual imprisonment, is not the liberty of the subject, durante beneplacito, remediless? That declaration confesses, they pretend not to a power of making new laws; that, without his majesty, they could not do that: they needed no such power, if their declaration could suspend this statute from being obeyed, and executed. If they had power to declare the lord Digby's waiting on his majesty to Hampton-court, and thence visiting some officers at Kingston, with a coach and six horses, to be levying of war, and high treason; and sir John Hotham's defying his majesty to his face, keeping his majesty's town, fort, and goods against him, by force of arms, to be an act of affection and loyalty; what needed a power of making new laws? or would there be such a thing as law left?

"He desired his good subjects to mark the reason and consequence of those votes; the progress they had already made, and how infinite that progress might be. First, they voted the kingdom was in imminent danger (it was now above three months since they discerned it) from enemies abroad, and a popish and discontented party at home; that is matter of fact; the law follows: this vote had given them authority by law, the fundamental laws of the kingdom, to order and dispose of the militia of the kingdom; and, with this power, and to prevent that danger, to enter into his majesty's towns, seize upon his magazine, and, by force, keep both from him. Was not that his majesty's case? First, they vote he had an intention to levy war against his parliament; that is matter of fact: then they declare such as shall assist him, to be guilty of high treason; that is the law, and proved by two statutes themselves knew to be repealed. No matter for that; they declare it. Upon this ground they exercise the militia; and so actually do that upon his majesty, which they had voted he intended to do upon them. Who could not see the confusion that must follow upon such a power of declaring? If they should now vote that his majesty did not write this declaration, but that such a one did it, which was still matter of fact; and then declare, that, for so doing, he was an enemy to the commonwealth; what was become of the law that man was born to? And if all their zeal for the defence of the law were but to defend that which they declared to be law, their own votes; it would not be in their power to satisfy any man of their good intentions to the public peace, but such who were willing to relinquish his title to Magna Charta, and hold his life, and fortune, by a vote of a major "part of both houses. In a word, his majesty denied not, but they might have power to declare in a particular, doubtful case, regularly brought before them, what law is: but to make a general declaration, whereby the known rule of the law might be crossed, or altered, they had no power; nor could exercise any, without bringing the life and liberty of the subject to a lawless and arbitrary subjection.

"His majesty had complained (and the world might judge of the justice and necessity of that complaint) of the multitude of seditious pamphlets and sermons; and that declaration told him, they knew he had ways enough in his ordinary courts of justice to punish those; so, his majesty said, he had to punish tumults and riots; and yet they would not serve his turn to keep his towns, his forests, and parks from violence. And it might be, though those courts had still the power to punish, they might have lost the skill to define, what tumults and riots are; otherwise a jury in Southwark, legally empaneled to examine a riot there, would not have been superseded, and the sheriff enjoined not to proceed, by virtue of an order of the house of commons; which, it seemed, at that time had the sole power of declaring. But it was no wonder that they, who could not see the tumults, did not consider the pamphlets and sermons; though the author of the Protestation protested were well known to be Burton, (that infamous disturber of the peace of the church and state,) and that he preached it at Westminster, in the hearing of divers members of the house of commons. But of such pamphlets and seditious preachers (divers whereof had been recommended, if not imposed upon several parishes, by some members of both houses, by what authority his majesty knew not) he would hereafter take a further account.

"His majesty said, he confessed he had little skill in the laws; and those that had had most, he found now were much to seek: yet he could not understand or believe, that every ordinary court, or any court, had power to raise what guard they pleased, and under what command they pleased. Neither could he imagine, what dangerous effects they found by the guard he appointed them; or indeed any the least occasion, why they needed a guard at all.

"But of all the imputations, so causelessly and unjustly laid upon his majesty by that declaration, he said, he must wonder at that charge so apparently and evidently untrue; that such were continually preferred and countenanced by him, who were friends or favourers, or related unto the chief authors and actors of that arbitrary power heretofore practised, and complained of: and, on the other side, that such as did appear against it were daily discountenanced and disgraced. He said, he would know one person that contributed to the ills of those times, or had dependence upon those that did, whom he did, or lately had countenanced, or preferred; nay he was confident, (and he looked for no other at their hands,) as they had been always most eminent assertors of the public liberties; so, if they found his majesty inclined to any thing not agreeable to honour and justice, they would leave him to-morrow. Whether different persons had not, and did not receive countenance elsewhere, and upon what grounds, all men

"might judge; and whether his majesty had not been forward enough to honour and prefer those of the most contrary opinion, how little comfort soever he had of those preferments, in bestowing of which, hereafter, he would be more guided by men's actions than opinions. And therefore he had good cause to bestow that admonition (for his majesty assured them, it was an admonition of his own) upon both his houses of parliament, to take heed of inclining, under the specious shows of necessity and danger, to the exercise of such an arbitrary power, they before complained of: the advice would do no harm, and he should be glad to see it followed.

"His majesty asked, if all the specious promises, and loud professions, of making him a great and a glorious king; of settling a greater revenue upon his majesty, than any of his ancestors had enjoyed; of making him to be honoured at home, and feared abroad; were resolved into this; that they would be ready to settle his revenue in an honourable proportion, when he should put himself in such a posture of government, that his subjects might be secure to enjoy his just protection for their religion, laws, and liberties? What posture of government they intended, he knew not; nor could he imagine what security his good subjects could desire for their religion, laws, and liberties, which he had not offered, or fully given. And was it suitable to the duty and dignity of both houses of parliament to answer his particular, weighty expressions of the causes of his remove from London, so generally known to the kingdom, with a scoff; that they hoped he was driven from thence, not by his own fears, but by the fears of the lord Digby, and his retinue of cavaliers? Sure, his majesty said, the penner of that declaration inserted that ungrave and insolent expression, as he had done divers others, without the consent or examination of both houses; who would not so lightly have departed from their former professions of duty to his majesty.

"Whether the way to a good understanding between his majesty and his people had been as zealously pressed by them, as it had been professed and desired by him, would be easily discerned by them who observed that he had left no public act undone on his part, which, in the least degree, might be necessary to the peace, plenty, and security of his subjects: and that they had not despatched one act, which had given the least evidence of their particular affection and kindness to his majesty; but, on the contrary, had discountenanced and hindered the testimony other men would give to him of their affections. Witness the stopping, and keeping back, the bill of subsidies, granted by the clergy almost a year since; which, though his personal wants were so notoriously known, they would not, to that time, pass; so not only forbearing to supply his majesty themselves, but keeping the love and bounty of other men from him; and afforded no other answers to all his desires, all his reasons, (indeed not to be answered,) than that he must not make his understanding, or reason, the rule of his government; but suffer himself to be assisted (which his majesty never denied) by his great council. He said, he required no other liberty to his will, than the meanest of them did, (he wished they would "always use that liberty,) not to consent to any thing evidently contrary to his conscience and understanding: and he had, and should always give as much estimation and regard to the advice and counsel of both houses of parliament, as ever prince had done: but he should never, and he hoped his people would never, account the contrivance of a few factious, seditious persons, a malignant party, who would sacrifice the commonwealth to their own fury and ambition, the wisdom of parliament; and that the justifying and defending of such persons (of whom, and of their particular, sinister ways, to compass their own bad ends, his majesty would shortly inform the world) was not the way to preserve parliaments, but was the opposing, and preferring a few unworthy persons, before their duty to their king, or their care of the kingdom. They would have his majesty remember, that his resolutions did concern kingdoms, and therefore not to be moulded by his own understanding: he said, he did well remember it; but he would have them remember, that when their consultations endeavoured to lessen the office and dignity of a king, they meddled with that which is not within their determination, and of which his majesty must give an account to God, and his other kingdoms, and must maintain with the sacrifice of his life.

"Lastly, that declaration told the people of a present, desperate, and malicious plot the malignant party was then acting, under the plausible notions of stirring men up to a care of preserving the king's prerogative; maintaining the discipline of the church, upholding and continuing the reverence and solemnity of God's service; and encouraging learning, (indeed plausible and honourable notions to act any thing upon,) and that upon those grounds divers mutinous petitions had been framed in London, Kent, and other places: his majesty asked upon what grounds these men would have petitions framed? Had so many petitions, even against the form and constitution of the kingdom, and the laws established, been joyfully received and accepted? And should petitions framed upon those grounds be called mutinous? Had a multitude of mean, unknown, inconsiderable, contemptible persons, about the city and suburbs of London, had liberty to petition against the government of the church; against the Book of Common-Prayer; against the freedom and privilege of parliament; and been thanked for it; and should it be called mutiny, in the gravest and best citizens of London, in the gentry and commonalty of Kent, to frame petitions upon those grounds; and to desire to be governed by the known laws of the land, not by orders and votes of either, or both houses? Could this be thought the wisdom and justice of both houses of parliament? Was it not evidently the work of a faction, within or without both houses, who deceived the trust reposed in them; and had now told his majesty what mutiny was? To stir men up to a care of preserving his prerogative, maintaining the discipline of the church, upholding and continuing the reverence and solemnity of God's service, encouraging of learning, was mutiny. Let heaven and earth, God and man, judge between his majesty and these men: and however such petitions were there called mutinous; and the peti"tioners threatened, discountenanced, censured, and imprisoned; if they brought such petitions to his majesty, he would graciously receive them; and defend them, and their rights, against what power soever, with the uttermost hazard of his being."

"His majesty said, he had been the longer, to his very great pain, in this answer, that he might give the world satisfaction, even in the most trivial particulars, which had been objected against him; and that he might not be again reproached, with any more prudent omissions. If he had been compelled to sharper language than his majesty affected, it might be considered, how vile, how insufferable his provocations had been: and, except to repel force were to assault, and to give punctual and necessary answers to rough and insolent demands, were to make invectives, he was confident the world would accuse his majesty of too much mildness; and all his good subjects would think, he was not well dealt with; and would judge of his majesty, and of their own happiness, and security in him, by his actions; which he desired might no longer prosper, or have a blessing from God upon them, and his majesty, than they should be directed to the glory of God, in the maintenance of the true protestant profession, to the preservation of the property and liberty of the subject, in the observation of the laws; and to the maintenance of the rights and freedom of parliament, in the allowance and protection of all their just privileges."

This declaration was no sooner published, but his majesty likewise set forth an answer to that other declaration, of the twenty-sixth of May; in which he said, "that whosoever looked over the late remonstrance, entitled, A Declaration of the Lords and Commons, of the twenty-sixth of May, would not think that his majesty had great reason to be pleased with it; yet he could not but commend the plaindealing and ingenuity of the framers and contrivers of that declaration, (which had been wrought in a hotter and quicker forge than any of the rest,) who would no longer suffer his majesty to be affronted by being told, they would make him a great and glorious king, whilst they used all possible skill to reduce him to extreme want and indigency; and that they would make him to be loved at home, and feared abroad, whilst they endeavoured, by all possible ways, to render him odious to his good subjects, and contemptible to all foreign princes; but, like round dealing men, told him, in plain English, that they had done him no wrong, because he was not capable of receiving any; and that they had taken nothing from him, because he had never any thing of his own to lose. If that doctrine were true, and that indeed he ought to be of no other consideration, than they had informed his people in that declaration, that gentleman was much more excusable, that said publicly, unrepented, that the happiness of the kingdom did not depend on his majesty, or upon any of the royal branches of that root: and the other, who said, his majesty was not worthy to be king of England: language very monstrous to be allowed by either house of parliament; and of which, by the help of God, and the law, he must have some examination. But, he doubted not, all his good subjects did now plainly discern, through the

"mask and vizard of their hypocrisy, what their design was; and would no more look upon the framers and contrivers of that declaration, as upon both houses of parliament, (whose freedom and just privileges he would always maintain; and in whose behalf, he was as much scandalized as for himself,) but as a faction of malignant, schismatical, and ambitious persons; whose design was, and always had been, to alter the whole frame of government, both of church and state; and to subject both king and people to their own lawless, arbitrary power and government: of whose persons, and of whose design, his majesty said, he would, within a very short time, give his good subjects, and the world, a full, and, he hoped, a satisfactory narration."

"The contrivers and penners of that declaration (of whom his majesty would be only understood to speak, when he mentioned any of their undutiful acts against him) said, that the great affairs of the kingdom, and the miserable bleeding condition of the kingdom of Ireland, would afford them little leisure to spend their time in declarations, answers, and replies. Indeed, his majesty said, the miserable and deplorable condition of both kingdoms would require somewhat else at their hands: but he would gladly know how they had spent their time since the recess, (then almost eight months,) but in declarations, remonstrances, and invectives against his majesty and his government; or in preparing matter for them. Had his majesty invited them to any such expense of time, by beginning arguments of that nature? Their leisure, or their inclination, was not as they pretended: and what was their printing and publishing their petitions to him; their declarations and remonstrances of him; their odious votes and resolutions, sometimes of one, sometimes of both houses, against his majesty, (never in that manner communicated before this parliament,) but an appeal to the people? And, in God's name, let them judge of the persons they had trusted."

"Their first quarrel was (as it was always, to let them into their frank expressions of his majesty, and his actions) against the malignant party; whom they were pleased still to call, and never to prove to be, his evil counsellors. But indeed nothing was more evident, by their whole proceedings, than that, by the malignant party, they intended all the members of both houses who agreed not with them in their opinion, (thence had come their distinction of good and bad lords; of persons ill affected of the house of commons; who had been proscribed, and their names listed, and read in tumults,) and all the persons of the kingdom who approve not of their actions. So that, if in truth they would be ingenuous, and name the persons they intended; who would be the men, upon whom the imputation of malignity would be cast, but they who had stood stoutly and immutably for the religion, the liberties, the laws, for all public interest; (so long as there was any to be stood for;) they, who had always been, and still were, as zealous professors, and some of them as able, and earnest defenders of the protestant doctrine against the church of Rome, as any were; who had often and earnestly besought his majesty to consent, that no indif“ferent and unnecessary ceremony might be pressed upon weak and tender consciences, and that he would agree to a bill for that purpose? They to whose wisdom, courage, and counsel, the kingdom owed as much as it could to subjects; and upon whose unblemished lives, envy itself could lay no imputation; nor endeavoured to lay any, until their virtues brought them to his majesty's knowledge and favour? His majesty said, if the contrivers of that declaration would be faithful to themselves, and consider all those persons of both houses, whom they, in their own consciences, knew to dissent from them in the matter and language of that declaration, and in all those undutiful actions, of which he complained, they would be found in honour, fortune, wisdom, reputation, and weight, if not in number, much superior to them. So much for the evil counsellors.

“Then what was the evil counsel itself? His majesty's coming from London (where he, and many, whose affections to him were very eminent, were in danger every day to be torn in pieces) to York; where his majesty, and all such as would put themselves under his protection, might live, he thanked God and the loyalty and affection of that good people, very securely: his not submitting himself absolutely (and renouncing his own understanding) to the votes and resolutions of the contrivers of that declaration, when they told his majesty, that they were above him; and might, by his own authority, do with his majesty what they pleased: and his not being contented, that all his good subjects' lives and fortunes should be disposed of by their votes; but by the known law of the land. This was the evil counsel given, and taken: and would not all men believe, there needed much power and skill of the malignant party, to infuse that counsel into him? And then, to apply the argument the contrivers of that declaration made for themselves, was it probable, or possible, that such men, whom his majesty had mentioned, (who must have so great a share in the misery,) should take such pains in the procuring thereof; and spend so much time, and run so many hazards, to make themselves slaves, and to ruin the freedom of this nation?

“His majesty said, (with a clear and upright conscience to God Almighty,) whosoever harboured the least thought in his breast, of ruining or violating the public liberty, or religion of the kingdom, or the just freedom and privilege of parliament, let him be accused; and he should be no counsellor of his, that would not say Amen. For the contrivers of that declaration, he had not said any thing, which might imply any inclination in them to be slaves. That which he had charged them, was with invading the public liberty; and his presumption might be very strong and vehement, that, though they had no mind to be slaves, they were not unwilling to be tyrants: what is tyranny, but to admit no rules to govern by, but their own wills? And they knew the misery of Athens was at the highest, when it suffered under the thirty tyrants.

“His majesty said, if that declaration had told him, (as indeed it might, and as in justice it ought to have done,) that the precedents of any of his ancestors did fall short, and much below what had been done by him, this parliament, in point

“of grace and favour to his people; he should not otherwise have wondered at it, than at such a truth, in such a place. But when, to justify their having done more than ever their predecessors did, it told his good subjects, (as most injuriously and insolently it did,) that the highest and most unwarrantable precedents of any of his predecessors did fall short, and much below what had been done to them this parliament by him, he must confess himself amazed, and not able to understand them; and he must tell those ungrateful men, (who durst tell their king, that they might, without want of modesty and duty, depose him,) that the condition of his subjects, when, by whatsoever accidents and conjunctures of time, it was at worst under his power, unto which, by no default of his, they should be ever again reduced, was, by many degrees, more pleasant and happy, than that to which their furious pretence of reformation had brought them. Neither was his majesty afraid of the highest precedents of other parliaments, which those men boldly (his good subjects would call it worse) told him they might, without want of modesty or duty, make their patterns. If he had no other security against those precedents, but their modesty and duty, he was in a miserable condition, as all persons would be who depended upon them.

“That declaration would not allow his inference, that, by avowing the act of sir John Hotham, they did destroy the title and interest of all his subjects to their lands and goods; but confessed, if they were found guilty of that charge, it were indeed a very great crime. And did they not, in that declaration, admit themselves guilty of that very crime? Did they not say, Who doubts but that a parliament may dispose of any thing, wherein his majesty, or his subjects, had a right, in such a way as that the kingdom might not be in danger thereby? Did they not then call themselves this parliament, and challenge that power without his consent? Did they not extend that power to all cases, where the necessity or common good of the kingdom was concerned? And did they not arrogate to themselves alone, the judgment of that danger, that necessity, and that common good of the kingdom? What was, if that were not, to unsettle the security of all men's estates; and to expose them to an arbitrary power of their own? If a faction should at any time by cunning, or force, or absence, or accident, prevail over a major part of both houses; and pretend that there were evil counsellors, a malignant party about the king; by whom the religion and liberty of the kingdom were both in danger, (this they might do, they had done it then,) they might take away, be it from the king, or people, whatsoever they in their judgments should think fit. This was lawful; they had declared it so: let the world judge, whether his majesty had charged them unjustly; and whether they were not guilty of the crime, which themselves confessed (being proved) was a great one; and how safely his majesty might commit the power, those people desired, into their hands; who, in all probability, would be no sooner possessed of it, than they would revive that tragedy, which Mr. Hooker related of the anabaptists in Germany; who, talking of nothing but faith, and of the true fear of God, and that riches and honour were vanity; at first, upon the great opinion of their humility, “zeal, and devotion, procured much reverence and estimation with the people; after, finding how many persons they had ensnared with their hypocrisy, they begun to propose to themselves to reform both the ecclesiastical and civil government of the state: then, because possibly they might meet with some opposition, they secretly entered into a league of association; and shortly after, finding the power they had gotten with the credulous people, enriched themselves with all kind of spoil and pillage; and justified themselves upon our Saviour's promise, The meek shall inherit the earth; and declared their title was the same which the righteous Israelites had to the goods of the wicked Egyptians: his majesty said, this story was worth the reading at large, and needed no application.

“But his majesty might by no means say, that he had the same title to his town of Hull, and the ammunition there, as any of his subjects had to their land or money: that was a principle, that pulled up the foundation of the liberty and property of every subject. Why? because the king's property in his towns, and in his goods bought with the public money, as they conceive his magazine at Hull to be, was inconsistent with the subjects' property in their lands, goods, and liberty. Did those men think, that as they assumed a power of declaring law, (and whatsoever contradicted that declaration broke their privileges,) so that they had a power of declaring sense and reason, and imposing logic and syllogisms on the schools, as well as law upon the people? Did not all mankind know that several men might have several rights and interests in the selfsame house and land, and yet neither destroy the other? Was not the interest of the lord paramount consistent with that of the mesne lord; and his with that of the tenant; and yet their properties or interests not at all confounded? And why might not his majesty then have a full, lawful interest and property in his town of Hull, and yet his subjects have a property in their houses too? But he could not sell, or give away, at his pleasure, this town and fort, as a private man might do his lands or goods. What then? Many men have no authority to let or set their leases, or sell their land; have they therefore no title to them, or interest in them? May they be taken from them, because they cannot sell them? He said, the purpose of his journey to Hull was neither to sell, or give it away.

“But for the magazine, the munition there, that he bought with his own money, he might surely have sold that, lent, or given it away. No; he bought it with the public money, and the proof is, they conceive it so; and, upon that conceit, had voted, that it should be taken from him. Excellent justice! Suppose his majesty had kept that money by him, and not bought arms with it, would they have taken it from him upon that conceit: nay, might they not, wheresoever that money was, (for through how many hands soever it hath passed, it is the public money still, if ever it were,) seize it, and take it from the owners? But the towns, forts, magazine, and kingdom, is intrusted to his majesty; and he is a person trusted. His majesty said, he was so; God, and the law, had trusted him; and he had taken an oath to discharge that trust, for the good and safety of the people. What oaths they had taken,

“he knew not, unless those, which, in that violence, they had manifestly, maliciously violated. Might any thing be taken from a man, because he is trusted with it? Nay, may the person himself take away the thing he trusts, when he will, and in what manner he will? The law had been otherwise, and, he believed, would be so held, notwithstanding their declarations.

“But that trust ought to be managed by their advice, and the kingdom had trusted them for that purpose. Impossible, that the same trust should be irrecoverably committed to his majesty, and his heirs for ever, and the same trust, and a power above that trust, (for so was the power they pretended,) be committed to others. Did not the people, that sent them, look upon them as a body but temporary, and dissoluble at his majesty's pleasure? And could it be believed, that they intended them for his guardians and controllers in the managing of that trust, which God, and the law, had granted to him, and to his posterity for ever? What the extent of the commission and trust was, nothing could better teach them than the writ, whereby they are met. His majesty said, he called them (and without that call they could not have come together) to be his counsellors, not commanders, (for, however they frequently confounded them, the offices were several,) and counsellors not in all things, but in some things, de quibusdam arduis, &c. And they would easily find among their precedents, that queen Elizabeth, upon whose time all good men looked with reverence, committed one Wentworth, a member of the house of commons, to the Tower, sitting the house, but for proposing that they might advise the queen in a matter she thought they had nothing to do to meddle in. But his majesty is trusted: and is he the only person trusted? And might they do what their own inclination and fury led them to? Were they not trusted by his majesty, when he first sent for them; and were they not trusted by him, when he passed them his promise, that he would not dissolve them? Could it be presumed, (and presumptions go far with them,) that he trusted them with a power to destroy himself, and to dissolve his government and authority? If the people might be allowed to make an equitable construction of the laws and statutes, a doctrine avowed by them, would not all his good subjects swear, he never intended by that act of continuance, that they should do what they have since done? Were they not trusted by those that sent them? And were they trusted to alter the government of church and state; and to make themselves perpetual dictators over the king and people? Did they intend, that the law itself should be subject to their votes; and that whatsoever they said, or did, should be lawful, because they declared it so? The oaths they had taken who sent them, and without taking which, themselves were not capable of their place in parliament, made the one incapable of giving, and the other of receiving such a trust; unless they could persuade his good subjects, that his majesty is the only supreme head and governor in all causes, and over all persons, within his dominions; and yet that they had a power over him to constrain him to manage his trust, and govern his power, according to their discretion.

"The contrivers of that declaration told his majesty, that they would never allow him (an humble and dutiful expression) to be judge of the law; that belonged only to them; they might, and must, judge and declare. His majesty said, they all knew what power the pope, under pretence of interpreting scriptures, and declaring articles of faith, though he decline the making the one or the other, had usurped over men's consciences; and that, under colour of having power of ordering all things for the good of men's souls, he entitles himself to all the kingdoms of the world: he would not accuse the framers of that declaration, (how bold soever they were with his majesty,) that they inclined to popery, of which another maxim was, that all men must submit their reason and understanding, and the scripture itself, to that declaring power of his: neither would he tell them, though they had told him so, that they use the very language of the rebels of Ireland: and yet they say those rebels declare, that whatsoever they do is for the good of the king and kingdom. But his good subjects would easily put the case to themselves, whether if the papists in Ireland in truth were, or, by art or accident, had made themselves the major part of both houses of parliament there; and had pretended the trust in that declaration from the kingdom of Ireland; thereupon had voted their religion and liberty to be in danger of extirpation from a malignant party of protestants and puritans; and therefore, that they would put themselves into a posture of defence; that the forts and the militia of that kingdom were to be put into the hands of such persons, as they could confide in; that his majesty was indeed trusted with the towns, forts, magazines, treasures, offices, and people of the kingdom, for the good, safety, and best advantage thereof; but as his trust is for the use of the kingdom, so it ought to be managed by the advice of both houses of parliament, whom the kingdom had trusted for that purpose, it being their duty to see it discharged according to the condition and true intent thereof, and by all possible means to prevent the contrary: his majesty said, let all his good subjects consider, if that rebellion had been plotted with all that formality, and those circumstances declared to be legal, at least, according to the equitable sense of the law, and to be for the public good, and justifiable by necessity, of which they were the only judges, whether, though they might have thought their design to be more cunning, they would believe it the more justifiable.

"Nay, let the framers of that declaration ask themselves, if the evil counsellors, the malignant party, the persons ill affected, the popish lords, and their adherents, should prove now, or hereafter, to be a major part of both houses, (for it had been declared, that a great part of both houses had been such, and so might have been the greater; nay, the greater part of the house of peers was still declared to be such, and his majesty had not heard of any of their conversion; and thereupon it had been earnestly pressed, that the major part of the lords might join with the major part of the house of commons,) would his majesty be bound to consent to all such alterations, as those men should propose to him, and resolve to be for the public good: and should

"the liberty, property, and security of all his subjects, depend on what such votes should declare to be law? Was the order of the militia unfit, and unlawful, whilst the major part of the lords refused to join in it, (as they had done two or three several times, and it was never heard, before this parliament, that they should be so, and so often pressed after a dissent declared,) and did it grow immediately necessary for the public safety, and lawful by the law of the land, as soon as so many of the dissenting peers were driven away, (after their names had been required at the bar, contrary to the freedom and foundation of parliament,) that the other opinion prevailed? Did the life and liberty of the subject depend upon such accidents of days, and hours, that it was impossible for him to know his right in either? God forbid.

"But now, to justify their invasion of his majesty's ancient, unquestioned, undoubted right, settled and established on his majesty and his posterity by God himself; confirmed and strengthened by all possible titles of compact, laws, oaths, perpetual and uncontradicted custom, by his people; what had they alleged to declare to the kingdom, as they say, the obligation that lieth upon the kings of this realm to pass all such bills, as are offered unto them by both houses of parliament? A thing never heard of till that day: an oath, (authority enough for them to break all theirs,) that is, or ought to be, taken by the kings of this realm, which is as well to remedy by law such inconveniences the king may suffer, as to keep and protect the laws already in being: and the form of this oath, they said, did appear upon a record there cited; and by a clause in the preamble of a statute, made in the 25th year of Edw. III.

"His majesty said, he was not enough acquainted with records to know whether that were fully and ingenuously cited; and when, and how, and why, the several clauses had been inserted, or taken out of the oaths formerly administered to the kings of this realm: yet he could not possibly imagine the assertion that declaration made, could be deduced from the words or the matter of that oath: for unless they had a power of declaring Latin, as well as law, sure, elegerit, signified hath chosen, as well as will choose; and that it signified so there, (besides the authority of the perpetual practice of all succeeding ages; a better interpreter than their votes,) it was evident, by the reference it had to customs, consuetudines quas vulgus elegerit: and could that be a custom, which the people should choose after this oath taken? And should a king be sworn to defend such customs? Besides, could it be imagined, that he should be bound by oath to pass such laws, (and such a law was the bill they brought to him of the militia,) as should put the power, wherewith he was trusted, out of himself, into the hands of other men; and divert and disable himself of all possible power to perform the great business of the oath; which was to protect them? If his majesty gave away all his power, or if it were taken from him, he could not protect any man: and what discharge would it be for his majesty, either before God or man, when his good subjects, whom God, and the law, had committed to his charge, should be worried and spoiled, to say that he trusted others to pro"tect them? That is, to do that duty for him, which was essentially and inseparably his own. But that all his good subjects might see how faithfully these men, who assumed this trust from them, desired to discharge their trust; he would be contented to publish, for their satisfaction, (a matter notorious enough, but what he himself never thought to have been put to publish, and of which the framers of that declaration might as well have made use, as of a Latin record they knew many of his good subjects could not, and many of themselves did not understand,) the oath itself he took at his coronation, warranted and enjoined to it by the customs and directions of his predecessors; and the ceremony of theirs, and his taking it; they might find it in the records of the exchequer; this it is:

The sermon being done, the archbishop goeth to the king, and asks his willingness to take the oath usually taken by his predecessors:

The king sheweth himself willing, ariseth and goeth to the altar; the archbishop administereth these questions, and the king answers them severally:

Episcopus. Sir, will you grant and keep, and by your oath confirm to the people of England, the laws and customs to them granted by the kings of England, your lawful and religious predecessors: and namely the laws, customs, and franchises granted to the clergy, by the glorious king saint Edward, your predecessor, according to the laws of God, the true profession of the gospel established in this kingdom, and agreeable to the prerogative of the kings thereof, and the ancient customs of this realm?

Rez. I grant, and promise to keep them.

Episo. Sir, will you keep peace, and godly agreement entirely, (according to your power,) both to God, the holy church, the clergy, and the people?

Rez. I will keep it.

Episc. Sir, will you, (to your power,) cause law, justice, and discretion, in mercy and truth, to be executed in all your judgments?

Rez. I will.

Episc. Sir, will you grant to hold, and keep the laws, and rightful customs, which the commonalty of this your kingdom have; and will you defend and uphold them to the honour of God, so much as in you lieth?

Rez. I grant, and promise so to do.

Then one of the bishops reads this admonition to the king, before the people, with a loud voice.

Our lord and king, we beseech you to pardon, and to grant, and to preserve unto us, and to the churches committed to our charge, all canonical privileges, and due law, and justice; and that you would protect and defend us, as every good king, in his kingdom, ought to be protector and defender of the bishops, and the churches under their government.

The king answereth:

With a willing and devout heart I promise, and grant my pardon; and that I will preserve and maintain to you, and the churches committed to your charge, all canonical privileges, and due law, and justice; and that I will be your protector and defender, to my power, by the assistance of God, as every good king, in his kingdom, in right ought to protect and defend the bishops, and churches under their government.

Then the king ariseth, and is led to the communion table: where he makes a solemn oath, in sight of all the people, to observe the premises; and, laying his hand upon the book, saith:

THE OATH.

The things which I have before promised, I shall perform, and keep: so help me God, and the contents of this book.

His majesty said, "all the world might judge, whether such doctrine, or such conclusions, as those men brought, could follow, or have the least pretence, from that oath: for the preamble of the statute they cited, that told his majesty, that the king was bound to remedy, by law, the mischiefs and damages which happen to his people: his majesty said, he was so; but asked, whether the king were bound, by the preamble of that statute, to renounce his own judgment, his own understanding in those mischiefs, and of these remedies? How far forth he was obliged to follow the judgment of his parliament, that declaration still confessed to be a question. Without question, he said, none could take upon them to remedy even mischiefs, but by law, for fear of greater mischiefs than those they go about to remedy.

"But his majesty was bound in justice to consent to their proposals, because there was a trust reposed in his majesty to preserve the kingdom, by making new laws: he said, he was glad there was so; then he was sure no new law could be made without his consent; and that the gentleness of his answer, Le roy s'aviserà, if it be no denial, it is no consent; and then the matter was not great. They would yet allow his majesty a greater latitude of granting, or denying, as he should think fit, in public acts of grace, as pardons, or the like grants of favour: why did they so? If those pardons, and public acts of grace, were for the public good, (which they might vote them to be,) they would then be absolutely in their own disposal; but had they left that power to his majesty? They had sure, at least, shared it with him; how else had they got the power to pardon sergeant-major-general Skippon, (a new officer of state, and a subject his majesty had no authority to send to speak with,) and all other persons employed by them, and such as had employed themselves for them, not only for what they had done, but for what they should do? If they had power to declare such actions to be no treason, which his majesty would not pardon; such actions to be treason, which need no pardon; the latitude they allowed his majesty of granting, or denying of pardons, was a jewel they might still be content to suffer his majesty to wear in his crown, and never think themselves the more in danger.

"All this considered, the contriver of that message, (since they would afford his majesty no better title,) whom they were angry with, did not conceive the people of this land to be so void of common sense, as to believe his majesty, who had denied no one thing for the ease and benefit of them, which in justice or prudence could be asked, or in honour and conscience could be granted, to have cast off all care of the subject's good; and the framers and devisers of that declaration (who had endeavoured to render his majesty odious to his subjects, and them disloyal to him, from pretending such a trust in them) to have only taken it up: neither, he was confident, would they be satisfied, when they felt the misery and the burdens, which the fury and the malice of those people would bring upon them, with being told that calamity proceeded from evil counsellors, whom nobody could name; from plots and conspiracies, which no man could discover; and from fears and jealousies, which no man understood: and therefore, that the consideration of it should be left to the conscience, reason, affection, and loyalty of his good subjects, who do understand the government of this kingdom, his majesty said, he was well content.

"His majesty asked, where the folly and madness of those people would end, who would have his people believe, that his absenting himself from London, where, with his safety, he could not stay, and the continuing his magazine at Hull, proceeded from the secret plots of the papists here, and to advance the design of the papists in Ireland? But it was no wonder that they, who could believe sir John Hotham's shutting his majesty out of Hull, to be an act of affection and loyalty, would believe that the papists, or the Turk, persuaded him to go thither.

"And could any sober man think that declaration to be the consent of either, or both houses of parliament, unawed either by fraud or force; which (after so many thanks, and humble acknowledgments of his gracious favour in his message of the twentieth of January, so often, and so unanimously presented to his majesty from both houses of parliament) now told him, that the message at first was, and, as often as it had been since mentioned by him, had been a breach of privilege, (of which they had not used to have been so negligent, as in four months not to have complained, if such a breach had been,) and that their own method of proceeding should not be proposed to them: as if his majesty had only authority to call them together, not to tell them what they were to do, not so much as with reference to his own affairs. What their own method had been, and whither it had led them, and brought the kingdom, all men see; what his would have been, if seasonably and timely applied unto, all men might judge; his majesty would speak no more of it.

"But see now what excellent instances they had found out, to prove an inclination, if not in his majesty, in some about him, to civil war: their going with his majesty to the house of commons, (so often urged, and so fully answered,) their attending on him to Hampton-court, and appearing in a warlike manner at Kingston upon Thames; his going to Hull; their drawing their swords at York, demanding, who would be for the king? the declaring sir John Hotham traitor, before the message sent to the parliament; the propositions to the gentry in Yorkshire, to assist his majesty against sir John Hotham, before he had received an answer from the parliament: all desperate instances of an inclination to a civil war. Examine them again: the manner and intent of his going to the house of commons, he had set forth at large, in his answer to their declaration of the nineteenth of May; all men might judge of it. Next, did they themselves believe, to what purpose soever that rumour had served their turn, that there was an appearance in warlike manner at Kingston upon Thames? Did they not know, that whosoever his majesty had been at Hampton-court, since his first coming to the crown, there was never a less appearance, or in a less warlike manner, than at the time they meant? He said, he would say no more, but that his appearance in a warlike manner at Kingston upon Thames, and theirs at Kingston upon Hull, was very different. What was meant by the drawing of swords at York, and demanding, who would be for the king, must be inquired at London; for, his majesty believed, very few in York understood the meaning of it. For his going to Hull, which they would by no means endure should be called a visit, whether it were not the way to prevent, rather than to make a civil war, was very obvious: and the declaring him a traitor in the very act of his treason, would never be thought unseasonable, but by those who believed him to be a loving and loyal subject; no more than the endeavouring to make the gentlemen of that county sensible of that treason, (which they were in an honourable and dutiful degree,) before he received the answer from both houses of parliament: for, if they had been, as his majesty expected they should have been, sensible of that intolerable injury offered to him, might he not have had occasion to have used the affection of these gentlemen? Was he sure that sir John Hotham, who had kept him out without their order, (he spake of a public order,) would have let him in, when they had forbidden him? And if they had not such a sense of him, (as the case falls out to be,) had he not more reason to make propositions to those gentlemen, whose readiness and affection he, or his posterity, would never forget?

"But this business of Hull sticks still with them; and finding his questions hard, they are pleased to answer his majesty, by asking other questions of him: no matter for the exceptions against the earl of Newcastle, (which have been so often urged, as one of the principal grounds of their fears and jealousies; and which drew that question from him,) they asked his majesty, why, when he held it necessary that a governor should be placed in Hull, sir John Hotham should be refused by him, and the earl of Newcastle sent down? His majesty answered, because he had a better opinion of the earl of Newcastle than of sir John Hotham; and desired to have such a governor over his towns, if he must have any, as should keep them for, and not against him: and if his going down were in a more private way than sir John Hotham's, it was because he had not that authority to make a noise, by levying and billeting of soldiers, in a

"peaceable time, upon his good subjects, as it seemed sir John Hotham carried down with him. And the imputation which is cast by the way upon that earl, to make his reputation not so unblemished, as he conceived, and the world believes it to be; and which, though it was not ground enough for judicial proceeding, (it is wonder it was not,) was yet ground enough of suspicion, must be the case of every subject in England, (and he wished it went no higher,) if every vile aspersion, contrived by unknown hands, upon unknown or unimaginable grounds, which is the way practised to bring any virtuous and deserving men into obloquy, should receive the least credit or countenance in the world.

"They tell him, their exception to those gentlemen, who delivered their petition to him at York, was, that they presumed to take the style upon them of all the gentry and inhabitants of that county; whereas, they say, so many more of as good quality as themselves, of that county, were of another opinion; and have since, by their petition to his majesty, disavowed that act. Their information in that point, his majesty said, was no better than it useth to be; and they would find, that neither the number or the quality of those who have, or will disavow that petition, was as they imagine; though too many weak persons were misled (which they did, and would every day more and more understand) by the faction, skill, and industry of that true malignant party, of which he did, and had reason to complain. They said, they had received no petition of so strange a nature: what nature? Contrary to the votes of both houses: that is, they had received no petition they had no mind to receive. But his majesty had told them again, and all his good subjects would tell them, that they had received petitions, with joy and approbation, against the votes of both houses of their predecessors, confirmed and established into laws by the consent of his majesty, and his ancestors; and allowed those petitions to carry the style, and to seem to carry the desires of cities, towns, and counties, when, of either city, town, or county, very few known or considerable persons had been privy to such petitions: whereas, in truth, the petitions delivered to his majesty, against which they except, carried not the style of all, but some of the gentry and inhabitants; and implied no other consent, than such as went visibly along with it.

"But his majesty was all this while in a mistake; the magazine at Hull was not taken from him. Who told them so? They who assure them, (and whom without breaking their privileges they must believe,) that sir John Hotham's shutting the gates against his majesty, and resisting his entrance with armed men, (though he thought it in defiance of him,) was indeed in obedience to him, and his authority; and for his service, and the service of the kingdom. He was to let none in, but such as came with his majesty's authority, signified by both houses of parliament: himself and they had ordered it so. And therefore he kept his majesty out, only till his majesty, or he himself, might send for their directions. His majesty said, he knew not whether the contrivers of that declaration meant, that his good subjects should so soon understand, though it was plain enough to be understood, the meaning of the king's authority, signified by both houses of parliament: but sure the world would now easily discern in what miserable case he had, by this time, been, (it is bad enough as it is,) if he had consented to their bill, or to their ordinance of the militia, and given those men power to have raised all the arms of the kingdom against him, for the common good, by his own authority: would they not, as they had kept him from Hull, by this time have beaten him from York, and pursued him out of the kingdom, in his own behalf? Nay, might not this munition, which is not taken from him, be employed against him; not against his authority, signified by both houses of parliament, but only to kill those ill counsellors, the malignant party, which is about him, and yet for his good, for the public good, (they would declare it so,) and so no treason within the statute of 25 Ed. III.? which, "by their interpretation, had left his majesty, the king of England, absolutely less provided for, in point of safety, than the meanest subject of the kingdom: and every subject of this land (for whose security that law was made, that they may know their duty, and their danger in breaking of it) may be made a traitor when these men please to say, he is so. But did they think that, upon such an interpretation, (upon pretence of authority of book cases and precedents, which, without doubt, they would have cited, if they had been to their purpose,) out of which nothing can result, but confusion to king and people, would find any credit with his good subjects? And that so excellent a law, made both for security of king and people, shall be so eluded, by an interpretation no learned lawyer in England would at this hour, he believed, set under his hand, notwithstanding the authority of that declaration; which, he hoped, shall bring nothing but infamy upon the contrivers of it?

"Now to their privileges: though it be true, they say, that their privileges do not extend to treason, felony, or breach of the peace, so as to exempt the members from all manner of process and trial; yet it doth privilege them in the way or method of their trial: the cause must be first brought before them, and their consent asked, before you can proceed. Why then their privileges extend as far in these cases, as in any that are most unquestioned; for no privilege whatsoever exempts them from all manner of process and trial, if you first acquaint the house with it, and they give you leave to proceed by those processes, or to that trial: but, by this rule, if a member of either house commit a murder, you must by no means meddle with him, till you have acquainted that house of which he is a member, and received their direction for your proceeding, assuring yourself, he will not stir from that place where you left him, till you return with their consent; should it be otherwise, it would be in the power of every man, under the pretence of murder, to take one after another, and as many as he pleaseth; and so, consequently, bring a parliament to what he pleaseth, when he pleaseth. If a member of either house shall take a purse at York, (he may as probably take a purse from a subject, as arms against the king,) you must ride to London, to know what to do, and he may ride with you, and take a new

"purse every stage, and must not be apprehended, or declared a felon, till you have asked that house, of which he is a member; should it be otherwise, it might be in every man's power to accuse as many members as he would of taking purses; and so bring a parliament, and so all parliaments, to nothing. Would these men be believed? And yet they make no doubt but every one, who hath taken the protestation, would defend this doctrine with his life and fortune. Would not his subjects believe, that they had imposed a pretty protestation upon them; and that they had a very good end in the doing of it, if it obligeth them to such hazards, to such undertakings? Must they forget or neglect his majesty's person, honour, and estate, which, by that protestation, they are bound to defend; and, in some degree, do understand? And must they only venture their lives and fortunes to justify privileges they know not, or ever heard of before? Or are they bound by that protestation to believe, that the framers of that declaration have power to extend their own privileges, as far as they think fit; and to contract his majesty's rights, as much as they please; and that they are bound to believe them in either, and to venture their lives and fortunes in that quarrel?

"From declaring how mean a person his majesty is, and how much the kingdom hath been mistaken in the understanding of the statute of the 25 E. III. concerning treason, and that all men need not fear levying war against him, so they have their order to warrant them; they proceed, in the spirit of declaring, to certify his subjects in the mistakings, which, near one hundred and fifty years, have been received concerning the statute of the eleventh year of Hen. VII. ch. 1. (a statute all good subjects will read with comfort,) and tell them, that the serving of the king for the time being cannot be meant of Perkin Warbeck, or of any that should call himself king; but such a one as is allowed and received by the parliament in the behalf of the kingdom: and was not his majesty so allowed? However, through a dark mist of words, and urging their old privileges, (which, he hoped, he had sufficiently answered, and will be every day more confuted by the actions of his good subjects,) they conclude, that those that shall guide themselves by the judgment of parliament, which they say is their own, ought, whatsoever happen, to be secure, and free from all account and penalties, upon the ground and equity of that very statute: how far their own chancellors may help them in that equity, his majesty knew not; but by the help of God, and that good law, he would allow no such equity: so then, here is the doctrine of that declaration; and these are the positions of the contrivers of it.

1. That they have an absolute power of declaring the law; and that whatsoever they declare to be so, ought not to be questioned by his majesty, or any subject: so that all right and safety of him and his people must depend upon their pleasure.

2. That no precedents can be limits to bound their proceedings: so they may do what they please.

3. That a parliament may dispose of any thing, wherein the king or subject hath a right, for the public good; that they, without the king, are this parliament, and judge of this public good; and that his majesty's consent is not necessary: so the life and liberty of the subject, and all the good laws made for the security of them, may be disposed of, and repealed by the major part of both houses at any time present, and by any ways and means procured so to be; and his majesty had no power to protect them.

4. That no member of either house ought to be troubled or meddled with for treason, felony, or any other crime, without the cause first brought before them, that they may judge of the fact, and their leave obtained to proceed.

5. That the sovereign power resides in both houses of parliament; and that his majesty had no negative voice: so then his majesty himself must be subject to their commands.

6. That the levying of forces against the personal commands of the king, (though accompanied with his presence,) is not levying war against the king; but the levying war against his laws and authority, (which they have power to declare, and signify,) though not against his person, is levying war against the king: and that treason cannot be committed against his person, otherwise than as he is intrusted with the kingdom, and discharging that trust; and that they have a power to judge, whether he discharges this trust or no.

7. That if they should make the highest precedents of other parliaments their patterns, there would be no cause to complain of want of modesty or duty in them; that is, they may depose his majesty when they will, and are not to be blamed for so doing.

"And now, as if the mere publishing of their resolutions would not only prevail with the people, but, in the instant, destroy all spirit and courage in his majesty to preserve his own right and honour,) they had since taken the boldness to assault him with certain propositions; which they call the most necessary effectual means for the removing those jealousies and differences between his majesty and his people; that is, that he would be content to divest himself of all his regal rights and dignities; be content with the title of a king, and suffer them, according to their discretion, to govern him and the kingdom, and to dispose of his children. How suitable and agreeable this doctrine and these demands were to the affection of his loving subjects, under whose trust these men pretend to say and do these monstrous things; and to design not only the ruin of his person, but of monarchy itself, (which, he might justly say, was more than ever was offered in any of his predecessors' times; for though the person of the king hath been sometimes unjustly deposed, yet the regal power was never, before this time, struck at,) he believes his good subjects would find some way to let them and the world know: and, from this time, such who had been misled, by their ill counsels, to have any hand in the execution of the militia, would see to what ends their service was designed; and therefore, if they should presume hereafter to meddle in it, they must expect, that he would immediately proceed against them as actual raisers of sedition, and as enemies to his sovereign power.

"His majesty said, he had done: and should now expect the worst actions these men had power to commit against him; worse words they could "not give him: and he doubted not, but the major part of both houses of parliament, when they might come together with their honour and safety, (as well those who were surprised at the passing of it, and understood not the malice in it, and the confusion that must grow by it, if believed; as those who were absent, or involved,) would so far resent the indignity offered to his majesty, the dishonour to themselves, and the mischief to the whole kingdom, by that declaration; that they would speedily make the foul contrivers of it instances of their exemplary justice; and brand them, and their doctrine, with the marks of their perpetual scorn and indignation."

Whilst this answer and declaration of his majesty was preparing and publishing, which was done with all imaginable haste, and to which they made no reply till many months after the war was begun, they proceeded in all their counsels towards the lessening his majesty, both in reputation and power; and towards the improving their own interests: for the first, upon the advantage of their former vote, of the king's intention to levy war against his parliament, in the end of May they published orders, "That the sheriffs of the adjacent counties should hinder, and make stay of all arms and ammunition carrying towards York, until they had given notice thereof unto the lords and commons; and should have received their further direction; and that they should prevent the coming together of any soldiers, horse or foot, by any warrant of his majesty, without their advice or consent:" which they did, not upon any opinion that there would be any arms or ammunition carrying to his majesty, they having entirely possessed themselves of all his stores; or that they indeed believed, there was any commission or warrant to raise soldiers, which they well knew there was not; but that, by this means, their agents in the country (which many sheriffs and justices of peace were; and most constables, and inferior officers) might, upon this pretence, hinder the resorting to his majesty, which they did with that industry, that few, who, foreseeing the design of those orders, did not decline the great roads, and made not pretences of travelling to some other place, [and] travelled in any equipage towards his majesty, escaped without being stayed by such watches: and most that were so stayed, finding it no boot to attend the resolution or justice of the houses, who always commended the vigilance of their ministers, and did not expect they should be bound up by the letter of their orders, made shift to escape with their own persons, and were contented to leave their horses behind them; they who attended to be repaired by the justice of the houses, finding so many delays, and those delays to be so chargeable, and themselves exposed to so many questions, and such an inquisition, that they thought their liberty a great prize, whatever they left behind them.

For the improving their interest and dependence, though they had as much evidence of the affections of the city as could reasonably be expected; and, by their exercise of the militia, had united them in a firm bond, the communication of guilt; yet they well understood their true strength consisted in the rabble of the people; for the greatest part of the substantial and wealthy citizens, being not of their party, and except some expedient were found out, whereby they might be involved, and concerned in their prosperity or ruin, they thought themselves not so much in truth possessed of that city, as they seemed to be. They had heard it said, that Edward IV. of England recovered the city of London, and by that the kingdom, by the vast debts that he owed there; men looking upon the helping of him to the crown, as the helping themselves to their money, which was else desperate. Upon this ground, they had taken the first opportunity of borrowing great sums of them, in the beginning of this parliament; when the richest and best affected men, upon a presumption that hereby the Scots' army would suddenly march into their own country, and the English as soon be disbanded, cheerfully furnished that money. Upon this ground they still forbore to repay those sums, disposing what was brought in upon the bills of subsidy, and other public bills, to other purposes. And now, to make themselves more sure of them, they borrowed another sum of 100,000*l.* of them, upon pretence of the great exigences of Ireland; which was their twoedged sword, to lead them into the liberty of laying what imputations they thought most convenient for their purposes, upon the king and queen; and to draw what money they thought fit from the city; and served them now to another important end, to raise soldiers; but that service itself, in order to suppressing the rebellion there, was not, in any degree, advanced. Having, by these means, thus provided for their main ends, they made the people believe they were preparing propositions to send to the king; and the people were yet so innocent as to believe, that they would never send propositions that were not reasonable: for though the unusual acts which had been done by the king, as the going to the house of commons, and demanding the members there, had put them into as unusual apprehensions; and those, by the warmth and heat of declarations and answers, had drawn from them, by degrees, another kind of language, than had before been used; yet most men believed, when those passions were digested, and that any propositions should be made by them, (which the king had long called for and invited,) that they could not but be such, as would open a door for that affection, confidence, duty, and trust, upon which the peace of the kingdom might be reasonably founded. And propositions they did send to the king, in the beginning of June; which were presented to his majesty, with great solemnity, by their committee resident there; which, in this place, are very necessary to be inserted in the very terms in which they were presented, as followeth:

The humble petition and advice of both houses of parliament, with nineteen propositions and the conclusion, sent unto his majesty the second of June, 1642.

"Your majesty's most humble and faithful subjects, the lords and commons in parliament, having nothing in their thoughts and desires, more precious and of higher esteem, next to the honour and immediate service of God, than the just and faithful performance of their duty to your majesty and this kingdom: and being very sensible of the great distractions and distempers, and of the imminent dangers and calamities, which those distractions and distempers are like "to bring upon your majesty, and your subjects ;

 " (all which have proceeded from the subtle in-
 " formations, mischievous practices, and evil coun" sels of men disaffected to God's true religion ;
 " your majesty's honour and safety ; and the pub" lic peace, and prosperity of your people ;) after
 " a serious observation of the causes of those mis-
 " chiefs, do, in all humility and sincerity, present
 " to your majesty their most dutiful petition and " advice : that, out of your princely wisdom for the " establishing your own honour and safety, and " gracious tenderness of the welfare and security " of your subjects and dominions, you will be " pleased to grant and accept these their humble
 " desires and propositions, as the most necessary
 " and effectual means, through God's blessing, of " removing those jealousies and differences, which " have unhappily fallen betwixt you and your " people, and procuring both your majesty and
 " them a constant course of honour, peace, and " happiness.

The propositions.

1. " That the lords and others of your majesty's " privy-council, and such great officers and " ministers of state, either at home or beyond
 " the seas, may be put from your privy-coun" cil, and from those offices and employments,
 " excepting such as shall be approved by both " houses of parliament : and that the persons,
 " put into the places and employments of those " that are removed, may be approved of by " both houses of parliament : and that privy-
 " counsellors shall take an oath, for the due " execution of their places, in such form as " shall be agreed upon by both houses of par" liament.
2. " That the great affairs of the kingdom may not " be concluded, or transacted, by the advice of " private men, or by any unknown, or unsworn
 " counsellors ; but that such matters as con" cern the public, and are proper for the high " court of parliament, which is your majesty's
 " great and supreme council, may be debated,
 " resolved, and transacted only in parliament,
 " and not elsewhere : and such as shall pre" sume to do any thing to the contrary shall be " reserved to the censure and judgment of par" liament : and such other matters of state, as
 " are proper for your majesty's privy-council,
 " shall be debated and concluded by such
 " of the nobility, and others, as shall, from " time to time, be chosen for that place, by
 " approbation of both houses of parliament :
 " and that no public act concerning the affairs " of the kingdom, which are proper for your
 " privy-council, may be esteemed of any valid" ity, as proceeding from the royal authority,
 " unless it be done by the advice and consent " of the major part of the council, attested
 " under their hands : and that your council
 " may be limited to a certain number, not ex" ceeding twenty-five, nor under fifteen : and " if any counsellor's place happen to be void in
 " the interval of parliament, it shall not be sup" plied without the assent of the major part of " the council ; which choice shall be confirmed
 " at the next sitting of parliament, or else to " be void.
3. " That the lord high steward of England, lord
 " high constable, lord chancellor, or lord keeper
 " of the great seal, lord treasurer, lord privy

" seal, earl marshal, lord admiral, warden of " the cinque ports, chief governor of Ireland,
 " chancellor of the exchequer, master of the " wards, secretaries of state, two chief justices
 " and chief baron, may always be chosen with
 " the approbation of both houses of parliament ;
 " and, in the intervals of parliaments, by assent
 " of the major part of the council, in such " manner as is before expressed in the choice
 " of counsellors.

4. " That he, or they, unto whom the government " and education of the king's children shall be " committed, shall be approved of by both " houses of parliament ; and, in the intervals
 " of parliaments, by the assent of the major " part of the council, in such manner as is
 " before expressed in the choice of counsellors ;
 " and that all such servants as are now about " them, against whom both houses shall have " any just exceptions, shall be removed.
5. " That no marriage shall be concluded, or " treated, for any of the king's children, with " any foreign prince, or other person whatso" ever, abroad or at home, without the consent
 " of parliament, under the penalty of a præmu-
 " nire, unto such as shall conclude or treat
 " any marriage as aforesaid : and that the said
 " penalty shall not be pardoned, or dispensed " with, but by the consent of both houses of " parliament.
6. " That the laws in force against Jesuits, priests,
 " and popish recusants, be strictly put in exe" cution, without any toleration, or dispensa" tion to the contrary : and that some more
 " effectual course may be enacted, by authority
 " of parliament, to disable them from making " any disturbance in the state ; or eluding the " laws by trusts, or otherwise.
7. " That the votes of popish lords in the house of " peers may be taken away, so long as they " continue papists : and that your majesty will " consent to such a bill, as shall be drawn, for " the education of the children of papists, by " protestants, in the protestant religion.
8. " That your majesty will be pleased to consent, " that such a reformation be made of the " church-government and liturgy, as both " houses of parliament shall advise ; wherein
 " they intend to have consultations with di-
 " vines, as is expressed in their declaration
 " to that purpose : and that your majesty will " contribute your best assistance to them, for " the raising of a sufficient maintenance for
 " preaching ministers through the kingdom :
 " and that your majesty will be pleased to give " your consent to laws for the taking away of " innovations, and superstition, and of plurali-
 " ties, and against scandalous ministers.
9. " That your majesty will be pleased to rest " satisfied with that course, that the lords and " commons have appointed, for ordering of the " militia, until the same shall be further settled
 " by a bill : and that your majesty will recall
 " your declarations and proclamations against " the ordinance made by the lords and com" mons concerning it.
10. " That such members of either house of parlia" ment, as have, during this present parliament,
 " been put out of any place and office, may " either be restored to that place and office, or " otherwise have satisfaction for the same, upon

- "the petition of that house, whereof he or they are members.
11. "That all privy-counsellors and judges may take an oath, the form whereof to be agreed on and settled by act of parliament, for the maintaining of the Petition of Right, and of certain statutes made by this parliament, which shall be mentioned by both houses of parliament; and that an inquiry of all breaches and violations of those laws may be given in charge by the justices of the king's bench every term, and by the judges of assize at their circuits, and justices of the peace at the sessions, to be presented and punished according to law.
  12. "That all the judges, and all the officers, placed by approbation of both houses of parliament, may hold their places quamdiu bene se gesserint.
  13. "That the justice of parliament may pass upon all delinquents, whether they be within the kingdom, or fled out of it: and that all persons cited by either house of parliament may appear, and abide the censure of parliament.
  14. "That the general pardon, offered by your majesty, may be granted with such exceptions, as shall be advised by both houses of parliament.
  15. "That the forts and castles of this kingdom may be put under the command and custody of such persons, as your majesty shall appoint, with the approbation of your parliament; and, in the intervals of parliament, with approbation of the major part of the council, in such manner as is before expressed in the choice of counsellors.
  16. "That the extraordinary guards, and military forces now attending your majesty, may be removed and discharged: and that, for the future, you will raise no such guards or extraordinary forces, but, according to the law, in case of actual rebellion, or invasion.
  17. "That your majesty will be pleased to enter into a more strict alliance with the states of the United Provinces, and other neighbour princes and states of the protestant religion, for the defence and maintenance thereof, against all designs and attempts of the pope, and his adherents, to subvert and suppress it; whereby your majesty will obtain great access of strength and reputation, and your subjects be much encouraged and enabled, in a parliamentary way, for your aid, and assistance, in restoring your royal sister, and her princely issue, to those dignities and dominions, which belong unto them; and relieving the other distressed protestant princes, who have suffered in the same cause.
  18. "That your majesty will be pleased by act of parliament to clear the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the house of commons, in such manner that future parliaments may be secured from the consequence of that evil precedent.
  19. "That your majesty will be graciously pleased to pass a bill for restraining peers made hereafter, from sitting or voting in parliament, unless they be admitted thereunto with the consent of both houses of parliament.

"And these our humble desires being granted

"by your majesty, we shall forthwith apply ourselves to regulate your present revenue, in such sort as may be for your best advantage; and likewise to settle such an ordinary and constant increase of it, as shall be sufficient to support your royal dignity in honour, and plenty, beyond the proportion of any former grants of the subjects of this kingdom to your majesty's royal predecessors: we shall likewise put the town of Hull into such hands, as your majesty shall appoint with the consent and approbation of parliament; and deliver up a just account of all the magazine; and cheerfully employ the uttermost of our power and endeavours, in the real expression, and performance of our most dutiful and loyal affections, to the preserving and maintaining the royal honour, greatness, and safety of your majesty, and your posterity."

The same day that these articles of deposition were passed the houses, that his majesty might see how unable he was like to be to contend with them, they declared by an order the same day, printed, and carefully dispersed, "that they had received information," (and indeed their informations were wonderful particular, from all parts beyond sea, of whatsoever was agitated on the king's behalf; as well as from his court, of whatsoever was designed, or almost but thought of to himself: besides they could pretend to receive information of whatsoever would any way conduce to their purpose, true or false,) "that the jewels of the crown (which, they said, by the law of the land ought not to be aliened) were either pawned or sold in Amsterdam, or some other parts beyond the seas; and thereby great sums of money provided to be returned to York, or to some of his majesty's servants or agents, for his majesty's use: and because, they said, it was more than probable, that great provision of monies, in such an extraordinary way, was to maintain the intended war against the parliament, and thereby to bring the whole kingdom into utter ruin, and combustion; it was therefore declared, by the lords and commons in parliament, that whosoever had been, or should be, an actor in the selling or pawning of any jewels of the crown; or had, or should pay, lend, send, or bring any money in specie into this kingdom, for or upon any of those jewels; or whosoever had, or should accept of any bill from beyond the seas for the payment of any sum of money, for or upon any of those jewels, and should pay any sum according to such bill, after notice of that order, without acquainting that house with the receipt of that bill, before he accept the same; or if he had already accepted any such bill, then with the acceptance thereof, before the payment of the money, every such person should be held and accounted a promoter of that intended war, an enemy to the state, and ought to give satisfaction for the public damage out of his own estate."

Upon this confident assumption, "that it was not in the king's power to dispose the jewels of the crown; that whatsoever jewels were offered to be pawned or sold, by any of the king's ministers beyond the seas, were the jewels of the crown, and no other; and that all money, returned from thence for his majesty's service, was money so raised and procured;" they so much terrified men of all conditions, that the queen, having, by the sale of some of her own jewels, and by her other dexterity, procured some money for the king's supply, she could not, in a long time, find any means to transmit it. However, this made no impression upon the king's resolutions; and though it might have some influence upon merchantly men, yet it stirred up most generous minds to an indignation on the king's behalf; and was new evidence, if there had wanted any, what kind of greatness he was to expect from complying with such immodest and extravagant proposers.

The king was once resolved to have returned no answer to them upon those propositions; but to let the people alone to judge of the unreasonableness of them, and of the indignity offered to him in the delivery of them; and that was the reason of the short mention he made of them, in the close of his declaration to theirs of the twenty-sixth of May: but he was afterwards persuaded to vouchsafe a further notice of them, there being some particulars popular enough, and others, that, at the first view, seemed not altogether so derogatory to him, and so inconvenient to the people, as in truth they were; and that therefore it was necessary to let all the people know, that whatsoever was reasonable, and might be beneficial to the kingdom, had been for the most part before offered by his majesty; and should all be readily granted by him; and so to unfold the rest to them, that they might discern their own welfare, and security, to be as much endangered by those demands, as the king's rights, honour, and dignity: so that, in a short time after he received them, he sent to the two houses, and published to the kingdom, his answer to those nineteen propositions.

"In which he first remembered them of their method, they had observed in their proceedings towards him: that they had first totally suppressed the known law of the land, and denied his power to be necessary to the making new, reducing the whole to their own declarations, and single votes: that they had possessed themselves of his magazines, forts, and militia: that they had so awed his subjects with pursuivants, long chargeable attendance; heavy censures; and illegal imprisonments; that few of them durst offer to present their tenderness of his majesty's sufferings, their own just grievances, and their sense of those violations of the law, (the birth-right of every subject of the kingdom,) though in an humble petition to both houses: and if any did, it was stifled in the birth; called sedition; and burned by the common hangman: that they had restrained the attendance of his ordinary and necessary household servants; and seized upon those small sums of money, which his credit had provided to buy him bread; with injunctions, that none should be suffered to be conveyed, or returned to his majesty to York, or to any of his peers, or servants with him; so that, in effect, they had blocked him up in that county: that they had filled the ears of his people with fears and jealousies, (though taken up upon trust,) tales of skippers, salt fleets, and such like; by which alarms they might prepare them to receive such impressions, as might best advance their design, when it should be ripe. And now, it seemed, they thought his majesty sufficiently prepared for those bitter pills; that he was in

"a handsome posture to receive those humble desires; which, probably, were intended to make way for a superfection of a yet higher nature; for they did not tell him, this was all. He said, he must observe, that those contrivers, (the better to advance their true ends,) in those propositions, disguised, as much as they could, their intents with a mixture of some things really to be approved by every honest man; others, specious and popular; and some which were already granted by his majesty: all which were cunningly twisted and mixed with those other things of their main design, of ambition and private interest, in hope that, at the first view, every eye might not so clearly discern them in their proper colours.

"His majesty said, if the 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 9, 10, 15, 16, 19, demands had been writ, and printed, in a tongue unknown to his majesty and his people, it might have been possible, that he and they might have charitably believed the propositions to be such, as might have been in order to the ends pretended in the petition; to wit, the establishment of his honour and safety; the welfare and security of his subjects and dominions; and the removing those jealousies and differences, which were said to have unhappily fallen betwixt his majesty and his people; and procuring both his majesty and them a constant course of honour, peace, and happiness: but being read and understood by all, he could not but assure himself, that that profession, joined to those propositions, would rather appear a mockery, and a scorn; the demands being such, that he were unworthy of the trust reposed in him by the law, and of his descent from so many great and famous ancestors, if he could be brought to abandon that power, which only could enable him to perform what he was sworn to, in protecting his people, and the laws; and so assume others into it, as to divest himself of it, although not only his present condition were more necessitous than it was, (which it could hardly be,) and he were both vanquished, and a prisoner, and in a worse condition than ever the most unfortunate of his predecessors had been reduced to, by the most criminal of their subjects; and though the bait laid to draw him to it, and to keep his subjects from indignation at the mention of it, the promises of a plentiful and unparalleled revenue, were reduced from generals (which signify nothing) to clear and certain particulars; since such a bargain would have but too great a resemblance of that of Esau's, if he would part with such flowers of his crown, as were worth all the rest of the garland, and had been transmitted to him from so many ancestors, and had been found so useful and necessary for the welfare and security of his subjects, for any present necessity, or for any low and sordid considerations of wealth and gain. And therefore, all men knowing that those accommodations are most easily made, and most exactly observed, that are grounded upon reasonable and equal conditions, his majesty had great cause to believe, that the contrivers of those propositions had no intention of settling any firm accommodation; but to increase those jealousies, and widen that division, which, not by his majesty's fault, was now unhappily fallen between him and both houses.

"It was asked, that all lords and others of his privy-council, and such great officers and ministers of state, either at home or beyond the seas, (for, he said, care was taken to leave out no person or place, that his dishonour might be sure not to be bounded within this kingdom,) should be put from his privy-council, and from those offices and employments, unless they should be approved by both houses of parliament, how faithful soever his majesty had found them to him, and the public; and how far soever they had been from offending against any law, the only rule they had, or any others ought to have, to walk by. His majesty therefore to that part of that demand returned this answer; That he was willing to grant, that they should take a larger oath, than they themselves desired in their eleventh demand, for maintaining not of any part, but of the whole law. And, he said, he had, and did assure them, that he would be careful to make election of such persons in those places of trust, as had given good testimonies of their abilities and integrities, and against whom there could be no just cause of exception, whereon reasonably to ground a diffidence: that if he had, or should be mistaken in his election, he had, and did assure them, that there was no man so near to him, in place or affection, whom he would not leave to the justice of the law, if they should bring a particular charge and sufficient proof against him: that he had given them a triennial parliament, (the best pledge of the effects of such a promise on his part, and the best security for the performance of their duty on theirs,) the apprehension of whose justice would, in all probability, make them wary how they provoked it, and his majesty wary, how he chose such as, by the discovery of their faults, might in any degree seem to discredit his election; but that without any shadow of a fault objected, only perhaps because they follow their consciences, and preserve the established laws, and agree not in such votes, or assent not to such bills, as some persons, who had then too great an influence even upon both houses, judged, or seemed to judge, to be for the public good, and as were agreeable to that new Utopia of religion and government, into which they endeavoured to transform this kingdom, (for, he said, he remembered what names, and for what reasons, they left out in the bill offered him concerning the militia, which they had themselves recommended in the ordinance,) he would never consent to the displacing of any, whom for their former merits from, and affection to his majesty and the public, he had intrusted; since, he conceived, that to do so would take away both from the affection of his servants, the care of his service, and the honour of his justice: and, he said, he the more wondered that it should be asked by them, since it appears by the twelfth demand, that themselves counted it reasonable, after the present turn was served, that the judges and officers, who were then placed, might hold their places, quandiu se bene gesserint: and he was resolved to be as careful of those whom he had chosen, as they were of those they would choose; and to remove none, till they appeared to him to have otherwise behaved themselves, or should be evicted, by legal proceedings, to have done so.

"sonable as it was, was but one link of a great chain, and but the first round of that ladder, by which his majesty's just, ancient, regal power was endeavoured to be fetched down to the ground; for it appeared plainly that it was not with the persons now chosen, but with his majesty's choosing, that they were displeased: for they demanded, that the persons put into the places and employments of those, who should be removed, might be approved by both houses; which was so far from being less than the power of nomination, that of two things, of which he would never grant either, he would sooner be content, that they should nominate, and he approve, than they approve, and his majesty nominate; the mere nomination being so far from being any thing, that if he could do no more, he would never take the pains to do that; when he should only hazard those whom he esteemed to the scorn of a refusal, if they happened not to be agreeable not only to the judgment, but to the passion, interest, or humour of the present major part of either house: not to speak of the great factions, animosities, and divisions, which that power would introduce in both houses, between both houses, and in the several counties for the choice of persons to be sent to that place, where that power was; and between the persons that were so chosen. Neither was that strange potion prescribed to him only for once, for the cure of a present, pressing, desperate disease; but for a diet to him, and his posterity. It was demanded, that his counsellors, all chief officers both of law and state, commanders of forts and castles, and all peers hereafter made, be approved of, that is chosen, by them from time to time: and rather than it should ever be left to the crown, (to whom it only did and should belong,) if any place fall void in the intermission of parliament, the major part of the approved council was to approve them. Neither was it only demanded that his majesty should quit the power and right his predecessors had had of appointing persons in those places; but for counsellors, he was to be restrained, as well in the number as in the persons; and a power must be annexed to those places, which their predecessors had not. And, indeed, if that power were passed to them, he said, it would not be fit he should be trusted to choose those, who were to be trusted as much as himself.

"He told them, to grant their demands in the manner they proposed them, that all matters that concerned the public, &c. should be resolved, and transacted only in parliament, and such other matters of state, &c. by the privy-council so chosen, was in effect at once to depose himself, and his posterity. He said, many expressions in their demands had a greater latitude of signification, than they seemed to have; and that it concerned his majesty therefore the more, that they should speak out; that both he and his people might either know the bottom of their demands, or know them to be bottomless. Nothing more concerned the public, and was indeed more proper for the high court of parliament, than the making of laws; which not only ought there to be transacted, but could be transacted nowhere else. But then they must admit his majesty to be a part of the parliament; they must not (as the sense was of that part of that "demand, if it had any) deny the freedom of his answer, when he had as much right to reject what he thought unreasonable, as they had to propose what they thought convenient, or necessary. Nor was it possible his answers, either to bills, or any other propositions, should be wholly free, if he might not use the liberty, that every one of them, and every subject took, to receive advice (without their danger who should give it) from any person known or unknown, sworn or unsworn, in those matters in which the manage of his vote is trusted, by the law, to his own judgment and conscience; which how best to inform was, and ever should be, left likewise to him. He said, he would always, with due consideration, weigh the advices both of his great, and privy-council: yet he should likewise look on their advices, as advices, not as commands, or impositions; upon them, as his counsellors, not as his tutors, or guardians; and upon himself, as their king, not as their pupil, or ward: for, he said, whatsoever of regality was, by the modesty of interpretation, left in his majesty, in the first part of the second demand, as to the parliament, was taken from him in the second part of the same, and placed in that newfangled kind of counsellors, whose power was such, and so expressed by it, that in all public acts concerning the affairs of the kingdom, which are proper for the privy-council, (for whose advice all public acts are sometimes proper, though never necessary,) they were desired to be admitted joint patentees with his majesty in the regality. And it was not plainly expressed, whether they meant his majesty so much as a single vote in those affairs; but it was plain they meant him no more, at most, than a single vote in them; and no more power, than every one of the rest of his fellow-counsellors."

And so after a sharp discourse, and explanation of the unreasonableness of the several demands, or the greatest part of them, and the confusion that, by consenting thereunto, would redound to the subject in general, as well as the dishonour to his majesty, (which may be read at large by itself,) he told them, "to all those unreasonable demands, his answer was, Nolumus leges Angliæ mutari: but renewed his promise to them, for a very punctual and strict observation of the known laws established; to which purpose he was willing an oath should be framed by them, and taken by all his privy-counsellors. And for any alteration in the government of the church, that a national synod should be called, to propose what should be found necessary or convenient: and that, for the advancement of the protestant religion against the papists, they had not proposed so much to his majesty, as he was willing to grant, or as he had himself offered before. He concluded with conjuring them, and all men, to rest satisfied with the truth of his majesty's professions, and the reality of his intentions; and not to ask such things as denied themselves: that they would declare against tumults, and punish the authors: that they would allow his majesty his property in his towns, arms, and goods; and his share in the legislative power; which would be counted in him not only breach of privilege, but tyranny, and subversion of parliaments, to deny to them: and, when they should have given him satisfaction upon those "persons, who had taken away the one, and recalled those declarations, (particularly that of the twenty-sixth of May; and those in the point of the militia, his just rights wherein he would no more part with, than with his crown, lest he enabled others by them to take that from him,) which would take away the other; and declined the beginnings of a war against his majesty, under pretence of his intention of making one against them; as he had never opposed the first part of the thirteenth demand, so he would be ready to concur with them in the latter; and being then confident that the credit of those men, who desire a general combustion, would be so weakened with them, that they would not be able to do this kingdom any more hurt, he would be willing to grant his general pardon, with such exceptions as should be thought fit; and should receive much more joy in the hope of a full and constant happiness of his people in the true religion, and under the protection of the law, by a blessed union between his majesty and his parliament, than in any such increase of his own revenue, how much soever beyond former grants, as (when his subjects were wealthiest) his parliament could have settled upon his majesty."

Though the king now lived at York in a much more princely condition, than he could have hoped to have done near London; and had so great a train and resort of the nobility and gentry, that there was not left a fifth part of the house of peers at Westminster; and truly I do not believe, that there was near a moiety of the house of commons who continued there; yet he made no other use, for the present, of their presence with him, and of their absence from the two houses, than to have so many the more, and the more credible witnesses of his majesty's counsels and carriage; and to undeceive the people by his clear answers to all the scandals and reproaches which were laid on him, and by his ample professions and protestations of his sincere zeal to religion and justice; and to make it appear to them, how far the quality and the number of those who thought, or seemed to think, otherwise, was, from what they might imagine it to be. And it cannot be denied, but the people were every day visibly reformed in their understandings, from the superstitious reverence they had paid the two houses; and grew sensible of their duty to the king, and of those invasions which were offered to his regal dignity.

On the other side, the two houses slackened not their pace a jot, proceeded with great and unusual sharpness against those members who were gone to the king; proclaiming some of them by name "to be enemies to the kingdom," and, by a formal judgment, sentencing nine peers together, "to be incapable of sitting again in parliament, whilst this should continue:" the house of commons having carried up an impeachment of misdemeanours against them, (which was as illegal in point of justice, and as extravagant in point of privilege, as any thing they could do,) "for being absent, and refusing to attend, upon a summons from the house of peers:" and upon their own members they imposed a fine of 100*l.* apiece, on every one who was gone to the king, and upon those, who being in other places, they thought were well affected to his service: yet, lest they should upon this proceeding return again, to disturb and cross their counsels, they provided, "that no man,

"upon whom that sentence fell, should sit again in the house (though he paid his fine) till he had been examined by a committee, and so given the house satisfaction in the cause of his absence." And, by those means, they thought both to remove the scandal, that so many members were absent, and to prevent any inconvenience too, that might befall them by their return. For they well knew, if the members of both houses were obliged to a constant and strict attendance, it would not be possible that they could compass their mischievous designs.

Then they prosecuted their great business of the militia, not only near London, where they were in no danger of opposition, but in those northern counties near his majesty, as Leicestershire, Cheshire, Lincolnshire, where whosoever refused to give obedience to them, or published the king's proclamation against their proceedings, (for the king had yet practised no expedient to prevent the growth of that mischief, but the publishing his proclamation against it,) were sent for as delinquents; and not satisfied herewith, that they might be as well able to pay an army, as they found they should be to raise one, on the tenth of June (for the time will be very necessary to be remembered, that it may be the better stated, who took up the defensive arms) they published propositions, "for the bringing in of money or plate to maintain horse, horsemen, and arms, for the preservation of the public peace, and for the defence of the king and both houses of parliament; the reasons and grounds whereof they declared to be the king's intention to make war against his parliament; that, under pretence of a guard for his person, he had actually begun to levy forces, both of horse and foot; and sent out summons throughout the county of York, for the calling together of greater numbers; and some ill affected persons, in other parts, had been employed to raise troops, under the colour of his majesty's service; making large offers of reward and preferment to such as would come in: that his majesty did, with a high and forcible hand, protect and keep away delinquents, not permitting them to make their appearance to answer such affronts and injuries, as had been by them offered to the parliament; and those messengers, which had been sent from the houses for them, had been abused, beaten, and imprisoned, so as the orders of parliament, the highest court of justice in the realm, were not obeyed; and the authority of it was altogether scorned and vilified; and such persons as stood well affected to it, and declared themselves sensible of those public calamities, and of the violations of the privileges of parliament, and common liberty of the subject, were baffled, and injured by several sorts of malignant men, who were about the king; some whereof, under the name of cavaliers, without having respect to the laws of the land, or any fear either of God or man, were ready to commit all manner of outrage and violence; which must needs tend to the dissolution of the government; the destruction of their religion, laws, liberty, and property; all which would be exposed to the malice and violence of such desperate persons, as must be employed in so horrid and unnatural an act, as the overthrowing a parliament by force; which was the support and preservation of them. Those particulars,

"they said, being duly considered by the lords and commons, and how great an obligation lay upon them, in honour, conscience, and duty, according to the high trust reposed in them to use all possible means, in such cases, to prevent so great and irrecoverable evils, they had thought fit to publish their sense and apprehension of that imminent danger; thereby to excite all well affected persons to contribute their best assistance, according to their solemn vow and protestation, to the preparations necessary for the opposing and suppressing of the traitorous attempts of those wicked and malignant counsellors, who sought to engage the king in so dangerous and destructive an enterprise, and the whole kingdom in a civil war; and destroy the privileges and being of parliaments. "This recourse to the good affections of those, that tender their religion and just liberties, and the enjoyment of the blessed fruits of this present parliament, which were almost ready to be reaped, and were now as ready to be ruined by those wicked hands, being, they said, the only remedy left them under God; and without which they were no longer able to preserve themselves, or those by whom they were intrusted: therefore they declared, that whosoever would bring in any proportion of ready money or plate, or would underwrite to furnish and maintain any number of horse, horsemen, and arms, for the preservation of the public peace, and for the defence of the king, and both houses of parliament, from force and violence, and to uphold the power and privileges of parliament, according to his protestation; it should be held a good and acceptable service to the commonwealth, and a testimony of his good affection to the protestant religion, the laws, liberties, and peace of the kingdom; and to the parliament, and privileges thereof. And they further declared, that whosoever brought in money or plate, or furnished and maintained horse, horsemen, and arms, upon these propositions, and to those purposes, should be repaid their money with interest of eight per cent.; for which they did engage the public faith, and they appointed the guildhall in London for the place whither this money or plate should be brought; and four aldermen of London to be their treasurers for the receiving the same; and likewise other confiding men to receive and prize such horses and arms, as should be brought in for their service. And, lastly, for their better encouragement, the members of both houses appointed a solemn day to set down their own subscriptions;" which they performed liberally.

Most of those who abhorred their impious designs, not thinking it lawful for them to be present at such consultations, withdrew before the day came, or absented themselves then. But many had the courage to be present, and stoutly to refuse what they thought they could not honestly consent to. Sir Henry Killigrew, who was notoriously an enemy to all their devices, being called upon, told them, "if there were occasion, he would provide a good horse, and a good sword; and made no question but he should find a good cause." But, within very few days, both he, and all those who were taken notice of for refusing, found it safest for them to leave the town; there being very visibly great animosity against them both within and without the walls. And a gentleman of good quality assured me afterwards, that, within few days after he had refused to subscribe, he was privately advised by one of the other faction, who yet retained some kindness to him, "to leave the town, lest his "brains were beaten out by the boys in the streets." And many of those who too impotently desired not to be looked upon as refractory persons, and had pleased themselves with subscribing more articulately for the defence of the king's person, found it afterwards necessary to supply whatsoever they had subscribed, to be employed that way as was declared to be for the defence of the king's person, whatsoever their intention was at first, or their opinion after. And it is hardly credible, what a vast proportion of plate was brought in to their treasurers within ten days; there being hardly men enough to receive it, or room to lay it in; and the throng being so great of the bringers, that, in two days' attendance, many could not be discharged of their seditious offerings. And, the very next day after these propositions, they further ordered, "that there should be a strict search and "examination made by the justices of peace, "mayors, bailiffs, and constables, near all the "northern roads, for the seizing all horses for "service in the wars, or great saddles, that "should be carried towards the north parts of "England, without the privy or direction of one "or both houses of parliament;" which was a great improvement of their former order, which extended only to arms and ammunition; though, the truth is, the dexterity and spirit of their ministers, who knew their meaning, made the former almost as inconvenient and dangerous to passengers, as the latter.

It was by many impatiently wondered at then, and, no doubt, will be more censured hereafter, that, notwithstanding all these invasions, and breaches upon the regal power, and all these vast preparations to destroy him, the king, hitherto, put not himself into a posture of safety; or provided for the resistance of that power which threatened him; and which, he could not but know, intended whatsoever it hath since done: and though they had not yet formed an army, and chosen a general, yet, he well knew, they had materials abundantly ready for the first, and particular, digested resolutions in the second; which they could reduce to public acts, whensoever they pleased. It is very true, he did know all this, and the unspeakable hazards he run, in not preparing against it. But the hazards, which presented themselves unto him on the other side, were not less prodigious: he had a very great appearance of the nobility; and not only of those, who had from the beginning walked and governed themselves by the rules the law prescribed, and, in that respect, were unblameable to king and people; but of others, who had passionately and peevishly (to say no worse) concurred in all the most violent votes and actions, which had been done from the beginning: for, besides the lord Spencer, (who had been chosen their lieutenant of Northamptonshire, but was recovered to a right understanding, of which he was very capable, by his uncle the earl of Southampton,) the lord Paget likewise, who had contributed all his faculties to their service, and to the prejudice of the king's, from before the beginning of the parliament; [had] been one of their teasers to broach those bold high overtures soberer men were not willing at first to be seen in; and had been, as a man most worthy to be confided in, chosen lord lieutenant of one of the most confiding counties, the county of Buckingham, (where he had, with great solemnity and pomp, executed their ordinance in defiance of the king's proclamation,) and had subscribed a greater number of horses for their service, upon their propositions, than any other of the same quality; convinced in his conscience, fled from them, and besought the king's pardon: and, for the better manifesting of the tenderness of his compunction, and the horror he had of his former guilt, he lustily discovered whatsoever he had known of their counsels; and aggravated all the ill they had done, with declaring it to be done to worse and more horrid ends, than many good men believed to be possible for them to entertain.

Notwithstanding, this glorious convention was rather an ornament to his court, than any great advantage to his counsels; and the use of them more to discredit the small remainder at Westminster, and that the people might see the number and quality of the dissenters, than that they contributed any thing to the active improvement of his affairs; every man thinking it high merit in him, that he absented himself from the company and place, where all the mischief was done; and that the keeping himself negatively innocent, was as much as he owed his king and country. I am tender of laying any imputation of want of providence or courage upon that time, and upon so great a body of the nobility, which doubtless was the rise of much reputation and advantage to the king; and am willing to impute it to the drowsy and unactive genius of the kingdom, (contracted by long ease and quiet,) which so much abhorred the thoughts of a civil war, that it thought a lively and vigorous preparation against it, was to invite it. And they all (truly there did not appear four counsellors of another opinion) declared to the king, "that the parliament durst not in truth " (whatever shows they made in hope to shake "his majesty's constancy) make a war; and if they "should attempt it, the people would unanimously "rise for the king, who would be most safe by not "intending his own safety. Whereas, if he raised "forces, the parliament would procure themselves "to be believed, that it was to overthrow religion, "and suppress the laws and liberties of the people." They who were of another opinion, and could have spoken more reason, held it not safe to express themselves but in the king's own ear; there being in the great council of the peers, who, for state, were frequently assembled, and by whom in truth the king then desired to have transacted all things of moment, some who were not good counsel-keepers, and others who were looked upon, and believed to be spies upon the rest. But that which made the thought of raising forces (whatever arguments there were for it) absolutely unreasonable, was, that the king had no possibility to procure either arms, or munition, but from Holland; from whence he daily expected supply: and till that arrived, let his provocations and sufferings be what they could be, he was to submit, and bear it patiently.

In the mean time, for a ground of further proceeding upon occasion, the king desired the peers in council to set down in writing the affronts and violence, which had been offered to them at London, by which their presence in the great council of the kingdom was rendered both unsafe and dishonourable; the which they the more willingly condescended to, for that the London pamphlets already aspersed them, as deserters of the parliament, and betrayers of the liberty of their country: an instrument being drawn up, and agreed upon between them, in which they set down "the tumults, and the violence offered to particular persons in those tumults; the threats and menaces of the rabble at the doors of the house, when they had a mind any exorbitant thing should pass; the breach and violation of the old orders and rules of parliament, whilst matters were in debate, and the resuming matters again in a thin house; and reversing, waving, or contradicting resolutions made in a full house: and, lastly, Mr. Hollis's coming to the bar, and demanding the names of those lords who refused to consent to the militia, when the multitude without menaced and threatened all those dissenters:" after which, they said, "they conceived they could not be present there with honour, freedom, or safety; and therefore forbore to be any more present; and so all those votes, conclusions, and declarations had passed, which had begot those distractions throughout the kingdom." And this they delivered to the king, signed under their hands. And yet, (which is a sufficient instance how unendued men were with that spirit and courage which was requisite,) the next day after the delivery, many lords came to his majesty, and besought him, "that he would by no means publish that paper, but keep it in his own hands;" some of them saying, "that, if it were published, they would disavow it:" so that material and weighty evidence, which then might have been of sovereign use to the king, was rendered utterly ineffectual to his service; his majesty finding it necessary to engage his princely word to them, "never to make it public without their consent;" which he performed most punctually; and so, to this day, it was never divulged.

To make some little amends for this want of mettle, (for it proceeded from nothing else, they being most shy in subscribing, and most passionate against publishing, who were of unquestionable affection to his majesty, and integrity to his cause,) and that the world might see there was a combination among good men, to assist his majesty in the defence of the law, as well as there was against both by others; upon the king's declaring himself fully in council, where all the peers were present, "that he would not require or exact any obedience from them, but what should be warranted by the known law of the land; so he did expect that they would not yield to any commands not legally grounded, or imposed by any other: that he would defend every one of them, and all such as should refuse any such commands, whether they proceeded from votes and orders of both houses, or any other way, from all dangers and hazards whatsoever. That his majesty would defend the true protestant religion, established by the law of the land; the lawful liberties of the subjects of England; and just privileges of all the three estates of parliament; and would require no further obedience from them, than as accordingly he should perform the same: and his majesty did further declare, that he would not, as was falsely pretended, engage them, or "any of them, in any war against the parliament; except it were for his necessary defence and safety, against such as did insolently invade or attempt against his majesty, or such as should adhere to his majesty:" all the peers engaged themselves, "not to obey any orders or commands whatsoever, not warranted by the known laws of the land; and to defend his majesty's person, crown, and dignity, together with his just and legal prerogative, against all persons and power whatsoever: that they would defend the true protestant religion, established by the law of the land; the lawful liberties of the subject of England; and just privileges of his majesty, and both his houses of parliament: and, lastly, they engaged themselves not to obey any rule, order, or ordinance whatsoever, concerning any militia, that had not the royal assent."

This being subscribed by their lordships was, with their consent, immediately printed, and carefully divulged over the kingdom, bearing date at York the thirteenth of June, 1642, with the names of the subscribers. Two days after, his majesty in council taking notice of the rumours spread, and informations given, which might induce many to believe, that his majesty intended to make war against his parliament, "professed before God, and said, he declared to all the world, that he always had, and did abhor all such designs, and desired all his nobility and council, who were there upon the place, to declare, whether they had not been witnesses of his frequent and earnest declarations and professions to that purpose: whether they saw any colour of preparations or counsels, that might reasonably beget a belief of any such design; and whether they were not fully persuaded, that his majesty had no such intention: but that all his endeavours, according to his many professions, tended to the firm and constant settlement of the true protestant religion; the just privileges of parliament; the liberty of the subject; the law, peace, and prosperity of this kingdom."

Whereupon all the lords and counsellors present unanimously agreed, and did sign a paper in these words:

"We, whose names are underwritten, in obedience to his majesty's desire, and out of the duty which we owe to his majesty's honour, and to truth, being here upon the place, and witnesses of his majesty's frequent and earnest declarations and professions of his abhorring all designs of making war upon his parliament; and not seeing any colour of preparations or counsels, that might reasonably beget the belief of any such designs, do profess before God, and testify to all the world, that we are fully persuaded that his majesty hath no such intention: but that all his endeavours tend to the firm and constant settlement of the true protestant religion; the just privileges of parliament; the liberty of the subject; the law, peace, and prosperity of this kingdom." This testimony of the lords and counsellors was immediately printed, and published, together with a declaration of his majesty's; in which he said,

"That though he had, in the last seven months, met with so many several encounters of strange and unusual declarations, under the name of both his houses of parliament, that he should not be amazed at any new prodigy of that kind; and though their last of the twenty-sixth of May gave him a fair warning that, the contrivers of it having spent all their stock of bitter and reproachful language upon him, he was now to expect they should break out into some bold and disloyal actions against him: and, having by that declaration, as far as in them lay, divested his majesty of that preeminence and authority, which God, the law, the custom and consent of this nation had placed in him, and assumed it to themselves, that they should likewise, with expedition, put forth the fruits of that supreme power, for the violating and suppressing the other which they despised, (an effect of which resolution, he said, their wild declaration against his proclamation concerning the pretended ordinance for the militia, and the punishing of the proclaimers appeared to be,) yet, he must confess, in their last attempt (he said, he spake of the last he knew; they might probably since, or at that present, have outdone that too) they had outdone what his majesty had conceived was their present intention. And whosoever heard of propositions, and orders, for bringing in of money or plate to maintain horse, horsemen, and arms, for the preservation of the public peace, or for the defence of the king and both houses of parliament, (such was their declaration, or what they please to call it, of the tenth of June,) would surely believe the peace of the kingdom to be extremely shaken; and, at least, the king himself to be consulted with, and privy to those propositions. But, he said, he hoped, that when his good subjects should find, that that goodly pretence of defending the king, was but a specious bait to seduce weak and inconsiderate men into the highest acts of disobedience and disloyalty against his majesty, and of violence and destruction upon the laws and constitutions of the kingdom, they would no longer be captivated by an implicit reverence to the name of both houses of parliament; but would carefully examine and consider what number of persons were present; and what persons were prevalent in those consultations; and how the debates were probably managed, from whence such horrid and monstrous conclusions did result; and would at least weigh the reputation, wisdom, and affection of those, who were notoriously known, out of the very horror of their proceedings, to have withdrawn themselves; or, by their skill and violence to be driven from them, and their councils.

"His majesty [said], whilst their fears and jealousies did arise, or were infused into the people, from discourses of the rebels in Ireland, of skippers at Rotterdam, of forces from Denmark, France, or Spain, (how improbable and ridiculous soever that bundle of information appeared to all wise and knowing men,) it was no wonder if the easiness to deceive, and the willingness to be deceived, did prevail over many of his weak subjects to believe, that the dangers, which they did not see, might proceed from causes which they did not understand: but for them to declare to all the world, that his majesty intended to make war against his parliament, (whilst he sat still complaining to God Almighty of the injury offered to him, and to the very being of parliaments,) and that he had already begun actually to levy forces both of horse and foot, (whilst he had only, in a legal way, provided a smaller guard for the security of his own person so near a rebellion at Hull, than they had, without lawful authority, above these eight months, upon imaginary and impossible dangers,) to impose upon his people's sense, as well as their understanding, by telling them his majesty was doing that which they saw he was not doing, and intending that, they all knew, as much as intentions could be known, he was not intending, was a boldness agreeable to no power but the omnipotency of those votes, whose absolute supremacy had almost brought confusion upon king and people; and against which no knowledge in matter of fact, or consent and authority in matter of law, they would endure should be opposed.

"His majesty said, he had, upon all occasions, with all possible expressions, professed his fast and unshaken resolutions for peace. And, he said, he did again, in the presence of Almighty God, his maker and redeemer, assure the world, that he had no more thought of making a war against his parliament, than against his own children: that he would observe and maintain the acts assented to by him this parliament without violation; of which, that for the frequent assembling of parliaments was one: and that he had not, nor would have, any thought of using any force; unless he should be driven to it, for the security of his person, and for the defence of the religion, laws, and liberty of the kingdom, and the just rights and privileges of parliament: and therefore he hoped the malignant party, who had so much despised his person, and usurped his office, should not, by their specious fraudulent insinuations, prevail with his good subjects to give credit to their wicked assertions; and so to contribute their power and assistance for the ruin and destruction of themselves, and his majesty.

"For the guard about his person, (which, he said, not so much their example, as their provocation, had enforced him to take,) it was known it consisted of the prime gentry, in fortune and reputation, of that country; and of one regi"ment of trained bands; who had been so far from offering any affronts, injuries, or disturbance to any of his good subjects, that their principal end was to prevent such; and so, might be security, could be no grievance to his people. That some ill affected persons, or any persons, had been employed in other parts to raise troops, under colour of his majesty's service; or that such had made large, or any, offers of reward and preferment to such as would come in, which had been alleged by them; was, he said, for aught he knew, or believed, an untruth, devised by the contrivers of that false rumour. His majesty disavowed it, and said, he was confident there would be no need of such art, or industry, to induce his loving subjects, when they should see his majesty oppressed, and their liberties and laws confounded, (and till then he would not call on them,) to come in to him, and to assist him.

"For the delinquents, whom his majesty was said with a high and forcible hand to protect, he wished they might be named, and their delinquency: and if his majesty gave not satisfaction to justice, when he should have received satisfaction concerning sir John Hotham by his legal trial, then let him be blamed. But if the design were, as it was well known to be, after his majesty had been driven by force from his city of London, and kept by force from his town of Hull, to protect all those who were delinquents against him, and to make all those delinquents who attended on him, or executed his lawful commands, he said, he had great reason to be satisfied in the truth and justice of such accusation, lest to be his majesty's servant, and to be a delinquent, grew to be terms so convertible, that, in a short time, he were left as naked in attendance, as they would have him in power; and so compel him to be waited upon only by such whom they should appoint and allow; and in whose presence he should be more miserably alone, than in desolation itself. And if the seditious contrivers and fomenters of that scandal upon his majesty should have, as they had had, the power to mislead the major part present of either or both houses, to make such orders, and send such messages and messengers, as they had lately done, for the apprehension of the great earls and barons of England, as if they were rogues or felons; and whereby persons of honour and quality were made delinquents, merely for attending upon his majesty, and upon his summons; whilst other men were forbid to come near him, though obliged by the duty of their place and oaths, upon his lawful commands: it was no wonder if such messengers were not very well intreated; and such orders not well obeyed; neither could there be a surer or a cunninger way found out to render the authority of both houses scorned and vilified, than to assume to themselves (merely upon the authority of the name of parliament) a power monstrous to all understandings; and to do actions, and to make orders, evidently and demonstrably contrary to all known law and reason, (as to take up arms against his majesty, under colour of defending him; to cause money to be brought in to them, and to forbid his own money to be paid to his majesty, or to his use, under colour that he would employ

"it ill; to beat him, and starve him for his own good, and by his power and authority,) which would in short time make the greatest court, and greatest person, cheap and of no estimation.

"Who those sensible men were of the public calamities, of the violations of the privileges of parliament, and the common liberty of the subject, who had been baffled, and injured by malignant men, and cavaliers about his majesty, his majesty said, he could not imagine. And if those cavaliers were so much without the fear of God and man, and so ready to commit all manner of outrage and violence, as was pretended, his majesty's government ought to be the more esteemed, which had kept them from doing so; inasmuch as he believed, no person had cause to complain of any injury, or of any damage, in the least degree, by any man about his majesty, or who had offered his service to him. All which being, he said, duly considered, if the contrivers of those propositions and orders had been truly sensible of the obligations, which lay upon them in honour, conscience, and duty, according to the high trust reposed in them by his majesty, and his people, they would not have published such a sense and apprehension of imminent danger, when themselves, in their consciences, knew that the greatest, and indeed only danger, which threatened the church and state, the blessed religion and liberty of his people, was in their own desperate and seditious designs; and would not have endeavoured, upon such weak and groundless reasons, to seduce his good subjects from their affection and loyalty to him, to run themselves into actions unwarrantable, and destructive to the peace and foundation of the commonwealth.

"And that all his loving subjects might see, how causeless and groundless that scandalous rumour, and imputation of his majesty's raising war upon his parliament, was, he had, with that his declaration, caused to be printed the testimony of those lords, and other persons of his council, who were there with him; who, being upon the place, could not but discover such his intentions and preparations; and could not be suspected for their honours and interests to combine in such mischievous and horrid resolutions.

"And therefore, his majesty said, he straitly charged and commanded all his loving subjects, upon their allegiance, and as they would answer the contrary at their perils, that they should yield no obedience or consent to the said propositions and orders; and that they presume not under any such pretences, or by colour of any such orders, to raise or levy any horse or men, or to bring in any money, or plate, to such purpose. But, he said, if, notwithstanding that clear declaration, and evidence of his intentions, those men (whose design it was to compel his majesty to raise war upon his parliament; which all their skill and malice should never be able to effect) should think fit, by those alarms, to awaken him to a more necessary care of the defence of himself, and his people; and should themselves, under colour of defence, in so unheard of a manner provide (and seduce others to do so too) to offend his majesty, having given him so lively a testimony of their affections, what they were willing to do, when

"they should once have made themselves able; all his good subjects would think it necessary for his majesty to look to himself. And he did therefore excite all his well affected people, according to their oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and according to their solemn vow and protestation, (whereby they were obliged to defend his person, honour, and estate,) to contribute their best assistance to the preparations necessary for the opposing and suppressing of the traitorous attempts of such wicked and malignant persons; who would destroy his person, honour, and estate, and engage the whole kingdom in a civil war, to satisfy their own lawless fury and ambition; and so rob his good subjects of the blessed fruit of this present parliament; which they already in some degree had, and might still reap, to the abundant satisfaction and joy of the whole kingdom, if such wicked hands were not ready to ruin all their possessions, and frustrate all their hopes. And, in that case, his majesty declared, that whosoever, of what degree or quality soever, should then, upon so urgent and visible necessity of his, and such apparent distraction of the kingdom, caused and begotten by the malice and contrivance of that malignant party, bring in to his majesty, and to his use, ready money, or plate; or should underwrite to furnish any number of horse, horsemen, and arms, for the preservation of the public peace, and defence of his person, and the vindication of the privilege and freedom of parliament, he would receive it as a most acceptable service, and as a testimony of his singular affection to the protestant religion, the laws, liberties, and peace of the kingdom; and would no longer desire the continuance of that affection, than he would be ready to justify and maintain the other with the hazard of his life."

And so concluded with the same overtures they had done, in their propositions for the loan of money at interest; "offering, for security thereof, an assurance of such his lands, forests, parks, and houses, as should be sufficient for the same; a more real security, he said, than the name of public faith, given without him, and against him; as if his majesty were no part of the public; and besides, he would always look upon it as a service most affectionately and seasonably performed for the preservation of his majesty, and the kingdom. But, he said, he should be much gladder that their submission to those his commands, and their desisting from any such attempt of raising horse or men, might ease all his good subjects of that charge, trouble, and vexation."

It will be wondered at hereafter, when, by what hath been said, the number and quality of the peers is considered, who, by absenting themselves from the house, and their resort to his majesty, sufficiently declared, that they liked not those conclusions which begat those distractions; why both those peers, and likewise such members of the commons, who then, and afterwards, appeared in the king's service, and were indeed full, or very near one moiety of that house, did not rather, by their diligent and faithful attendance in the houses, discountenance and resist those pernicious and fatal transactions, than, by withdrawing themselves from their proper stations, leave the other (whose ruinous intentions were sufficiently discovered) possessed of the reputation, authority, and power of a parliament; by which, it was evident, the people would be easily, to a great degree, seduced. And though the observing reader may, upon the collection of the several passages here set down, be able to answer those objections to himself; I am the rather induced, in this place, to apply myself to the clearing that point, because not only many honest men, who, at a distance, have considered it, without being privy to the passages within the walls, and those breaches which totally destroyed and took away the liberty and freedom of those councils, have been really troubled or unsatisfied with that desertion, as they call it, of the service to which they were incumbent, and chosen; but that I have heard some, who were the chief, if not the sole promoters of those violations, and the most violent pursuers of the most violent designs, and have since (out of the ruptures which have proceeded from their own animosities) either been, or been thought to be, more moderately inclined, complain, "that the withdrawing of so many members from the two houses was the principal cause of all our calamities." And they who have been the true authors of them, and still continue the same, have taken pains to make and declare the others, "deserters of their country, and betrayers of their trusts, by their voluntary withdrawing themselves from that council."

In the doing whereof, I shall not, I cannot, make any excuse for those, (of whom somewhat is before spoken,) who, from the beginning of this parliament, and in the whole progress of it, either out of laziness, or negligence, or incogitancy, or weariness, forbore to give their attendance there, when the number of those who really intended these prodigious alterations was very considerable; and daily drew many to their opinions, upon no other ground than that the number of the dissenters appeared not equally diligent, and intent upon their assertions: neither can I excuse the peers, the moderate part whereof being four for one, suffered themselves to be cozened, and persuaded, and threatened out of their rights by a handful of men, whom they might, in the beginning, easily have crushed; whereas in the house of commons the great managers were men of notable parts, much reputation, admirable dexterity; pretenders to severe justice and regularity; and then the number of the weak, and the wilful, who naturally were to be guided by them, always made up a major part; so that, from the beginning, they were always able to carry whatsoever they set their hearts visibly upon; at least, to discredit or disgrace any particular man, against whom they thought necessary to proceed, albeit of the most unblemished reputation, and upon the most frivolous suggestions; so that they could not [but] be very formidable, in that house, to all but the most abstracted men from all vulgar considerations.

But, I am confident, whosoever diligently revolves the several passages in both houses, from the time of the publishing the first remonstrance, upon his majesty's return from Scotland, to the time of which we last spake, must be of opinion, that the resorting of so many members then to his majesty, (from whom all the lords, and some of the commons, received commands to that purpose,) or to such places, where they thought they might be of greatest use to his majesty, in preservation of the peace of the kingdom, was not only an act of duty, but of such prudence and discretion, as sober and honest men were to be guided by. In the house of peers, the bishops, twenty-four in number, who had as much right to sit there, and were as much members of parliament, as any lord there, were first, by direct violence and force, driven and kept from thence, till the bill, for the total expulsion of them and their function from those seats, was passed; such of the peers, who were most notorious for adhering to the government of the church, being, in the mean time, threatened publicly by the rabble; and some of their persons assaulted. The business of the militia had been twice, upon solemn debate in a full house, rejected there; till such force and violence was brought to the very doors, such expostulations and threats delivered within the doors against those who refused to concur with them in that business, that no man had reason to believe his life out of danger from those rude hands, who was taken notice of for an opposer of their unreasonable desires; some of them having been declared enemies to their country, for having refused what was in their power lawfully to refuse; and others having been criminally accused by the commons, for words spoken by them in debate in the house of peers; after which many of them were sent for, by special letters, to attend his majesty, (which letters were always thought to be so good, and warrantable a ground to be absent, that no other was sufficient; nor had such summons, from the beginning of parliaments to this present, ever been neglected,) with whom they had not been many weeks, but two of them, as hath been mentioned before, upon an untrue and extravagant information, without further examination, were declared enemies to the kingdom: and nine others by solemn judgment, upon an impeachment brought up by the commons against them, only for being absent, and for what only concerned the privilege and jurisdiction of the peers, were disabled to sit in the house again during this session; so that, if they would have returned, they were actually excluded that council.

In the house of commons, the case was worse: first, they who had, with that liberty which is essential to parliaments, and according to their understandings, dissented, or declared a dislike of what the violent party so vehemently pursued, were, as hath been said before, declared enemies to their country; and their names posted up in paper, or parchment, at most eminent places, under some opprobrious character; which, though it was not avowed, and had no authority from the house by any public act, yet, being complained of, found neither redress, or such countenance, that it could be concluded the violation was unacceptable: so, though the tumults were not directly summoned or assembled, it is evident, by what hath been before set forth truly and at large, that they found there visible countenance and encouragement.

Then, what had been, upon full and solemn debates in a full house, rejected, was many times, in a thin house, and at unusual and unparliamentary hours, resumed, and determined contrary to the former conclusions: yet men satisfied themselves with doing what they thought their duty, and reasonably opposing what the major part ordered to be done; hoping that men's understandings would be shortly better informed; and that, though high and irreverent expressions and words were sometimes used against the king, there would be abstaining from unlawful and dangerous actions; and that the house of peers, at least, would never be brought to join or concur in any act prejudicial to the sovereign power. But when they saw a new way found out by the dexterity of the major part in the house of commons, to make the minor part of the lords too hard for the major; and so, whilst all men were transported with jealousy of the breach of privilege of parliament by the king, that there was, by the houses themselves, an absolute rooting up of all privileges: that from metaphysical considerations, what might be done in case of necessity, the militia of the kingdom was actually seized on; and put under a command contrary to, and against, the king's command: that there was then a resolution taken, by those who could act their resolutions when they pleased, to make a general, and to oblige all the members to live and die with that general; which will be anon more particularly mentioned; (for that resolution was well known before the time, that those many members removed to York, and withdrew to other places; and was executed within three or four days after;) men thought it high time to look to their innocence, and (since, by the course and order of that house, they could leave no monument or evidence of their dissenting, as the lords might have, by their protestations upon any unlawful act, or resolution) to declare their dislike of what was done, by not being present at the doing: and it was reasonably thought, there being no other way peaceably and securely to do it, that the kingdom, understanding the number of those that were present at such new transactions, and weighing the quality, number, and reputation of those who were absent, would be best induced to prefer the old laws of the kingdom, before the new votes (destructive to those laws) of those few men, who called themselves the two houses of parliament; and that it would prove a good expedient to work upon the consciences and modesty of those who staid behind, to conclude it necessary, by some fair address to his majesty, to endeavour such a general good understanding, that a perfect union might be made; and the privilege, dignity, and security of parliament be established according to the true and just constitution of it.

It is true, how reasonably soever it might be expected, it produced not that ingenuity: but they who had been troubled with their company, and, by the opposition they made, could not make that expedition in the mischief they intended, were glad they were rid of them; yet, shortly, considering what influence indeed it might have upon understanding men, they found a way to cast a reproach upon those who were absent, and yet to prevent any inconvenience to themselves by their return; publishing an order, "that all the members absent should appear at such a day, under the penalty of paying 100*l.* fine for his absence; and who-soever did not appear at that day" (which gave not time enough to any who were at a distance) "should not presume to sit in the house, before he had paid his fine, or satisfied the house with the cause of his absence;" so that all those who were with the king, and very many more, who had really withdrawn themselves to refresh their minds, or upon necessary affairs of their own, with a purpose to return, clearly discerned themselves excluded from sitting any more there; it being sufficiently manifest, that the cause of their absence would never be approved, if their persons were disliked, and their opinions disapproved: which appeared quickly; for the day was no sooner past, but they, without the least warrant of precedent, or colour of right, expelled very many, sometimes twenty in a day, not only of those who were with the king, but of others who had given them equal distaste; and ordered new writs to issue out to choose other members in their rooms.

It cannot be denied but some very honest and entire men staid still there, and opposed all their unjustifiable proceedings with great courage, and much liberty of speech; which was more frankly permitted to them than had been before, when the number of the dissenters was greater; and it may be there are still some who satisfy themselves that they have performed their duty, by always having denied to give their consent to whatsoever hath been seditiously or illegally concluded. But I must appeal to the consciences of those very men, whether they have not been many times, by staying there, compelled or terrified to do, and submit to, many acts contrary to their conscience, in cases of conscience; and contrary to their judgment and knowledge, in matters of law and right; and contrary to their oaths and duties, in matters of allegiance; and whether, if they had refused so to do, they should not have been plundered, expelled, and committed to prison? And then they cannot be thought to have proceeded unreasonably, who, to preserve their innocence, and their liberty, chose to undergo all the other censures and difficulties which could befall them, and which have been since plentifully poured upon them. But to return.

The king had, at this time, called to him some judges, and lawyers of eminency; by whose advice he published a declaration concerning the militia, and asserted "the right of the crown in granting commissions of array, for the better ordering and governing thereof;" and, at the same time, issued out those commissions to all counties, "expressly forbidding any obedience to be given to the ordinance for the militia by both houses, under the penalty of high treason." This only improved the paper combat in declarations; either party insisting, "that the law was on their side;" and the people giving obedience to either, according to their conveniences: and many did believe, that if the king had resorted to the old known way of lord lieutenants, and deputy lieutenants, his service would have been better carried on; the commission of array being a thing they had not before heard of, though founded upon an ancient act of parliament in the reign of Hen. IV. and so was received with jealousy, and easily discredited by the glosses and suggestions of the houses.

Besides that some men of very good affections to the crown, and averse enough to the extravagant pretences and proceedings of the parliament, did not conceal their prejudice to the commission of array, as not warranted by law; which did very much work upon other men, and made the obedience less cheerful that was given to that service. Mr. Selden had, in the debate upon that subject in the house of commons, declared himself very positively, and with much sharpness, against the commission of array, as a thing expressly without any authority of law; the statute upon which it was grounded being, as he said, repealed; and discoursed very much of the ill consequences which might result from submitting to it: he answered the arguments which had been used to support it; and easily prevailed with the house not to like a proceeding, which they knew was intended to do them hurt, and to lessen their authority. But his authority and reputation prevailed much further than the house, and begot a prejudice against it in many well affected men. When the king was informed of it, he was much troubled, having looked upon Mr. Selden as well disposed to his service. And the lord Falkland, with his majesty's leave, writ a friendly letter to Mr. Selden, "to know his reason, why, in such a conjuncture, whatever his opinion [were], he would oppose the submission to the commission of array, which nobody could deny to have had its original from law, and that many learned men still believed to be very legal, that the ordinance which had no manner of pretence to right might be the better established." He answered this letter very frankly; as a man who believed himself in the right upon the commission of array, and that the arguments he had used against it could not be answered; summing up some of those arguments in as few words as they could be comprehended [in]: but then he did as frankly inveigh against the ordinance for the militia, "which, he said, was without any shadow of law, or pretence of precedent, and most destructive to the government of the kingdom: and he did acknowledge, that he had been the more inclined to make that discourse in the house against the commission, that he might with the more freedom argue against the ordinance; which was to be considered upon a day then appointed: and he was most confident, that he should likewise overthrow the ordinance: which, he confessed, could be less supported; and he did believe, that it would be much better, if both were rejected, than if either of them should stand, and remain uncontrolled." But his confidence deceived him; and he quickly found, that they who suffered themselves to be entirely governed by his reason, when those conclusions resulted from it, which contributed to their own designs, would not be at all guided by it, or submit to it, when it persuaded that which contradicted and would disappoint those designs: and so, upon the day appointed for the debate of their ordinance, when he applied all his faculties to the convincing them of the illegality and monstrousness of it, by arguments at least as clear and demonstrable as his former had been, they made no impression upon them; but were easily answered by those who with most passion insisted upon their own sense. He had satisfied them very well, when he concurred with them in judgment; but his reasons were weak, when they crossed their resolutions. So most men are deceived in being too reasonable; and when they conclude that men will submit to what is right, who have no other consideration of right or justice, but as it advances their interest, or complies with their humour and passion. And so easy it hath always been to do harm, and to mislead men, and so hard to do good, and reduce them to reason.

other, drew the matter nearer to an issue. The king had written a letter to the mayor and aldermen of London, and to the masters and wardens of each several company; by which, "he assured them of his desire of the peace of the kingdom; and therefore required them, as they tendered their charter of the city, and their own particular welfares, not to bring in horses, money, or plate, upon the propositions of the houses; whereby, under pretence of raising a guard for the parliament, forces would be levied, and, in truth, employed against his majesty:" of which the houses taking notice, published a declaration to the city, "That they could not be secured by his majesty's protestations, that his desires and purposes were for the public peace; since it appeared, by divers expressions and proceedings of his majesty, that he intended to use force against those who submitted to the ordinance of the militia; and that he had likewise some intention of making an attempt upon Hull. In both which cases they did declare, that whatsoever violence should be used, either against those who exercise the militia, or against Hull, they could not but believe it as done against the parliament. They told them, that the dangerous and mischievous intentions of some about his majesty were such, that whatsoever was most precious to men of conscience and honour, as religion, liberty, and public safety, were like to be overwhelmed and lost in the general confusion and calamity of the kingdom; which would not only question, but overthrow the charter of the city of London; expose the citizens, their wives and children, to violence and villainy; and leave the wealth of that famous city as a prey to those desperate and necessitous persons: and therefore they forbade all the officers to publish that paper, as they would answer their contempt to the parliament; by the power and authority of which, they assured them, they should be protected, and secured in their persons, liberties, and estates, for whatsoever they should do by their advice or persuasion."

To this the king replied, "That he wondered, since they had usurped the supreme power to themselves, that they had not taken upon them the supreme style too; and directed their very new declaration to their trusty and well-beloved, their subjects of the city of London: for it was too great and palpable a scorn, to persuade them to take up arms against his person, under colour of being loving subjects to his office; and to destroy his person, that they might preserve the king: that he was beholding to them, that they had explained to all his good subjects the meaning of their charge against his majesty, that by his intention of making war against his parliament, no more was pretended to be meant, but his resolution not to submit to the high injustice and indignity of the ordinance for the militia, and the business of Hull. He said, he had never concealed his intentions in either of those particulars, (he wished they would deal as clearly with him,) but had always, and did now declare, that that pretended ordinance was against the law of the land; against the liberty and property of the subject; destructive to sovereignty; and therefore not consistent with the very constitution and essence of the kingdom, and to the right and privilege of parliament: that he "was bound by his oath (and all his subjects were bound by theirs of allegiance and supremacy, and their own protestation lately taken, to assist his majesty) to oppose that ordinance, which was put already in execution against him, not only by training and arming his subjects, but by forcibly removing the magazine, from the places trusted by the counties, to their own houses, and guarding it there with armed men. Whither it would be next removed, and how used by such persons, he knew not.

"That the keeping his majesty out of Hull by sir John Hotham, was an act of high treason against his majesty; and the taking away his magazine and munition from him, was an act of violence upon his majesty, by what hands or by whose direction soever it was done: and, in both cases, by the help of God, and the law, his majesty said, he would have justice, or lose his life in the requiring it; the which he did not value at that rate, as to preserve it with the infamy of suffering himself to be robbed, and spoiled of that dignity he was born to. And if it were possible for his good subjects to believe, that such a defence of himself, with the utmost power and strength he could raise, was making a war against his parliament, he did not doubt, however it should please God to dispose of him in that contention, but the justice of his cause would, at the last, prevail against those few malignant spirits, who, for their own ends, and ambitious designs, had so misled and corrupted the understandings of his people. And since neither his own declaration, nor the testimony of so many of his lords, then with his majesty, could procure credit with those men, but that they proceeded to levy horse, and to raise money and arms against his majesty, he said, he was not to be blamed, if after so many gracious expostulations with them, upon undeniable principles of law and reason, (which they answered only by voting that which his majesty said, to be neither law, nor reason; and so proceeded actually to levy war upon his majesty, to justify that which could not be otherwise defended,) at last he made such provision, that as he had been driven from London, and kept from Hull, he might not be surprised at York; but in a condition to resist, and bring to justice those men, who would persuade his people that their religion was in danger, because his majesty would not consent it should be in their power to alter it by their votes; or their liberty in danger, because he would allow no judge of that liberty, but the known law of the land: yet, he said, whatever provision he should be compelled to make for his security, he would be ready to lay down, as soon as they should revoke the orders by which they had made levies, and submitted those persons, who had detained his towns, carried away his arms, and put the militia in execution, contrary to his proclamation, to that trial of their innocence, which the law had directed, and to which they were born: if that were not submitted to, he should, with a good conscience, proceed against those who should presume to exercise that pretended ordinance for the militia, and the other who should keep his town of Hull from him, as he would resist persons who came to take away his life or his crown from him.

"And therefore his majesty again remembered,

"and required his city of London to obey his former commands, and not to be misled by the orations of those men, who were made desperate by their fortunes, or their fortunes by them; who told them their religion, liberty, and property, was to be preserved no other way, but by their dialoyalty to his majesty: that they were now at the brink of the river, and might draw their swords, (which was an expression used at a great convention of the city,) when nothing pursued them but their own evil consciences. He wished them to consider, whether their estates came to them, and were settled upon them, by orders of both houses, or by that law which his majesty defended: what security they could have to enjoy their own, when they had helped to rob his majesty; and what an happy conclusion that war was like to have, which was raised to oppress their sovereign: that the wealth and glory of their city was not like to be destroyed any other way, but by rebelling against his majesty; and that way inevitably it must; nor their wives and children to be exposed to violence and villainy, but by those who make their appetite and will the measure and guide to all their actions. He advised them not to fancy to themselves melancholy apprehensions, which were capable of no satisfaction; but seriously to consider what security they could have, that they had not under his majesty, or [had] been offered by him: and whether the doctrine those men taught, and would have them defend, did not destroy the foundations upon which their security was built?"

This great conflux, of men of all conditions, and qualities, and humours, could not continue long together at York, without some impatience and commotion; and most men wondered, that there appeared no provisions to be made towards a war, which they saw would be inevitable: and when the levies of soldiers under the earl of Essex were hastened with so much vigour, that the king should have no other preparation towards an army, than a single troop of guards made up of gentlemen volunteers; who, all men foresaw, would quit the troop when there should be an army: and many do yet believe, that the king too long deferred his recourse to arms; and that, if he had raised forces upon his first repulse at Hull, his service would have been very much advanced; and that the parliament would not have been able to have drawn an army together. And so they reproach the councils which were then about the king, as they were censured by many at that time: but neither they then, nor these now do understand the true reason thereof. The king had not, at that time, one barrel of powder, nor one musket, nor any other provision necessary for an army; and, which was worse, was not sure of any port, to which they might be securely assigned; nor had he money for the support of his own table for the term of one month. He expected, with impatience, the arrival of all those by the care and activity of the queen; who was then in Holland, and by the sale of her own, as well as of the crown jewels, and by the friendship of Henry prince of Orange, did all she could to provide all that was necessary; and the king had newly directed her to send all to Newcastle, which was but then secured to him by the diligence of that earl; [the earl of that name.] In the mean time, both the king himself, and they who best knew the state of his affairs, seemed to be without any thoughts of making war; and to hope, that the parliament would at last incline to some accommodation; for which both his majesty and those persons were exposed to a thousand reproaches.

The queen had many difficulties to contend with; for though the prince of Orange had a very signal affection for the king's service, and did all he could to dispose the states to concern themselves in his majesty's quarrel; yet his authority and interest was much diminished with the vigour of his body and mind: and the states of Holland were so far from being inclined to the king, that they did him all the mischief they could. They had before assisted the rebellion in Scotland, with giving them credit for arms and ammunition, before they had money to buy any; and they did afterwards, several ways, discover their affections to the parliament; which had so many spies there, that the queen could do nothing they had not present notice of; so that it was no easy matter for the queen to provide arms and ammunition, but the parliament had present notice of it, and of the ways which were thought upon to transport them to the king: and then their fleet, under the command of the earl of Warwick, lay ready to obstruct and intercept that communication; nor was any remedy in view to remove this mischief; insomuch as it was no easy thing for the king to send to, or to receive letters from, the queen.

There was a small ship of 28 or 30 guns, that was part of the fleet that waited her majesty into Holland from Dover, which was called the Providence, under the command of captain Straughan, when the fleet was commanded by sir John Pennington, and before the earl of Warwick was superinduced into that charge against the king's will. That ship, the captain whereof was known to be faithful to his majesty, was by the queen detained, and kept in Holland from the time of her majesty's arrival, under several pretences, of which the captain made use, when he afterwards received orders from the earl of Warwick, "to repair to the fleet in the Downs;" until, after many promises and excuses, it was at last discerned that he had other business and commands; and so was watched by the other ships as an enemy. This vessel the queen resolved to send to the king, principally to inform his majesty of the straits she was in; of the provisions she had made; and to return with such particular advice and directions from his majesty, that she might take further resolutions. And because the vessel was light, and drew not much water, and so could run into any creek, or open road, or harbour, and from thence easily send an express to the king; there was put into it about two hundred barrels of powder, and two or three thousand arms, with seven or eight field-pieces; which, they knew, would be very welcome to the king, and serve for a beginning and countenance to draw forces together. The captain was no sooner put to sea, but notice was sent to the commander of the fleet in the Downs; who immediately sent three or four ships to the north, which easily got the Providence in view, before it could reach that coast; and chased it with all their sails, till they saw it enter into the river of Humber; when, looking upon it as their own, they made less haste to follow it, being content to drive it before them into their own port of Hull; there being, as they thought, no other way to escape them; until they plainly saw the ship entering into a narrow creek out of the Humber, which declined Hull, and led into the country some miles above it; which was a place well known to the captain, and designed by him from the beginning. It was in vain for them then to hasten their pursuit; for they quickly found that their great ships could not enter into that passage, and that the river was too shallow to follow him; and so, with shame and anger, they gave over the chase, whilst the captain continued his course; and having never thought of saving the ship, run it on shore near Burlington; and, with all expedition, gave notice to the king of his arrival; who, immediately, caused the persons of quality in the parts adjacent to draw the trained bands of the country together, to secure the incursions from Hull; and, by this means, the arms, ammunition, and artillery were quickly brought to York.

The king was well content that it should be generally believed, that this small ship, the size whereof was known to few, had brought a greater quantity and proportion of provisions for the war, than in truth it had; and therefore, though it had brought no money, which he expected, he forthwith granted commissions, to raise regiments of horse and foot, to such persons of quality and interest, as were able to comply with their obligations. He declared the earl of Lindsey, lord high chamberlain of England, his general of the army; a person of great honour and courage, and generally beloved; who had many years before had good command in Holland and Germany, and had been admiral at sea in several expeditions. Sir Jacob Ashley was declared major general of the foot, a command he was very equal to, and had exercised before, and executed after, with great approbation. The generalship of the horse his majesty preserved for his nephew prince Rupert; who was daily expected, and arrived soon after: and all levies were hastened with as much expedition as was possible in so great a scarcity, and notorious want of money; of which no more need be said, after it is remembered that all the lords, and council about the king, with several other persons of quality, voluntarily made a subscription for the payment of so many horse for three months; in which time they would needs believe, that the war should be at an end; every one paying down what the three months' pay would amount to, into the hands of a treasurer appointed to receive it; and this money was presently paid for the making those levies of horse which were designed; and which could not have been made but by those monies.

And now the king thought it time to execute a resolution he had long intended, and which many men wondered he neglected so long; which was, as much as in him lay, to take the admiralty into his own hands. He had long too much cause to be unsatisfied and displeased with the earl of Northumberland; whom he thought he had obliged above any man whatsoever. His delivering the fleet into the hands and command of the earl of Warwick, after his majesty had expressly refused it to the parliament, he resolved never to forgive; however, he thought it not then seasonable to resent it, because he had nothing to object against him, but his compliance with the command of the parliament, which would have made and owned it as their own quarrel; and must have obliged him

[that earl] to put his whole interest into their hands, and to have run their fortune; to which he was naturally too much inclined: and then his majesty foresaw, that there would have been no fleet at all set out that year, by their having the command of all the money, which was to be applied to that service. Whereas, by his majesty's concealing his resentment, there was a good fleet made ready, and set out; and many gentlemen settled in the command of ships, of whose affection and fidelity his majesty was assured, that no superior officer could corrupt it; but that they would, at all times, repair to his service, whenever he required it. And, indeed, his majesty had an opinion of the devotion of the whole body of the common seamen to his service, because he had, bountifully, so much mended their condition, and increased their pay, that he thought they would have thrown the earl of Warwick overboard, when he should command them; and so the respiting the doing of it would be of little importance. But now, that a ship of his own, in the execution of his commands, should be chased by his own fleet as an enemy, made such a noise in all places, even to his reproach and dishonour, that he could no longer defer the doing what he had so long thought of. He resolved, therefore, to revoke the earl of Northumberland's commission of the office of high admiral of England, and to send the revocation to him under the great seal of England: then, to send sir John Pennington, who was then at York, on board the fleet, and to take the charge of it: and letters were prepared, and signed by the king, to every one of the captains; whereby they were required "to observe the orders of sir John Pennington." And all this was carried with all possible secrecy, that none, but those few who were trusted, knew, or suspected any such alteration.

But the king thought fit, first to advise with sir John Pennington; of whose integrity he was confident, and whose judgment he always principally relied on in all his maritime actions; and thought him the only person fit immediately to take the fleet out of the earl of Warwick's possession; who had dispossessed him of the command that year, which he had usually exercised. Sir John Pennington, finding the matter full of difficulty, and the execution like to meet with some interruptions, expressed no alacrity to undertake it in his own person; alleging, "that himself stood in the parliament's disfavour and jealousy, (which was true,) and that therefore his motion, and journey towards the Downs, where the fleet then lay, would be immediately taken notice of; and his majesty's design be so much guessed at, that there would need no other discovery;" but propounded to his majesty, "that he would send a letter to sir Robert Mansel, who lived at Greenwich, speedily to go to the fleet, and to take charge of it; and that his authority, being vice-admiral of England, and his known and great reputation with the seamen, would be like to meet with the least resistance." His majesty, imparting this counsel to those whom he had made privy to his purpose, entered upon new considerations; and concluded, "that sir Robert Mansel's age, (though his courage and integrity were unquestionable, and the accidents that depended upon that, would render that expedient most hazardous; and that, in truth, there needed no such absolute and supreme officer to be "appointed in the first article; but rather, that his majesty should direct his special letter to the captain of every ship, requiring him immediately to weigh anchor, and to bring away his ship to such a place as his majesty might appoint, where he should receive further orders: and to that place he might send such an officer, as he thought fit to trust with the command of the whole navy so assembled." According to this resolution the whole despatch was prepared. First, a revocation of the earl of Northumberland's commission of admiral, under the great seal of England; of which there was a duplicate; the one to be sent to his lordship; the other to the earl of Warwick; whose commission was founded upon, and so determined by, the other. Then a several letter to each of the captains of his ships, informing them "of his majesty's revocation of the admiral's patent, and consequently of the determination of the earl of Warwick's commission," (to whom his majesty likewise writ, to "inhibit him from further meddling in that charge,") and therefore commanding them to yield no further obedience to either of their orders; but that, immediately upon the receipt of those his royal letters, he should weigh anchor; and, with what speed he might, repair to Burlington-bay upon the coast of Yorkshire; where he should receive his majesty's further pleasure: and so each commander, without relation to any other commands, had no more to look after but his own ship, and his own duty, by which the king might expect, at least, so many ships as were under the government of those, who had any affection or fidelity to his service.

Accordingly, all things being prepared, and signed by the king, and sealed, what immediately concerned the earl of Northumberland was delivered to Mr. May, his majesty's page, to be given to the earl of Northumberland at London; and the whole despatch to the fleet to Mr. Edward Villiers, whose diligence and dexterity his majesty found fit for any trust; the former being directed "not to make such haste, but that the other might be at least as soon at the Downs, as he at London;" and Mr. Villiers again being appointed what letters he should first deliver to the captains; "and that he should visit the earl of Warwick in the last place;" that his activity might have no influence upon the seamen, to prevent their obedience to his majesty. And surely if this resolution had been pursued, it is very probable that the king had been master of very many of his ships again. But, when the messengers were despatched and well-instructed, and he that was for London gone on his journey, there was a sudden and unexpected change of the whole direction to the fleet, by sir John Pennington's repair to his majesty; and, upon second thoughts, offering "to go himself to the Downs, and to take charge of the fleet:" which changed the forms of the letters to the several captains; and, instead of leaving every one to use his best expedition to bring away his own ship to Burlington, "required them only to observe such orders, as they should receive by sir John Pennington;" who thought not fit (for the reasons formerly given of his being taken notice of) to go with Mr. Villiers; but, by him, writ to sir Henry Palmer, to whom likewise his majesty sent a letter to that purpose, being an officer of the navy, and who lived by the Downs, "immediately to go aboard the admiral; and [that he] himself would make all possible haste to him, setting out at the same time with Mr. Villiers; but journeying a further and more private way." Mr. Villiers, lest, by his stay for the alteration of his despatches, his companion's coming to London sooner than was expected at their parting might produce some inconvenience to the service, slept not till he came to sir Henry Palmer; who, being infirm in his health, and surprised with the command, could not make that expedition aboard, as might have been requisite; though he was loyally and zealously affected to his majesty's service. However, Mr. Villiers hastened to the ships which lay then at anchor, and, according to his instructions, delivered his several letters to the captains; the greatest part whereof received them with great expressions of duty and submission, expecting only to receive sir John Pennington's orders, for which they staid; and, without doubt, if either the first letters had been sent, or sir John Pennington been present, when these others were delivered, his majesty had been possessed of his whole fleet; the earl of Warwick being at that time, according to his usual licenses, with some officers, whose company he liked, on shore making merry; so that there was only his vice-admiral, captain Batten, on board, who was of eminent disaffection to his majesty; the rear-admiral, sir John Mennes, being of unquestionable integrity.

But after five or six hours, (in which time nothing could be acted, for want of advice and direction; enough being ready to obey, but none having authority to command,) the earl of Warwick came aboard his ship, to whom Mr. Villiers likewise gave his majesty's letters of discharge; who, without any declaration of disobeying it, applied himself to the confirming those whom he thought true to his party, and diligently to watch the rest; presuming, that he should speedily hear from those by whom he had been originally trusted.

In the mean time, the captains expected orders from sir John Pennington; who likewise privately expected such an account from sir Henry Palmer, as might encourage him to come to the ships. But this unfortunate delay lost all; for the other gentleman, according to his instructions, having reached London in the evening after the houses were risen, delivered the king's letter, and the discharge of his commission, to the earl of Northumberland; who, with all shows of duty and submission, expressed "his resolution to obey his majesty; and a hearty sorrow, that he had, by any misfortune, incurred his majesty's displeasure." How ingenuous soever this demeanour of his lordship's was, the business was quickly known to those who were more concerned in it; who were exceedingly perplexed with the apprehension of being dispossessed of so great a part of their strength, as the royal fleet; and earnestly pressed the earl of Northumberland, "that, notwithstanding such his majesty's revocation, he would still continue the execution of his office of lord high admiral; in which they would assist him with their utmost and full power and authority." But his lordship alleging, "that it would ill become him, who had received that charge from the king, with so notable circumstances of trust and favour, to continue the possession thereof against his express pleasure, there being a clause in his

"grant, that it should be only during such time as "his majesty thought fit to use his service;" and so "utterly refusing to meddle further in it;" as soon as they could get the houses together the next morning, they easily agreed to pass an ordinance, as they call it, "to appoint the earl of Warwick to be admiral of that fleet, with as full and ample authority, as he had before had from "the earl of Northumberland." Which ordinance, together with letters, and votes of encouragement to his lordship, and to the officers and seamen, they speedily sent, by a member of their own; who arrived therewith, the next morning, after Mr. Villiers had delivered the king's letters; sir John Pennington in the mean time neither coming, or sending any further advice.

The earl of Warwick, being thus armed, found himself master of his work; and immediately summoned all the captains, to attend him on board his ship in council; the which all but two did, (captain Slingsby and captain Wake,) who, being by his majesty's letters, as the rest were, expressly charged to yield no further obedience to the earl of Warwick, refused to repair to him; making themselves ready to resist any violence, and putting their ships in order to go out to sea, that they might be at liberty to attend his majesty's commands: but they were so encompassed by the whole fleet, and the dexterity of the earl's ministers was such, and the devotion, generally, of the seamen so tainted, and corrupted to the king's service, that, instead of carrying away the ships, the captains themselves were seized, taken, and carried by their own men to the earl; who immediately committed them to custody, and sent them up prisoners to the parliament. Then his lordship communicated the ordinance, letters, and votes from the two houses to the rest of the officers; of whom only two more refused to continue their charge against the signification they had received from the king, (sir John Mennes and captain Burly,) who were quickly discharged, and set on shore; and the rest, without any scruple or hesitation, "obliged themselves to obey the earl "of Warwick, in the service of the parliament;" so that the storm was now over, and the parliament fully and entirely possessed of the whole royal navy, and militia by sea; for they quickly disposed of two other honest captains, Kettleby and Stradlin, (whom they could not corrupt,) who guarded the Irish seas; and got those ships likewise into their service. And thus his majesty was without one ship of his own, in his three kingdoms, at his devotion.

As this loss of the whole navy was of unspeakable ill consequence to the king's affairs, and made his condition much the less considered by his allies, and neighbour princes; who saw the sovereignty of the sea now in other hands, who were more imperious upon the apprehension of any discourtesies, than regular and lawful monarchs used to be; I cannot but observe some unhappy circumstances and accidents in this important business of the navy, which looked like the hand of Providence to take that strength, of which his majesty was most confident, out of his hands. When the resolution of the house of commons, and, after, the concurrence of the lords, was peremptory, and the earl of Northumberland's compliance with them as obstinate, "for the sending the earl of Warwick "admiral of that fleet, in the place of sir John

"Pennington, upon whom the king depended;" it was resolved likewise, "that captain Carteret, controller of his majesty's navy, a man of great eminency and reputation in naval command, "should be vice-admiral;" he thinking it became his near relation to his majesty's service, to receive his royal pleasure, before he engaged himself in any employment of that nature, addressed himself for his princely directions. The king thought his fleet upon the matter taken from him, when another, whose disaffection to his service was very notorious, was, contrary to his express pleasure, presumptuously put into the command of it, and his own minister displaced for no other reason (his sufficiency and ability for command being by all men confessed) but his zeal, and integrity to him, and therefore he would not countenance that fleet, and that admiral, with suffering an officer of his own to command in it under the other; and so wished captain Carteret to decline the employment, which he prudently, and without noise, did; and thereupon, another officer of the navy, even the surveyor general, captain Batten, a man of very different inclinations to his master, and his service, and furious in the new fancies of religion, was substituted in the place: whereas if captain Carteret had been suffered to have taken that charge, his interest and reputation in the navy was so great, and his diligence and dexterity in command so eminent, that I verily believe, he would, against whatsoever the earl of Warwick could have done, have preserved a major part of the fleet in their duty to the king. The misfortunes which happened after, and are mentioned before, are not in justice to be imputed to sir John Pennington; who, sure, was a very honest gentleman, and of unshaken faithfulness and integrity to the king; but to the little time he had to think of it: and the perplexity he was in (besides his true zeal to the service) to think that so great a service, as the recovery of the royal navy, should be done by his personal engagement, and to look so vigilantly to his own security, that, instead of taking the fleet from the earl of Warwick, he was not himself taken by the earl, and sent to the parliament; where the carrying over the lord Digby, and some other jealousies, had left a great arrear of displeasure against him.

The truth is, the king was so confident upon the general affections of the seamen, who were a tribe of people more particularly countenanced and obliged by him than other men, his majesty having increased their allowance, in provision and money, above the old establishment of the navy, that he did believe no activity of ill officers could have corrupted them; but that, when the parliament had set out and virtualled the fleet, it would, upon any occasion, declare itself at his devotion. On the other side, they had been taught to believe, that all the king's bounty and grace towards them had flowed from the mediation of those officers, who were now engaged against the king; and that, the parliament having seized the customs, and all other the revenues of the king, they had no other hope of pay or subsistence, but by absolutely devoting themselves to their service; so that a greater or more general defection of any one order of men was never known, than that, at this time, of the seamen; though many gentlemen, and some few of the common sort, to their lasting honour and reputation, either addressed themselves to the active service of their sovereign, or suffered imprisonment, and the loss of all they had, for refusing to serve against him.

The news of this diminution of his majesty's power, and terrible addition of strength to his enemies, was a great allay to the brisk hopes at York, upon the arrival of their ammunition, and wise men easily discerned the fatal consequence of it in opposition to the most hopeful designs; yet in a very short time, all visible sense of it so much vanished, that (as there was a marvellous alacrity at that time, in despising all advantages of the parliament) men publicly, and with great confidence, averred, "that the king was a gainer by the loss of his fleet, because he had no money to pay the seamen, or keep them together; and that one victory at land, of which there was no doubt, would restore him to his dominion at sea, and to whatsoever had been unjustly taken from his majesty."

But the king found it was now time to do more than write declarations, that they [parliament] were now entirely possessed of the militia by sea, and made such a progress in the attempt to resume the same at land, that though the people generally, (except in great towns and corporations, where, besides the natural malignity, the factious lecturers and emissaries from the parliament had poisoned their affections,) and especially those of quality, were loyally inclined; yet the terror of the house of commons was so great, which sent for and grievously punished those sheriffs and mayors, who published, according to their duties and express oaths, his majesty's proclamations, and those ministers, who, according to his injunctions, read and divulged his declarations, that all such, and indeed all others eminently affected to the king, were forced to fly to York for protection, or to hide themselves in corners from that inquisition which was made for them. And therefore his majesty, in the first place, that he might have one harbour to resort to in his kingdom, sent the earl of Newcastle, privately, with a commission to take the government of Newcastle; who against the little opposition, that was prepared by the schismatical party in the town, by his lordship's great interest in those parts, the ready compliance of the best of the gentry, and the general good inclinations of the place, speedily and dexterously assured that most important rich town and harbour to the king; which, if it had been omitted but very few days, had been seized on by the parliament, who had then given direction to that purpose. Then for the protection of the general parts of the kingdom, and keeping up their affections, his majesty appointed and sent many of the nobility and prime gentlemen of the several counties, who attended him, into their [respective] counties to execute the commission of array, making the marquis of Hertford, by commission under the great seal of England, (which he was to keep secret in reserve, till he found, either by the growth, or extraordinary practice of the parliament in raising forces, that the commission of array was not enough,) "his lieutenant general of all the western parts of the kingdom, with power to levy such a body of horse and foot, as he found necessary for his majesty's service, and the containing the people within the limits of their duty." With the marquis went the earl of Bath, (thought then to be of notable power and interest in Devonshire,) the lord Pawlet, the lord Seymour, sir Ralph Hopton, sir John Berkley, sir Hugh Pollard, and other very good officers, to form an army if it should be found expedient. And so, much of the lustre of the court being abated by the remove of so many persons of honour and quality, though it was spread farther by their necessary absence, the king began to think of increasing and forming his train into a more useful posture, than it was yet; and, without any noise of raising an army, to make the scene of his first action to be the recovery of Hull (whither new forces were sent from London) by the ordinary forces and trained bands of that county; by colour whereof, he hoped to have such resort, that he should need no other industry to raise such an army as should be sufficient to preserve himself from the violence which threatened his safety; and accordingly, that the people might fully understand his intentions, he summoned some of the trained bands to attend him at Beverley, a town within four miles of Hull, whither he removed his court, and published a proclamation, briefly containing "the rebellion of sir John Hotham, in holding that town by a garrison against him; his demanding justice from the two houses without effect; the seizing his fleet at sea; and the hostile acts of sir John Hotham upon the inhabitants of that town, many of whom he turned out of their habitations; and upon the neighbour county, by imprisoning many, and driving others for fear from their houses: and therefore that he was resolved to reduce the same by force: inhibiting all commerce or traffic with the said town, whilst it continued in rebellion."

Which proclamation he likewise sent to both houses of parliament, with this further signification, "That, before he would use force to reduce that place to its due obedience, he had thought fit once more to require them, that it might be forthwith delivered to him; wherein if they should conform themselves, his majesty would be then willing to admit such addresses from them, and return such propositions to them, as might be proper to settle the peace of the kingdom, and compose the present distractions. He wished them to do their duty, and to be assured from him, on the word of a king, that nothing should be wanting on his part, that might prevent the calamities which threatened the nation, and might render his people truly happy; but if that his gracious invitation should be declined, God and all good men must judge between them:" and assigned a day, by which he would expect their answer at Beverley.

In the mean time, to encourage the good affections of Nottinghamshire, which seemed almost entirely to be devoted to his service, and to countenance and give some life to those in Lincolnshire, where, in contempt of his proclamations, the ordinance of the militia had been boldly executed by the lord Willoughby of Parham, and some members of the house of commons, his majesty took a short progress to Newark; and, after a day's stay, from thence to Lincoln; and so, by the day appointed, returned to Beverley; having, in both those places, been attended with such an appearance of the gentlemen and men of quality, and so full a concourse of the people, as one might reasonably have guessed the affections of both those counties would have seconded any just and regular service for the king.

They at London were not less active; but, upon their success in the business of the navy, proceeded to make themselves strong enough, at least, to keep what they had; and therefore, having, by their ordinance of the militia, many voluntary companies formed of men according to their own hearts; and, by their subscriptions, being supplied with a good stock of money, and a good number of horse; before the king's message from Beverley came to them, on the twelfth of July, being the same day the message went from the king, both houses voted and declared, "That an army should be forthwith raised for the safety of the king's person; defence of both houses of parliament, and of those who had obeyed their orders and commands; and preserving of the true religion, the laws, liberty, and peace of the kingdom. That the earl of Essex should be their general, and that they would live and die with him." And, having put themselves into this posture of treating, the same day they agreed that a petition should be framed, "to move the king to a good accord with the parliament, to prevent a civil war;" the which was purposely then consented to, that the people might believe, the other talk of an army and a general was only to draw the king to the more reasonable concessions. And it is certain, the first was consented to by many, especially of the house of peers, (in hope the better to compass the other,) with the perfect horror of the thought of a war. Though the king's message came to them before their own was despatched, yet, without the least notice taken of it, and lest the contents of their petition might be known before the arrival of their own messengers, the earl of Holland, sir John Holland, and sir Philip Stapleton, being the committee appointed for the same, made a speedy and quick journey to Beverley; and arrived in the same minute that the king came thither from Lincoln: so that his majesty no sooner heard of the raising an army, and declaring a general against him, but he was encountered by the messengers for peace; who reported to all whom they met, and with whom they conversed, "that they had brought so absolute a submission from the parliament to the king, that there could be no doubt of a firm and happy peace:" and when the earl of Holland presented the petition, he first made a short speech to the king, telling him, "that the glorious motto of his blessed father, king James, was Beati pacifici, which he hoped his majesty would continue; that they presented him with the humble duty of his two houses of parliament, who desired nothing from him but his consent, and acceptance of peace; they aiming at nothing but his majesty's honour and happiness:" and then read their message aloud, in these words:

To the king's most excellent majesty, the humble petition of the lords and commons assembled in parliament.

"May it please your majesty:

"Although we, your majesty's most humble and faithful subjects, the lords and commons in parliament assembled, have been very unhappy in many former petitions and supplications to your majesty; wherein we have represented our most dutiful affections in advising and desiring those things, which we held most necessary for the preservation of God's true religion, your majesty's safety and honour, and the peace of the kingdom:

"and, with much sorrow, do perceive that your majesty, incensed by many false calumnies and slanders, doth continue to raise forces against us, and your other peaceable and loyal subjects; and to make great preparations for war, both in the kingdom, and from beyond the seas; and, by arms and violence, to overrule the judgment and advice of your great council; and by force to determine the questions there depending, concerning the government and liberty of the kingdom: yet, such is our earnest desire of discharging our duty to your majesty and the kingdom, to preserve the peace thereof, and to prevent the miseries of civil war amongst your subjects, that, notwithstanding we hold ourselves bound to use all the means and power, which, by the laws and constitutions of this kingdom, we are trusted with for defence and protection thereof, and of the subjects from force and violence, we do, in this our humble and loyal petition, prostrate ourselves at your majesty's feet; beseeching your royal majesty, that you will be pleased to forbear and remove all preparations and actions of war; particularly the forces from about Hull, from Newcastle, Tinnmouth, Lincoln, and Lincolnshire, and all other places. And that your majesty will recall the commissions of array, which are illegal; dismiss troops, and extraordinary guards by you raised: that your majesty will come nearer to your parliament, and hearken to their faithful advice and humble petitions; which shall only tend to the defence and advancement of religion, your own royal honour and safety, the preservation of our laws and liberties. And we have been, and ever shall be, careful to prevent and punish all tumults, and seditious actions, speeches, and writings, which may give your majesty just cause of distaste, or apprehension of danger. From which public aims and resolutions no sinister or private respect shall ever make us to decline. That your majesty will leave delinquents to the due course of justice; and that nothing done or spoken in parliament, or by any person in pursuance of the command and direction of both houses of parliament, be questioned any where but in parliament.

"And we, for our parts, shall be ready to lay down all those preparations, which we have been forced to make for our defence. And for the town of Hull, and the ordinance concerning the militia, as we have, in both these particulars, only sought the preservation of the peace of the kingdom, and the defence of the parliament from force and violence; so we shall most willingly leave the town of Hull in the state it was, before sir John Hotham drew any forces into it; delivering your majesty's magazine into the tower of London, and supplying whatsoever hath been disposed by us for the service of the kingdom. We shall be ready to settle the militia by a bill, in such a way as shall be honourable and safe for your majesty, most agreeable to the duty of parliament, and effectual for the good of the kingdom; that the strength thereof be not employed against itself, and that which ought to be for our security, applied to our destruction; and desire still to preserve the protestant religion, that the parliament, and those who profess and both in this realm and in Ireland, may not be left naked, and indefensible to the mischievous

" designs and cruel attempts of those, who are the " professed and confederated enemies thereof in " your majesty's dominions, and other neighbour
 " nations. To which if your majesty's courses and " counsels shall from henceforth concur, we doubt " not but we shall quickly make it appear to the " world, by the most eminent effects of love and " duty, that your majesty's personal safety, your
 " royal honour and greatness, are much dearer
 " to us than our own lives and fortunes, which we " do most heartily dedicate, and shall most will" ingly employ for the support and maintenance
 " thereof."

As soon as this petition was read by the earl of Holland, the king told them, " that the reproaches
 " cast upon him by it were not answerable to the " expressions his lordship had made; and that he " was sorry that they thought the exposing him " and his honour to so much scandal, was the way
 " to procure or preserve the peace of the kingdom:
 " that they should speedily receive his answer;
 " by which the world would easily discern who
 " desired peace most." And accordingly, the second day, his majesty delivered them, in public, his answer to their petition, which was likewise read by one of his servants, in these words:

His majesty's answer to the petition of the lords and commons assembled in parliament.

" Though his majesty had too great reason to " believe that the directions sent to the earl of " Warwick, to go to the river Humber, with as " many ships as he should think fit, for all possible
 " assistance to sir John Hotham, (whilst his ma" jesty expected the giving up of the town unto " him,) and to carry away such arms from thence,
 " as his discretion thought fit to spare out of his " majesty's own magazine; the choosing a general
 " by both houses of parliament, for the defence of " those who have obeyed their orders and com" mands, be they never so extravagant and illegal;
 " their declaration, that, in that case, they would
 " live and die with the earl of Essex their general;
 " (all which were voted the same day with this peti" tion;) and the committing the lord mayor of " London to prison, for executing his majesty's " writs and lawful commands; were but ill pro" logues to a petition, which might compose the " miserable distractions of the kingdom; yet his " majesty's passionate desire of the peace of the " kingdom, together with the preface of the pre" senters, That they had brought a petition full of " duty and submission to his majesty; and which
 " desired nothing of him but his consent to peace,
 " (which his majesty conceived to be the language " of both houses too,) begot a greedy hope and
 " expectation in him, that this petition would have " been such an introduction to peace, that it would
 " at least have satisfied his message of the eleventh
 " of this month, by delivering up Hull unto his " majesty. But, to his unspeakable grief, his ma" jesty hath too much cause to believe, that the " end of some persons, by this petition, is not in " truth to give any real satisfaction to his majesty;
 " but, by the specious pretences of making offers
 " to him, to mislead and seduce his people, and " lay some imputation upon him, of denying what is " fit to be granted; otherwise, it would not have " thrown those unjust reproaches and scandals
 " upon his majesty, for making necessary and just

" defence for his own safety; and so peremptorily
 " justified such actions against him, as by no rule " of law or justice can admit the least colour of " defence: and, after so many free and unlimited
 " acts of grace passed by his majesty without any " condition, have proposed such things which, in " justice, cannot be denied unto him, upon such " conditions as, in honour, he cannot grant. How" ever, that all the world may see how willing
 " his majesty would be to embrace any overture,
 " that might beget a right understanding between " him and his two houses of parliament, (with " whom, he is sure, he shall have no contention,
 " when the private practices and subtle insinuations
 " of some few malignant persons shall be dis" covered, which his majesty will take care shall " be speedily done,) he hath, with great care,
 " weighed the particulars of this petition, and re" turns this answer:

" That the petitioners were never unhappy in " their petitions or supplications to his majesty,
 " while they desired any thing which was necessary
 " or convenient for the preservation of God's true " religion, his majesty's safety and honour, and the " peace of the kingdom: and therefore, when those
 " general envious foundations are laid, his majesty
 " could wish some particular instances had been " applied. Let envy and malice object one par" ticular proposition for the preservation of God's " true religion which his majesty hath refused to " consent to; what himself hath often made for " the ease of tender consciences, and for the ad" vancement of the protestant religion, is notorious
 " by many of his messages and declarations. What " regard hath been to his honour and safety, when
 " he hath been driven from some of his houses,
 " and kept from other of his towns by force; and
 " what care there hath been of the peace of the " kingdom, when endeavour hath been used to put " all his subjects in arms against him, is so evident,
 " that, his majesty is confident, he cannot suffer
 " by those general imputations. It is enough that " the world knows what he hath granted, and " what he hath denied.

" For his majesty's raising forces, and making " preparations for war, (whatsoever the petitioners,
 " by the evil arts of the enemies to his majesty's " person and government, and by the calumnies
 " and slanders raised against his majesty by them,
 " are induced to believe,) all men may know what " is done that way is but in order to his own de" fence. Let the petitioners remember, that (which " all the world knows) his majesty was driven from
 " his palace of Whitehall for safety of his life:
 " that both houses of parliament, upon their own " authority, raised a guard to themselves, (having " gotten the command of all the trained bands of " London to that purpose,) without the least colour
 " or shadow of danger: that they usurped a power,
 " by their pretended ordinance, against all prin" ciples and elements of law, over the whole militia
 " of the kingdom, without and against his majesty's
 " consent: that they took possession of his town,
 " fort, and magazine of Hull, and committed the " same to sir John Hotham; who shut the gates
 " against his majesty, and, by force of arms, denied " entrance thither to his own person: that they " justified this act which they had not directed,
 " and took sir John Hotham into their protection
 " for whatsoever he had done, or should do, against " his majesty: and all this, whilst his majesty had

"no other attendance than his own menial servants. Upon this, the duty and affection of this county prompted his subjects here to provide a small guard for his own person; which was no sooner done, but a vote suddenly passed of his majesty's intention to levy war against his parliament, (which, God knows, his heart abhorreth;) and, notwithstanding all his majesty's professions, declarations, and protestations to the contrary, seconded by the clear testimony of so great a number of peers upon the place, propositions and orders for levies of men, horse, and arms, were sent throughout the kingdom; plate and money brought in and received, horse and men raised towards an army, mustered, and under command; and all this contrary to the law, and to his majesty's proclamation: and a declaration published, that if he should use force for the recovery of Hull, or suppressing the pretended ordinance for the militia, it should be held levying war against the parliament: and all this done, before his majesty granted any commission for the levying or raising a man. His majesty's ships were taken from him, and committed to the custody of the earl of Warwick; who presumes, under that power, to usurp to himself the sovereignty of the sea, to chase, fright, and imprison such of his majesty's good subjects, as desire to obey his lawful commands; although he had notice of the legal revocation of the earl of Northumberland's commission of admiral, whereby all power derived from that commission ceased.

"Let all the world now judge who began this war, and upon whose account the miseries, which may follow, must be cast; what his majesty could have done less than he hath done; and whether he were not compelled to make provision both for the defence of himself, and recovery of what is so violently and injuriously taken from him; and whether these injuries and indignities are not just grounds for his majesty's fears and apprehensions of further mischief and danger to him. Whence the fears and jealousies of the petitioners have proceeded, hath never been discovered; the dangers they have brought upon his subjects are too evident; what those are they have prevented, no man knows. And therefore his majesty cannot but look upon that charge as the boldest, and the most scandalous, hath been yet laid upon him; That this necessary provision, made for his own safety and defence, is to overrule the judgment and advice of his great council; and by force to determine the questions there depending, concerning the government and liberty of the kingdom. If no other force had been raised to determine those questions, than by his majesty, this unhappy misunderstanding had not been: and his majesty no longer desires the blessing and protection of Almighty God upon himself and his posterity, than he and they shall solemnly observe the due execution of the laws, in the defence of parliaments, and the just freedom thereof.

"For the forces about Hull, his majesty will remove them, when he hath obtained the end for which they were brought thither. When Hull shall be reduced again to his subjection, he will no longer have an army before it. And when he shall be assured, that the same necessity and pretence of public good, which took

"Hull from him, may not put a garrison into Newcastle to keep the same against him, he will remove his from thence, and from Tinnmouth; till when, the example of Hull will not out of his memory.

"For the commissions of array, which are legal, and are so proved by a declaration now in the press, his majesty wonders why they should, at this time, be thought grievous, and fit to be recalled: if the fears of invasion and rebellion be so great, that, by an illegal, pretended ordinance, it is necessary to put his subjects into a posture of defence, to array, train, and muster them, he knows not why the same should not be done in a regular, known, lawful way. But if, in the execution of that commission, any thing shall be unlawfully imposed upon his good subjects, his majesty will take all just and necessary care for their redress.

"For his majesty's coming nearer to his parliament, his majesty hath expressed himself so fully in his several messages, answers, and declarations, and so particularly avowed a real fear of his safety, upon such instances as cannot be answered, that he hath reason to take himself somewhat neglected, that, since upon so manifest reasons it is not safe for his majesty to come to them, both his houses of parliament will not come nearer to his majesty, or to such a place where the freedom and dignity of parliament might be preserved. However, his majesty shall be very glad to hear of some such example in their punishing the tumults (which he knows not how to expect, when they have declared that they knew not of any tumults; though the house of peers desired, both for the freedom and dignity of parliament, that the house of commons would join with them in a declaration against tumults; which they refused, that is, neglected to do,) and other seditious actions, speeches, and writings, as may take that apprehension of danger from him; though, when he remembers the particular complaints himself hath made of businesses of that nature, and that, instead of inquiring out the authors, neglect of examination hath been, when offer hath been made to both houses to produce the authors; as in that treasonable paper concerning the militia: and when he sees every day pamphlets published against his crown, and against monarchy itself; as the observations upon his late messages, declarations, and expresses; and some declarations of their own, which give too great encouragement, in that argument, to ill-affected persons; his majesty cannot, with confidence, entertain those hopes which would be most welcome to him.

"For the leaving delinquents to the due course of justice, his majesty is most assured he hath been no shelter to any such. If the tediousness and delay in prosecution, the vast charge in officers' fees, the keeping men under a general accusation, without trial, a whole year and more, and so allowing them no way for their defence and vindication, have frightened men away from so chargeable and uncertain attendance, the remedy is best provided where the disease grew. If the law be the measure of delinquency, none such are within his majesty's protection: but if by delinquents such are understood, who are made so by vote, without any trespass upon any known or established law: if by delinquents those

" nine lords are understood, who are made delinquents for obeying his majesty's summons to come to him, after their stay there was neither safe nor honourable, by reason of the tumults, and other violences; and whose impeachment, he is confident, is the greatest breach of privilege, that, before this parliament, was ever offered to the house of peers: if by delinquents such are understood, who refuse to submit to the pretended ordinance of the militia; to that of the navy; or to any other, which his majesty hath not consented to; such who for the peace of the kingdom, in an humble manner, prepare petitions to him, or to both houses, as his good subjects of London and Kent did; whilst seditious ones, as that of Essex, and other places, are allowed and cherished: if by delinquents such are understood, who are called so for publishing his proclamations, as the lord mayor of London; or for reading his messages and declarations, as divers ministers about London and elsewhere; when those against him are dispersed with all care and industry, to poison and corrupt the loyalty and affection of his people: if by delinquents such are understood, who have, or shall lend his majesty money, in the universities, or in any other places; his majesty declares to all the world, that he will protect such with his utmost power and strength; and directs, that, in these cases, they submit not to any messengers, or warrant; it being no less his duty to protect those who are innocent, than to bring the guilty to condign punishment; of both which the law is to be judge. And if both houses do think fit to make a general, and to raise an army for defence of those who obey their orders and commands, his majesty must not sit still, and suffer such who submit to his just power, and are solicitous for the laws of the land, to perish and be undone, because they are called delinquents. And when they shall take upon them to dispense with the attendance of those who are called by his majesty's writ, whilst they send them to sea, to rob his majesty of his ships; or into the several counties, to put his subjects in arms against him; his majesty (who only hath it) will not lose the power to dispense with them to attend his own person; or to execute such offices, as are necessary for the preservation of himself and the kingdom; but must protect them, though they are called delinquents.

" For the manner of the proceeding against delinquents, his majesty will proceed against those who have no privilege of parliament, or in such cases where no privilege is to be allowed, as he shall be advised by his learned council, and according to the known and unquestionable rules of the law; it being unreasonable, that he should be compelled to proceed against those who have violated the known and undoubted law, only before them who have directed such violation.

" Having said thus much to the particulars of the petition, though his majesty hath reason to complain, that, since the sending this petition, they have beaten their drums for soldiers against him; armed their own general with a power destructive to the law, and liberty of the subjects; and chosen a general of their horse; his majesty, out of his princely love, tenderness, and compassion of his people, and desire to preserve the " peace of the kingdom, that the whole force and strength of it may be united for the defence of itself, and the relief of Ireland, (in whose behalf he conjures both his houses of parliament, as they will answer the contrary to Almighty God, his majesty, to those who trust them, and to that bleeding, miserable kingdom, that they suffer not any monies, granted and collected by act of parliament, to be diverted or employed against his majesty; whilst his soldiers in that kingdom are ready to mutiny, or perish for want of pay; and the barbarous rebels prevail by that encouragement,) is graciously pleased once more to propose and require,

" That his town of Hull be immediately delivered up to him; which being done, (though his majesty hath been provoked by unheard of insolences of sir John Hotham's, since his burning and drowning the country, in seizing his wine, and other provisions for his house, and scornfully using his servant, whom he sent to require them; saying, it came to him by Providence, and he will keep it; and so refusing to deliver it, with threats if he, or any other of his fellow-servants, should again repair to Hull about it; and in taking and detaining prisoners, divers gentlemen, and others, in their passage over the Humber into Lincolnshire about their necessary occasions; and such other indignities, as all gentlemen must resent in his majesty's behalf,) his majesty, to shew his earnest desire of peace, for which he will dispense with his own honour, and how far he is from desire of revenge, will grant a free and general pardon to all persons within that town.

" That his majesty's magazine, taken from Hull, be forthwith put into such hands, as he shall appoint.

" That his navy be forthwith delivered into such hands, as he hath directed for the government thereof: the detaining thereof after his majesty's directions, published and received, to the contrary; and employing his ships against him in such manner as they are now used, being notorious high treason in the commanders of those ships.

" That all arms, levies, and provisions for a war, made by the consent of both houses, (by whose example his majesty hath been forced to make some preparations,) be immediately laid down; and the pretended ordinance for the militia, and all power of imposing laws upon the subject without his majesty's consent, be disavowed; without which, the same pretence will remain to produce the same mischief. All which his majesty may as lawfully demand as to live, and can with no more justice be denied him, than his life may be taken from him.

" These being done, and the parliament adjourned to a safe and secure place, his majesty promises, in the presence of God, and binds himself by all his confidence and assurance in the affection of his people, that he will instantly, and most cheerfully, lay down all the force he shall have raised, and discharge all his future and intended levies; that there may be a general face of peace over the whole kingdom; and will repair to them: and desires, that all differences may be freely debated in a parliamentary way; whereby the law may recover its due reverence, the subject his just liberty, and parliaments

"themselves their full vigour and estimation ;
 "and so the whole kingdom a blessed peace,
 "quiet, and prosperity.

"If these propositions shall be rejected, his majesty doubts not of the protection and assistance of Almighty God, and the ready concurrence of his good subjects ; who can have no hope left them of enjoying their own long, if their king may be oppressed and spoiled, and must be remediless. And though his towns, his ships, his arms, and his money, be gotten, and taken from him, he hath a good cause left, and the hearts of his people ; which, with God's blessing, he doubts not, will recover all the rest.

"Lastly, if the preservation of the protestant religion, the defence of the liberty and law of the kingdom, the dignity and freedom of parliament, and the recovery and the relief of bleeding and miserable Ireland, be equally precious to the petitioners, as they are to his majesty, (who will have no quarrel but in defence of these,) there will be a cheerful and speedy consent to what his majesty hath now proposed and desired : and of this his majesty expects a full and positive answer by Wednesday the 27th of this instant July ; till when he shall not make any attempt of force upon Hull, hoping in the affection, duty, and loyalty of the petitioners : and, in the mean time, expects that no supply of men be put into Hull, or any of his majesty's goods taken from thence."

The whole court, upon the hearing that petition from the two houses read, expressed a marvellous indignation at the intolerable indignities offered to the king by it ; and seemed no better satisfied with the messengers ; who had professed, that they brought an absolute submission to his majesty ; when, in truth, what they brought appeared to be a full justification of whatsoever they had done before, and an implied threat of doing worse, and fixing all the scandals upon his majesty, which they had scattered abroad before : insomuch as all men expected and believed his majesty to be engaged, for the vindication of his princely dignity and honour, to return a much sharper answer to them than he had ever sent. So that, when this which is before set down (and which had before been consented to, and approved in the full assembly of the peers and counsellors) was read publicly, it was generally thought, that the king had not enough resented the insolence and usurpation of the parliament, or appeared sensible enough of the provocations : yet the thought of a war, which wise men saw actually levied upon the king already, was so much abhorred, and men were so credulous of every expedient which was pretended for peace, that by the next morning (the answer being delivered in the evening) these active messengers for the parliament persuaded many "that the king's answer was too sharp, and "would provoke the houses, who were naturally "passionate, to proceed in the high ways they were "in ; whereas, if the king would abate that severity "of language, and would yet take off the preamble "of his answer, they were confident, and the earl "of Holland privately offered to undertake, that "satisfaction should be given to all that his majesty proposed." And, by this means, some were so far wrought upon, as they earnestly importuned the king, "that he would take his answer, "which he had publicly delivered the night before, from the messengers ; and, instead thereof, "return the sum matter of his own propositions "only, in the most soft and gentle language ; "without the preamble, or any mention of their unjustifiable and unreasonable demeanour towards "him."

But his majesty replied, "that he had for a long time, even after great provocations, and their first general remonstrance to the people, treated with all imaginable compliance and lenity of words with them ; and discovered their unjustifiable and most extravagant proceedings with and against him, and the consequences that would inevitably attend their progress in them, with such tender expressions, as if he believed whatever was amiss to proceed from misinformation only, and unskilful mistakes : that this gentleness and regard of his was so far from operating upon them, that their insolence and irregularities increased ; and it might be from that reason, [that] their messages and declarations were written in so high a dialect, and with that sovereignty of language, as if he were subject to their jurisdiction ; and he did not know but it might have some influence upon his people to his disadvantage, that is, raise terror towards them, and lessen their reverence towards his majesty, when all their petitions and propositions were more imperative than his just and necessary refusals : which condescension his majesty had brought himself to, in hope, that his example, and their natural shame, would have reformed that new license of words : that this last address, under the name of a petition, (a few days after they had violently ravished his whole fleet from him ; and prepared the same day, that they had chosen a general, to whom they had sworn allegiance, to lead an army against him,) contained a peremptory justification of whatsoever they had done, and as peremptory a threatening of whatsoever they could do : and therefore, if he should now retract his answer, which had been solemnly considered in council, before all the peers, and which in truth implied rather a princely resentment of the indignities offered to him, than flowed with any sharp or bitter expressions, he should, by such yielding, give encouragement to new attempts ; and could not but much discourage those, upon whose affections and loyalty he was principally to depend ; who could not think it safe to raise themselves to an indignation on his behalf, when he expressed so tender or so little sense of his own sufferings : besides, that he was then upon an avowed hostile enterprise for the reduction of Hull ; towards which he was to use all possible means to draw a force together, equal to that design ; and by such a retraction as this proposed, and a seeming declension of his spirit, and depending upon their good natures, who had done all this mischief, he should not only be inevitably disappointed of the resort of new strength, but, probably, deserted by those few whom he had brought together : that he could not reasonably or excusably depend upon the undertaking of the earl of Holland ; who had so grossly deceived him in other undertakings, which were immediately in his own power to have performed : whereas neither he, or either of the other two gentlemen, who were joined with him in this employment, had so much interest with the active and prevailing party,

"as to know more of their intentions than was at present necessary to be discovered for their concurrence.

"He said, that he had never yet consented to any one particular, since the beginning of this parliament, by which he had received prejudice, at the doing whereof he had not the solemn undertakings and promises of those, who were much abler to justify their undertakings than the earl of Holland; and upon whom he only depended, that it should be no disservice to him, and would be an infallible means to compass all that his majesty reasonably desired: but he had always found those promisers and undertakers, though they could eminently carry on any counsel, or conclusion, that was against law, justice, or his right, had never power to reduce or restrain those agitations within any bounds of sobriety and moderation: and when they found that many would not be guided by them, that they might seem still to lead, themselves as furiously followed the other; and resorted again to his majesty with some new expedient, as destructive as the former. So that he was henceforward resolved to rely upon God Almighty, and not so much to depend upon what might possibly prevail upon the affections of those, from whom, reasonably, he could not expect any good, as upon such plain and avowed courses, as, let the success be what it would, must, to all judging men, appear to be prudently and honourably to be relied on: and therefore he positively refused to make the least alteration in his answer." And so the messengers departed, leaving the court and country worse affected than they found it; and branding some particular persons, whom they found less inclined to be ruled by their professions and promises, "as the authors of a civil war:" and making them as odious as they could, wherever they came.

And sure, from that time, the earl of Holland was more transported from his natural temper and gentleness of disposition, into passion and animosity against the king and his ministers; and, having been nothing pleased with his own condition at London, finding the earl of Essex (whom he did not secretly love, and indeed contemned) to draw all men's eyes towards him, and to have the greatest interest in their hearts, he had seriously intended, under colour of this message to the king, to discover if there were any sparks yet left in his royal breast, which might be kindled into affection or acceptance of his service; and hoped, if he could get any credit, to redeem his former trespasses: but when he found his majesty not only cold towards him, but easily enough discerned, by his reception, that all former inclinations were dead, and more than ordinary prejudices grown up towards him in their places, and that his advices were rejected, he returned with rancour equal to the most furious he went to; and heartily joined and concurred towards the suppressing that power, in the administration whereof he was not like to bear any part.

His majesty having, by his answer, obliged himself not to make any forcible attempt upon Hull till the 27th of July, by which time he might reasonably expect an answer to his propositions, in the mean time resolved to make some short progress into the neighbour counties; and accordingly, the same day the messengers departed, the king went to Doncaster; and the next day to Nottingham; and so to Leicester; where he heard the earl of Stamford, and some other parliament men, were executing the ordinance of the militia: but, before his majesty came thither, they removed themselves to Northampton; a town so true to them, as, if they had been pursued, would have shut their gates against the king himself, as Hull had done.

At Leicester the king was received with great expressions of duty and loyalty, by the appearance of the trained bands, and full acclamations of the people; yet there were two accidents that happened there, which, if they be at all remembered, will manifest, that if the king were loved there as he ought to be, that the parliament was more feared than he. It happened to be at the time of the general assizes, and justice Reeve (a man of a good reputation for learning and integrity; and who, in good times, would have been a good judge) sat there as judge; and Mr. Henry Hastings, younger son to the earl of Huntingdon, was purposely made high sheriff, to contain the county within the limits of their duty by the power of that office, as well as by the interest and relation of his family. The earl of Stamford, and his assistants, had departed the town but few hours before his majesty's entrance, and had left their magazine, which was indeed the magazine of the county, in a little storehouse at the end of the town, guarded by some inferior officers, whom they had brought down to train and exercise the militia, and other zealous and devoted men of the county, in all to the number of about twenty-five, who had barricadoed the door of the house; and professed "to keep it against all demanders;" having provisions within it of all sorts. The king was very unwilling (coming in so peaceable a manner, at so peaceable a time) to take any notice of it. On the other hand, it was an act of too great insolence to be suffered; and, upon the matter, to leave a garrison of the rebels in possession of the town; and therefore he sent word to the judge, "that if he took not some legal way to remove such a force so near his majesty, his majesty would do it in an extraordinary course;" which, upon the sudden, would have puzzled him to have done; having neither soldier, cannon, or powder to effect it; the want of which as much troubled the sheriff. In the end, the gentlemen of the county, who had not yet otherwise declared themselves on either side, than by waiting on his majesty, finding that the king would not go from the town till that nuisance was removed; and that it might bring inconveniences, charge, and mischief to the county of a high nature; so prevailed, that, as his majesty was contented to take no notice of it, so they within the house, in the night, upon assurance of safety and liberty to go whither they would, removed and left the house; and so that matter was quieted.

The other [accident] was, or was like to have proved, more ridiculous: Some of the king's servants, hearing that the earl of Stamford, and the other militia men, were newly gone out of the town, had of themselves, coming thither before the king, galloped after them; intending to have apprehended them, and brought them before the king; and, though the other were too fleet for them, had, in the way, overtaken Dr. Bastwick, a man well known, who had been a principal officer with them at Leicester, and fled at the same time, but could not keep pace with his commanders: him they brought to the town, where, by the sheriff, he was committed to prison; having confessed enough treason, and justifying it, as would have justly hanged any subject. The king thought once to have had him indicted then at the assizes, upon the plain statute of 25 Edw. III. But the judge besought his majesty not to put a matter of so great moment, upon which the power of the two houses of parliament, and a parliament sitting, must be determined, before one single judge, whose reputation was not enough to bear so great a burden: however, he declared his own opinion fully to his majesty, "that it was treason; which, he believed, all the other judges must acknowledge; and, being convened together by his majesty to that purpose, he thought a joint declaration and resolution of all together might be of great use to the king; whereas the publishing of his particular opinion could only destroy himself, and nothing advance his majesty's service: besides, he had no reason to be so confident of the country, as to conclude, that a jury, then suddenly summoned, would have courage to find the bill; and then their not doing it, if it were attempted, would prove a greater countenance to the ordinance, than the vote of the two houses had yet given it." This last reason gave his majesty greater satisfaction; so that he was contented that the fellow should be kept in prison, and the trial be deferred, till he could conveniently summon more judges to be present.

His majesty was no sooner persuaded to be content that this prosecution might be suspended, but the close agents for the parliament's service, who were not yet discovered, but appeared very entire to the king, so dexterously carried themselves, that they prevailed with those gentlemen of the country, whose zeal to his majesty was most eminent and unquestionable, and even with the judge himself, "to wish, that his majesty would freely and graciously discharge the doctor of his imprisonment; or give the judge leave to do so upon a habeas corpus;" which he was advised to require: "and that it would be such an act of mercy and singular justice, that would not only work upon the people of that county to his majesty's advantage, but must have a great influence upon the whole kingdom, and even upon the parliament itself." And with this strange desire the good judge, and those principal gentlemen, confidently came to the king, the night before he intended to return northward. His majesty told them, "he would think of it till the next morning." And, in the mean time, concluding by what he heard, that though he should refuse to discharge him, or to consent that he should be discharged, his restraint would not be long in that place after his departure, the people already resorting to him with great license, and the doctor, according to his nature, talking seditiously and loudly, he directed "a messenger of the chamber very early, with such assistance as the sheriff should give him, to carry him away to Nottingham; and, by the help of that sheriff, to the gaol at York:" which was executed accordingly with expedition and secrecy; if either of which had been absent, it is certain the common people had rescued him; which, of how trivial a moment soever it shall be thought, I could not but mention as an instance of the spirit and temper of that time, and the great disadvantage the king was upon, that so many very good men thought fit, at a time, when very many hundreds of persons of honour and quality were imprisoned with all strictness and severity by the parliament, upon the bare suspicion that they meant to go to the king, or that they wished well to him, or for not submitting to some illegal order or command of theirs, that the king should discharge an infamous person, taken in an act of high treason, and who more frankly and avowedly professed sedition, than he did the science of which he pretended to be doctor.

The king, according to his appointment, returned towards Hull, in expectation of an answer from the parliament; which came two days after the appointed day, but with no solemnity of messengers, or other ceremony, than inclosed to one of the secretaries to be presented to the king, in which they told him,

"That they could not, for the present, with the discharge of the trust reposed in them for the safety of the king and kingdom, yield to those demands of his majesty. The reason why they took into their custody the town of Hull, the magazine, and navy; passed the ordinance of the militia; and made preparation of arms; was for security of religion, the safety of his majesty's person, of the kingdom, and parliament; all which they did see in evident and imminent danger; from which when they should be secured, and that the forces of the kingdom should not be used to the destruction thereof, they should then be ready to withdraw the garrison out of Hull, to deliver the magazine and navy, and settle the militia, by bill, in such a way as should be honourable and safe for his majesty, most agreeable to the duty of parliament, and effectual for the good of the kingdom; as they had professed in their late petition. And for adjourning the parliament, they apprehended no reason for his majesty to require it, nor security for themselves to consent to it. And as for that reason which his majesty was pleased to express, they doubted not but the usual place would be as safe for his royal person, as any other; considering the full assurance they had of the loyalty and fidelity of the city of London to his majesty; and the care which his parliament would ever have to prevent any danger, which his majesty might justly apprehend; besides the manifold conveniences to be had there, beyond other parts of the kingdom. And as for the laying down of arms; when the causes which moved them to provide for the defence of his majesty, the kingdom, and parliament, should be taken away, they should very willingly and cheerfully forbear any further preparations, and lay down their force already raised."

Which replication, as they called it, to his majesty's answer, they ordered "to be printed, and read in all churches and chapels within the kingdom of England, and dominion of Wales."

And so the war was now denounced by their express words against his majesty, as it had been long before in their actions; and both parties seemed to give over all thoughts of further treaties and overtures; and each prepared to make himself considerable by the strength and power of such forces as they could draw together.

In London they intended nothing but the forming of their army, and such other things of power, as [were] in order thereunto. To that purpose, the bill for the payment of tonnage and poundage being expired on the first day of July, and they having sent another of the same nature to the king for his consent, for six months longer, his majesty, since he saw that, and all other money properly belonging to him, violently taken from him, and employed by them against him, refused to give his royal assent thereunto: whereupon, without the least hesitation, (albeit it had been enacted this very parliament, "that whosoever should presume "to pay or receive that duty, after the expiration "of the act, before the same was regrantd by his "majesty with the consent of the lords and commons, should be in a premunire;" which is the heaviest punishment inflicted by law, but the loss of life,) they appointed and ordered by the power of the two houses, (which they called an ordinance of parliament,) "that the same duty should be "continued; and declared, that they would save "all persons concerned from any penalty or "punishment whatsoever:" by which, they now became possessed of the customs in their own right.

Towards such as any ways (though under the obligation of oaths or offices) opposed or discountenanced what they went about, they proceeded with the most extravagant severity that had been ever heard of; of which I shall only mention two instances; the first, of the lord mayor of London, sir Richard Gurney, a citizen of great wealth, reputation, and integrity; whom the lords had, upon the complaint of the house of commons, before their sending the last petition to the king, (of which his majesty gave them a touch in his answer,) committed to the tower of London; for causing the king's proclamation against the militia, by virtue of his majesty's writ to him directed, and according to the known duty of his place, to be publicly proclaimed. And shortly after, that they might have a man more compliant with their designs to govern the city, notwithstanding that he insisted upon his innocence, and made it appear that he was obliged by the laws of the land, the customs of the city, and the constitution of his office and his oath, to do whatsoever he had done; he was by their lordships, in the presence of the commons, adjudged "to be put out of his office of lord mayor of London; "to be utterly incapable of bearing office in city "or kingdom, and incapable of all honour or dignity; and to be imprisoned during the pleasure "of the two houses of parliament." And, upon this sentence, alderman Pennington, so often before mentioned, was, by the noise and clamour of the common people, against the customs and rules of election, made mayor, and accordingly installed; and the true, old, worthy mayor committed to the tower of London; where he hath with notable courage and constancy continued to this present.

The other instance I think fit to mention is that of judge Mallet; who, as is before remembered, was committed to the tower the last Lent, for having seen a petition prepared by the grand jury of Kent, for the countenance of the Book of Common Prayer, and against the imposition of the militia by ordinance without the royal assent. This judge (being, this summer circuit, again judge of assize for those counties) sitting at Maidstone upon the great assize, some members of the house of commons, under the style and title of a committee of parliament, came to the bench; and, producing some votes, and orders, and declarations of one or both houses, "required him, in the name of the "parliament, to cause those papers" (being on the behalf of the ordinance of the militia, and against the commission of array) "to be read." He told them, "that he sat there by virtue of his majesty's "commissions; and that he was authorized to do "any thing comprised in those commissions; but "he had no authority to do any thing else; and "therefore, there being no mention, in either of "his commissions, of those papers, or the publishing any thing of that nature, he could not, nor "would do it;" and so (finding less respect and submission than they expected, both to their persons and their business, from the learned judge, and that the whole county, at least the prime gentlemen and the grand jury, which [represented] the county, contemned both much more) this committee returned to the house with great exclamations against Mr. Justice Mallet, "as the fomentor "and protector of a malignant faction against the "parliament." And, upon this charge, a troop of horse was sent to attend an officer; who came with a warrant from the houses, or some committee, (whereas justice Mallet, being an assistant of the house of peers, could not regularly be summoned by any other authority,) to Kingston in Surrey, where the judge was keeping the general assizes for that county; and, to the unspeakable dishonour of the public justice of the kingdom, and the scandal of all ministers or lovers of justice, in that violent manner took the judge from the bench, and carried him prisoner to Westminster; from whence, by the two houses, he was committed to the tower of London; where he remained for the space of above two years, without ever being charged with any particular crime, till he was redeemed by his majesty by the exchange of another, whose liberty they desired.

By these heightened acts of power and terror, they quickly demonstrated how insecure it would be for any man, at least not to concur with them. And, having a general, arms, money, and men enough at their devotion, they easily formed an army, publicly disposing such troops and regiments, as had been raised for Ireland, and, at one time, one hundred thousand pounds of that money, which, by act of parliament, had been paid for that purpose, towards the constituting that army, which was to be led against their lawful sovereign. So that it was very evident, they would be in such an equipage within few weeks, both with a train of artillery, horse, and foot, all taken, armed, furnished, and supplied out of his majesty's own magazines and stores, that they had not reason to fear any opposition. In the mean time, they declared, and published to the people, "that they "raised that army only for the defence of the parliament, the king's person, and the religion, "liberty, and laws of the kingdom, and of those, "who, for their sakes, and for those ends, had "obeyed their orders: that the king, by the institution of evil counsellors, had raised a great army "of papists; by which he intended to awe and "destroy the parliament; to introduce popery and "tyranny: of which intention, they said, his re- "quering Hull; his sending out commissions of "array; his bespeaking arms and ammunition "beyond the seas; (there having been some "brought to him by the ship called the Providence;) his declaring sir John Hotham traitor; "and the putting out the earl of Northumberland

"from being lord high admiral of England; his removing the earl of Pembroke, Essex, Holland, the lord Fielding, and sir Henry Vane, from their several places and employments; were sufficient and ample evidences: and therefore they conjured all men to assist their general, the earl of Essex." And, for their better and more secret ransaction of all such counsels, as were necessary to be entered upon, or followed, they chose a committee, of some choice members of either house, to intend the great business of the kingdom with reference to the army; who had authority, without so much as communicating the matter to the house, to imprison persons, seize upon estates; and many other particulars, which the two houses, in full parliament, had not the least regular, legal, justifiable authority to do. And for the better encouragement of men to engage in the service, the lord Kimbolton, and the five members of the house of commons, formerly accused by his majesty of high treason, upon solemn debate, had several regiments conferred on them; and, by their example, many other members of both houses, some upon their lowness, and decayedness of their fortunes, others to get name and reputation to be in the number of reformers, (amongst whom they doubted not all places of honour, or offices of profit, would be bestowed,) most upon the confidence, that all would be ended without a blow, by the king's want of power to gather strength, desired and obtained command of horse or foot; their quality making amends for their want of experience, and their other defects; which were repaired by many good officers, both English and Scots; the late troubles having brought many of that tribe to London, and the reputation of the earl of Essex having drawn others, out of the Low Countries, to engage in that service. In the choice of whom, whilst they accused the king of a purpose to bring in a foreign force, and of entertaining papists, they neither considered nation or religion; but entertained all strangers and foreigners, of what religion soever, who desired to run their fortune in war.

On the other side, preparations were not made with equal expedition and success by the king, towards a war: for, though he well understood and discerned that he had nothing else to trust to, he was to encounter strange difficulties to do that. He was so far from having money to levy or pay soldiers, that he was, at this very time, compelled, for very real want, to let fall all the tables kept by his officers of state in court, by which so many of all qualities subsisted; and the prince, and duke of York, eat with his majesty; which table only was kept. And whoever knows the constitution of a court, well knows what indispositions naturally flow from those declensions; and how ill those tempers bear any diminution of their own interests; and, being once indisposed themselves, how easily they infect others. And that which made the present want of money the more intolerable, there was no visible hope from whence supply could come, in any reasonable time: and that which was a greater want than money, which men rather feared than found, there were no arms; for, notwithstanding the fame of the great store of ammunition brought in by that ship, it consisted only in truth of cannon, powder, and bullet, with eight hundred muskets, which was all the king's magazine. So that the hastening of levies, which at that time was believed would not prove difficult, would be to little purpose, when they should continue unarmed. But that which troubled the king more than all these real incapacities of making war, was the temper and constitution of his own party; which was compounded, for the most part, in court, council, and country, of men drawn to him by the impulsion of conscience, and abhorring the unjust and irregular proceedings of the parliament; otherwise unexperienced in action, and unacquainted with the mysteries and necessary policy of government; severe observers of the law, and as scrupulous in all matters of [religion,] as the other pretended to be: all his majesty's ancient counsellors and servants, (except some few of lasting honour, whom we shall have occasion often to mention,) being to redeem former oversights, or for other unworthy designs, either publicly against him in London, or privately discrediting his interest and actions in his own court. These men still urged "the execution of the law; that what extravagances soever the parliament practised, the king's observation of the law would, in the end, suppress them all:" and, indeed, believed the raising a war to be so wicked a thing, that they thought it impossible the parliament should intend it, even when they knew what they were doing. However [they] concluded, "that he, that was forwardest in the preparing an army, would be first odious to the people; by the affections of whom, the other would be easily suppressed."

This was the general received doctrine; and though it appeared plainly to others, (of equal affection to the public peace,) how fatal those conclusions, in that sense in which they were urged, must prove to the whole kingdom; and how soon the king must be irrecoverably lost, if he proceeded not more vigorously in his defence; yet even those men durst not, in any formed and public debate, declare themselves; or speak that plain English the state of affairs required; but satisfied themselves with speaking, what they thought necessary, to the king in private; so that by this means the king wanted those firm and solid foundations of counsel and foresight, as were most necessary for his condition: so that he could neither impart the true motives and grounds of any important action, nor discover the utmost of his designs. And so he still pretended (notwithstanding the greatest and avowed preparations of the enemy) to intend nothing of hostility, but in order to the reducing of Hull; the benefit of which, he hoped, would engage the trained bands of that great county, (which was the sole strength he yet drew thither,) till he could bring other forces thither, which might be fit for that, or any other design.

But there was another reason of his majesty's going to and staying at Beverley, than was understood; and, it may be, if it had been known, might have produced a better effect; which I think necessary to insert in this place. The lord Digby, whom we have mentioned before, in the first disorder, by which the king and queen were driven from London, to have left England, and to be after unreasonably accused by the house of commons of high treason, had remained from that time in Holland; and, hearing the king's condition at York to be so much improved beyond what he left it at Windsor, had, with some commands from the queen, arrived there very privately, and staid some days in a disguise at York, revealing himself to very few friends, and speaking with the king in so secret a manner in the night, that no notice was taken of his being there; and, finding the king's affairs not in so good a posture as he expected, and conceiving it yet not fit for him to appear, resolved to return again to the queen, and to hasten that provision of arms and ammunition, without which it was not possible for the king to resist any violence that threatened him; and so, in the same bark which brought him over, he went again to sea for Holland, with Wilmot, Ashburnham, Pollard, and Berkley; who purposely removed themselves from court, upon the clamour of the parliament, till the king was ready to use their service. They were not many hours at sea, when they met the Providence, (which we mentioned before,) with the ammunition, which was only wanted; and, well knowing her, they agreed, "that Wilmot, Pollard, Berkley, should return with the ammunition to the king; and Digby, and col. Ashburnham should pursue their former intentions for Holland." But their parleys continued so long, that the parliament ships, who had watched and chased the Providence, came up to them, and though the ship escaped, and run on shore, as was before mentioned, yet the fly-boat, in which the lord Digby was, could not so well get away; but was taken by them, and carried in with so much the more choler and triumph into Hull, that they had been disappointed of their greater prize. Col. Ashburnham, though he was in great umbrage with the parliament, and one of those delinquents, whom they reproached the king with, was so well known to sir John Hotham, with whom he stood in a good degree of familiarity, that he could not dissemble or conceal himself; but the lord Digby, being in so real a disguise, that his nearest friends would not easily have known him, pretended to be a Frenchman, whose language he spoke excellently; and seemed to be so sea-sick, that he kept himself in the hole of the bark, till they came to Hull; and, in that time, disposed of such papers as were not fit to be perused; and when he came on shore, so well counterfeited sickness, and want of health, that he easily procured himself to be sent, under a guard, to some obscure corner for repose; whilst col. Ashburnham, who was the only prisoner they thought worth the looking after, was carefully carried to the governor; who received him with as much civility as he could reasonably expect.

The lord Digby, being by himself, quickly considered the desperateness of his condition: "that it would not be possible to conceal himself long, being so well known to many who were in the Providence, and the garrison quickly knowing whatsoever was spoken of in the country: that he was, how unjustly or unreasonably soever, the most odious man of the kingdom to the parliament; into whose hands if he should then come, his life would be, at least, in apparent hazard." And how to get himself out of that labyrinth was very difficult, since sir John Hotham was so far from any inclination of kindness towards him, as he had to col. Ashburnham, that he was in the number of his most notorious enemies. However, in this eminent extremity, (as he is a man of the greatest presentness of mind, and the least unappalled upon danger, that I have known,) he resolved not to give himself over; and found means to make one of his guard, in broken English, which might well have become any Frenchman, understand, "that he desired to speak privately with the governor; and that he would discover some secrets of the king's and queen's to him, that would highly advance the service of the parliament." The fellow made haste to let the governor know these good tidings; who understanding French well, as speedily sent for the Frenchman; who was brought before him in the presence of much company, and, without any disorder, gave such an account of himself, as they understood him to have seen much of the French service, (of which he spoke very fluently,) and to have come over recommended to the king for some command, if he should have occasion to use soldiers; as, he said, people abroad conceived him likely to have. After he had entertained the company with such discourse, there being present some gentlemen, who came lately out of France, and so being the more curious to administer questions, he applied himself to the governor; and told him, "that if he might be admitted to privacy with him, he would discover somewhat to him, which he would not repent to have known." The governor, who was a man apt enough to fear his own safety, but more apprehensive of the jealousies which would attend him, (for his eldest son, and some others, were more absolutely confided in by the parliament than himself, and were in truth but spies over him,) would not venture himself in another room; but drew him to a great window at a convenient distance from the company, and wished him "to say what he thought fit." The lord Digby, finding he could not obtain more privacy, asked him, in English, "whether he knew him?" The other, appalled, told him, "No." "Then," said he, "I shall try whether I know sir John Hotham; and whether he be, in truth, the same man of honour I have always taken him to be;" and, thereupon, told him who he was; and "that he hoped he was too much a gentleman to deliver him up a sacrifice to their rage and fury, who, he well knew, were his implacable enemies." The other, being surprised and astonished, and fearing that the by-standers would discover him too, (for, being now told who he was, he wondered he found it not out himself,) he desired him "to say no more for the present; that he should not be sorry for the trust he reposed in him, and should find him the same man he had thought him: that he would find some time, as soon as conveniently he might, to have more conference with him. In the mean time, that he should content himself with the ill accommodation he had, the amendment whereof would beget suspicion: and so he called the guard instantly to carry him away, and to have a very strict eye upon him;" and, turning to the company, and being conscious to himself of the trouble and disorder in his countenance, told them, "that the Frenchman was a shrewd fellow, and understood more of the queen's counsels and designs, than a man would suspect: that he had told him that which the parliament would be glad to know; to whom presently he would make a despatch, though he had not yet so clear informations, as he presumed, he should have after two or three days;" and so departed to his chamber.

It was a wonderful influence, that this noble person's stars (which used to lead him into and out of the greatest perplexities and dangers, throughout the whole course of his life) had upon this whole affair. Hotham was, by his nature and education, a rough and a rude man; of great covetousness, of great pride, and great ambition; without any bowels of good nature, or the least sense or touch of generosity; his parts were not quick and sharp, but composed, and he judged well; he was a man of craft, and more like to deceive, than to be cozened: yet, after all this, this young nobleman, known and abhorred by him, for his admirable faculty of dissimulation, had so far prevailed, and imposed upon his spirit, that he resolved to practise that virtue, which the other had imputed to him; and which he was absolutely without; and not to suffer him to fall into the hands of his enemies. He sent for him, the next day, and at an hour when he was more vacant from attendants and observers; and, at first, told him his resolution; "that, since he had so frankly put himself into his hands, he would not deceive his trust;" and wished him "to consider, in what way, and by what colour, he should so set him at liberty, that he might, without any other danger, arrive at the place where he would be. For," he said, "he would not trust any person living with the secret, and least of all his son;" whom he mentioned with all the bitterness imaginable, "as a man of an ill nature, and furiously addicted to the worst designs the parliament had, or could have; and one that was more depended upon by them than himself, and sent thither only as a spy upon him." And from hence he entered upon the discourse "of the times, and mischief that was like to befall the whole kingdom, from this difference between the king and the parliament." Then lamented his own fate, "that, being a man of very different principles from those who drove things to this extremity, and of entire affection and duty to the king, he should now be looked upon as the chief ground and cause of the civil war which was to ensue, by his not opening the ports, when the king would have entered into the town:" of which business, and of all the circumstances attending it, he spake at large; and avowed, "that the information sent him of the king's purpose presently to hang him, was the true cause of his having proceeded in that manner."

The lord Digby, who knew well enough how to cultivate every period of such a discourse, and how to work upon those passions which were most predominant in him, joined with him in the sense of the calamities, which were like to befall the nation; which he bewailed pathetically; and, "that it should be in the power of a handful of ill men, corrupted in their affections to the king, and against monarchy itself, [to be] able to involve him, and many others of his clear intentions, in their dark counsels, and to engage them to prosecute ends which they abhorred, and which must determine in the ruin of all the undertakers. For, he told him, that the king, in a short time, would reduce all his enemies: that the hearts of the people were already, in all places, alienated from them; and that the fleet was so much at the king's disposal, that, as soon as they should receive his orders, they would appear in any place he appointed: that all the princes in Christendom were concerned in the quarrel, and would engage in it, as soon as they should be invited to it: and that the prince of Orange was resolved to come over in the head of his army, and would take Hull in three days." All which ought, reasonably, to have been true in the practick, though it had very little ground in the speculation. And when he had, by degrees, amused and terrified him with this discourse, he enlarged upon "the honour and glory that man would have, who could be so blessed, as to prevent this terrible mass of confusion, that was in view: that king and people would join in rewarding him with honours and preferments of all kind; and that his name would be derived to posterity, as the pre-servant of his country." He told him, "He was that man, that could do all this; that, by delivering up Hull to the king, he might extinguish the war; and that immediately a peace would be established throughout the kingdom: that the world believed, that he had some credit both with the king and queen; that he would employ it all in his service; and if he would give him this rise to begin upon, he should find, that he would be much more solicitous for his greatness, and a full recompence for his merit, than he was now for his own safety." All these advertisements and reflections were the subject of more than one discourse; for sir John Hotham could not bear the variety and burden of all those thoughts together; but within two days all things were adjusted between them. Hotham said, "it would not become him, after such a refusal, to put the town into the king's hands; nor could he undertake (if he resolved) to effect it; the town itself being in no degree affected to his service; and the trained bands, of which the garrison wholly consisted, were under officers, upon whom he could not depend. But," he said, "if the king would come before the town, though but with one regiment, and plant his cannon against it, and make but one shot, he should think he had discharged his trust to the parliament, as far as he ought to do; and that he would immediately then deliver up the town; which he made no doubt but that he should be then able to do." And, on this errand, he was contented the lord Digby should go to the king, and be conducted out of the town beyond the limits of danger; the governor having told those officers he trusted most, that "he would send the Frenchman to York; who, he was well assured, would return to him again." And he gave him a note to a widow, who lived in the city, at whose house he might lodge, and by whose hands he might transmit any letter to him.

When he came to York, and after he had spoke with his friend Mr. Hyde and the other two, who were always together, and the king had notice of his arrival, it was resolved, that he should appear in his own likeness, and wait upon the king in public, that it might be believed, that he had transported himself from Holland in the ship that had brought the ammunition; which was hardly yet come to York, it being now about the time that Mr. Villiers and sir John Pennington had been sent away, and before the news came of their ill success. This was the cause of the sudden march to Hull, before there was a soldier levied to make an assault, or maintain a siege; which was so much wondered at then, and so much censured afterwards. For as soon as his majesty received this assurance, and, besides the confidence of the lord Digby, [which he had] so much reason to depend upon, by the treatment he had received, he declared "he would, upon such a day, go to Beverley," a place within four miles of Hull; and appointed three or four regiments of the country, under the command of such gentlemen whose affection was unquestionable, to march thither, as a guard to his person; and likewise sent a little train of artillery, which might be ready for the summons. And when his majesty was ready with his equipage for his march, the lord Digby returned again in his old mode to Hull, to make sure that all things there might correspond with the former obligation. As soon as the king, and the whole court, (for none remained at York,) came to Beverley, (where they were well accommodated, which kept them from being quickly weary,) and the trained bands were likewise come thither, and the general, the earl of Lindsey, first took possession of his office; a little troubled, and out of countenance, that he should appear the general without an army; and be engaged in an enterprise, which he could not imagine would succeed; his majesty wished him to send out some officers, of which there was a good store, to take a view of the town, and of such advantage ground, within distance, upon which he might raise a battery; as if he meant on a sudden to assault the place; which appeared no unreasonable design, if there were a good party in the town to depend upon. And yet the general had no opinion, that his army of trained bands would frankly expose themselves to such an attack. Besides a great number of officers, and persons of quality, who were all well horsed, and had many servants as well provided, the king had his troop of guards so constituted as hath been said before; and there were few horse in Hull, without officers who understood that kind of service. So that it was no hard matter to take a very full view of the town, by riding to the very ports, and about the walls; nor, at first appearance, was there any show of hostility from the town upon their nearest approaches to it; but after they had made that visit two or three days together, they observed that the walls were better manned, and that there was every day an increase of labourers repairing the works; and then they begun to shoot, when any went within distance of the works.

Sir John Hotham had tried some of his officers, in whose particular affection he had most confidence, how far they were like to be governed by him; and found them of a temper not to be relied upon. His son was grown jealous of some design, and was caballing with those who were most notorious for their disaffection to the government; and some new officers were sent down by the parliament, to assist in the defence of the town, which, they thought, might probably be attempted; and supplies of men had been taken in from the ships, and had been sent thither from Boston, a neighbour town of eminent disloyalty. So that, when the lord Digby returned thither, he found a great damp upon the spirit of the governor, and a sadness of mind, that he had proceeded so far; of which he made all the haste he could to advertise the king; but his letters must first be sent to York before they could come to Beverley; and, when they were received, they contained still somewhat of hope, "that he might restore him to his former courage, and confirm his resolution:" so that the king seemed to defer any attempt, upon the hopes of the earl of Holland's message [before mentioned], and, in the end, he was compelled to give over the design, all hope from the governor growing desperate; whether from his want of courage, or want of power to execute what he desired, remains still uncertain. When he gave over further thought of it, he dismissed both the lord

Digby, and colonel Ashburnham, whom he had likewise detained till then, as a man of use in the execution of the design, with many professions of duty to the king; and as the concealing those two persons, and afterwards releasing them, immediately increased the jealousy of the parliament against him, so it was the principal cause, afterwards, of the loss of his head.

The king, after three weeks' or a month's stay at Beverley, dismissed the trained bands, weary of their service, and returned with his court to York, in so much less credit than when he came from thence, as the entering into a war without power, or preparation to prosecute it, was like to produce. And the inconvenience was the greater, because the principal persons of quality, of court or country, and the officers, had the less reverence for the king's conduct, by seeing such an action entered upon with so little reason, and prosecuted so perfunctorily: all which reproaches his majesty thought fitter to bear, than to discover the motives of his journey; which were then known to few, nor, to this day, have been published.

When the king returned to York, exceedingly troubled at the late march he had made, and all men expressing great impatience to be in action, very many persons of honour and quality, having attended long at court, did believe they might be more useful to his majesty's service in their own countries, in restraining the disaffected from any seditious attempts, and disposing the people in general to be constant in their loyalty, an accident fell out, that made it absolutely necessary for the king to declare the war, and to enter upon it, before he was in any degree ripe for action; which was, that Portsmouth had declared for the king, and refused to submit to the parliament, which had thereupon sent an army, under the command of sir William Waller, to reduce it. The relating how this came to pass, requires a large discourse, which will administer much variety, not without somewhat of pleasure and wonder, from the temper and spirit of the person who conducted that action; if it can be said to be conducted without any conduct.

We have remembered before, in the last year, the discourse of the bringing up the army to London, to awe the parliament, and the unspeakable dishonour and damage the king sustained by that discourse, how groundless soever it was; all which was imputed to colonel Goring, who, by that means, grew into great reputation with the parliament, as a man so irrecoverably lost at court, that he would join with them in the most desperate designs; yet he carried himself with so great dexterity, that, within few months, he wrought upon the king and queen to believe, that he so much repented that fault, that he would redeem it by any service; and to trust him to that degree, that the queen once resolved, when the tumults drove their majesties first from London, for her security, to put herself into Portsmouth, which was under his government; whilst his majesty betook himself to the northern parts; which design was no sooner over, (if not before,) than he again intimated so much of it to the lord Kimbolton, and that party, that they took all the trust he had from court, to proceed from the confidence their majesties had of his father's interest in him; whose affection and zeal to their service was ever most indubitable: but assured themselves he was their own, even against his own father. So that he carried the matter so, that, at the same time, he received 3000*l.* from the queen, (which she raised by the sale of her plate and some jewels,) to fortify, and victual, and reinforce his garrison, against the time it should be necessary to declare for the king; and a good supply from the parliament, for the payment of the garrison, that it might be kept the better devoted to them, and to their service. All which he performed with that admirable dissimulation, and rare confidence, that, when the house of commons was informed by a member, whose zeal and affection to them was as much valued as any man's, "that all his correspondence in the county [was] with the most malignant persons; that of those, many frequently resorted to, and continued with him in the garrison; that he was fortifying, and raising batteries towards the land; and that in his discourses, especially in the seasons of his good fellowship, he used to utter threats against the parliament, and sharp censures of their proceedings;" and upon such informations (the author whereof was well known to them, and of great reputation; and lived so near Portsmouth, that he could not be mistaken in the matter of fact) the house sent for him, most thinking he would refuse to come; colonel Goring came, upon the summons, with that undauntedness, that all clouds of distrust immediately vanished, in so much as no man presumed to whisper the least jealousy of him; which he observing, he came to the house of commons, of which he was a member, and, having sat a day or two patiently, as if he expected some charge, in the end he stood up, with a countenance full of modesty, and yet not without a mixture of anger, (as he could help himself with all the insinuations of doubt, or fear, or shame, or simplicity in his face, that might gain belief, to a greater degree than I ever saw any man; and could seem the most confounded when he was best prepared, and the most out of countenance when he was best resolved, and to want words, and the habit of speaking, when they flowed from no man with greater power,) and told them, "that he had been sent for by them, upon some information given against him, and that, though he believed, the charge being so ridiculous, they might have received, by their own particular inquiry, satisfaction; yet the discourses that had been used, and his being sent for in that manner, had begat some prejudice to him in his reputation; which if he could not preserve, he should be less able to do them service; and therefore desired, that he might have leave (though very unskilful, and unfit to speak, in so wise and judicious an assembly) to present to them the state and condition of that place under his command; and then he doubted not but to give them full satisfaction in those particulars, which possibly had made some impression in them to his disadvantage: that he was far from taking it ill from those, who had given any information against him; for, what he had done, and must do, might give some umbrage to well affected persons, who knew not the grounds and reasons, that induced him so to do; but that if any such person would at any time, resort to him, he would clearly inform them of whatever motives he had; and would be glad of their advice and assistance for the better doing thereof." Then he took notice of every particular that had been publicly said against him, or privately whispered, and gave such plausible answers to the whole, intermingling sharp taunts, and scorn, to what had been said of him, with pretty application of himself, and flattery to the men that spake it: concluding, "that they well knew in what esteem he stood with others: so that if, by his ill carriage, he should forfeit the good opinion of that house, upon which he only depended, and to whose service he entirely devoted himself, he were madder than his friends took him to be, and must be as unpitied in any misery, that could befall him, as his enemies would be glad to see him." With which, as innocently and unaffectedly uttered, as can be imagined, he got so general an applause from the whole house, that, not without some little apology for troubling him, they desired him again to repair to his government, and to finish those works, which were necessary for the safety of the place;" and gratified him with consenting to all the propositions he made in behalf of his garrison, and paid him a good sum of money for their arrears; with which, and being privately assured (which was indeed resolved on) that he should be lieutenant-general of their horse in their new army, when it should be formed, he departed again to Portsmouth; in the mean time assuring his majesty, by those who were trusted between them, "that he would be speedily in a posture to make any such declaration for his service, as he should be required;" which he was forced to do sooner than he was provided for, though not sooner than he had reason to expect.

When the levies for the parliament army were in good forwardness, and he had received his commission for lieutenant-general of the horse, he wrote to the lord Kimbolton, who was his most bosom friend, and a man very powerful, "that he might not be called to give his attendance upon the army, till it was ready to march; because there were so many things to be done, and perfected, for the safety of that important place, that he was desirous to be present himself at the work as long as was possible. In the mean time, he had given directions to his agent in London, to prepare all things for his equipage; so that he would be ready to appear, at any rendezvous, upon a day's warning." Though the earl of Essex did much desire his company and assistance in the council of war, and preparing the articles, and forming the discipline for the army, he having been more lately versed in the order and rule of marches, and the provisions necessary or convenient thereunto, than any man then in their service, and of greater command than any man but the general; yet the lord Kimbolton prevailed, that he might not be sent for, till things were riper for action. And, when that lord did afterwards write to him, "that it was time he should come away," he sent such new and reasonable excuses, that they were not unsatisfied with his delay; till he had multiplied those excuses so long, that they begun to suspect; and they no sooner inclined to suspicion, but they met with abundant arguments to cherish it. His behaviour and course of life was very notorious to all the neighbours, nor was he at all reserved in his mirth, and public discourses, to conceal his opinion of the parliament, and their proceedings. So that, at last, the lord Kimbolton writ plainly to him, "that he could no longer excuse his absence from the army, where he was much wanted; and that, if he did not come to London by such a short day,

"as he named, he found his integrity would be doubted; and that many things were laid to his charge, of which he doubted not his innocence; and therefore conjured him, immediately, to be at Westminster." It being now to be no longer deferred, or put off, he writ a jolly letter to that lord, "that, the truth was, his council advised him, that the parliament did many things which were illegal; and that he might incur much danger by obeying all their orders; that he had received the command of that garrison from the king; and that he durst not be absent from it, without his leave:" and concluded with some good counsel to the lord.

This declaration [of the governor] of a place, which had the reputation of being the only place of strength in England, and situated upon the sea, put them into many apprehensions; and they lost no time in endeavouring to reduce [it]; but, upon the first understanding his resolution, sir William Waller was sent, with a good part of the army, so to block up the place, that neither men or provision might be able to get in; and some ships were sent from the fleet, to prevent any relief by sea: and these advertisements came to the king, as soon as he returned to York.

It gave no small reputation to his majesty's affairs, when there was so great a damp upon the spirits of men, from the misadventures at Beverley, that so notable a place as Portsmouth had declared for him, in the very beginning of the war; and that so good an officer as Goring was returned to his duty, and in the possession of the town: and the king, who was not surprised with the matter, knowing well the resolution of the colonel, made no doubt, but that he was very well supplied with all things, as he might well have been, to have given the rebels work for three or four months, at the least. However, he forthwith published a declaration, that had been long ready, in which he recapitulated all the insolent and rebellious actions which the two houses had committed against him: and declared them "to be guilty; and forbad all his subjects to yield any obedience to them;" and, at the same time, published his proclamation; by which he "required all men, who could bear arms, to repair to him at Nottingham, by the twenty-fifth of August following; on which day he would set up his royal standard there, which all good subjects were obliged to attend." And at the same time, he sent the marquis of Hertford to raise forces in the west, or, at least, to restrain those parts (where his interest and reputation was greater than any man's) within the limits of their duty to the king, and from being corrupted or perverted by the parliament; and with him went the lord Seymour, his brother; the lord Pawlet, Hopton, Stawel, Coventry, Berkeley, Windham, and some other gentlemen, of the prime quality, and interest in the western parts; and who were like to give as good examples in their persons, and to be followed by as many men, as any such number of gentlemen in England could be. And from this party, enlivened by the power and reputation of the marquis, the king was in hopes, that Portsmouth would be shortly relieved, and made the head quarter to a good army. And when all this was done, he did all that was possible to be done, without money, to hasten his levies of horse and foot, and to prepare a light train of artillery, that he might appear at Nottingham, at the day when the standard was to be set up, with such a body of men, as might be, at the least, a competent guard to his person.

Many were then of opinion, "that it had been more for his majesty's benefit and service, if the standard had been appointed to be set up at York; and so that the king had stayed there, without moving further south, until he could have marched in the head of an army, and not to depend upon gathering an army up in his march. All the northern counties were, at present, most at his devotion; and so it would be most easy to raise men there: Newcastle was the only port in his obedience, and whither he had appointed his supplies of arms and ammunition to be sent; of which he had so present need, that all his magazine, which was brought in the Providence, was already distributed to those few gentlemen, who had received commissions, and were most like speedily to raise their regiments; and it would be a very long, and might prove a very dangerous passage to get the supplies, which were daily expected, to be brought with security from Newcastle, when the king should be advanced so many days' journey beyond York." All which were very important considerations, and ought to have prevailed; but the king's inclinations to be nearer London, and the expectation he had of great effects from Portsmouth, and the west, disposed him to a willingness to prefer Nottingham; but that which determined the point, was an apparent and manifest aversion in the Yorkshire gentlemen, whose affections were least suspected, that his majesty should continue, and remain at York; which, they said, the people apprehended, "would inevitably make that country the seat of the war:" unskilfully imagining, that the war would be no where, but where the king's army was; and therefore they facilitated all things, which might contribute to his remove from thence; undertook to provide convoys for any arms and ammunition from Newcastle; to hasten the levies in their own country; and to borrow of the arms of some of the trained bands; which was the best expedient, that could be found out, to arm the king's troops, and had its reverse in the murmurs it produced, and in leaving the best affected men, by being disarmed, at the mercy of their enemies; who carefully kept their weapons, that they might be ready to fight against the king. This caused the resolution to be taken for Nottingham, without enough weighing the objections, which, upon the entrance into great actions, cannot be too much deliberated, though, in the execution, they shall be best shut out. And it quickly appeared in those very men, who prevailed most in that council; for, when the time drew on, in which his majesty was to depart, and leave the country, then they remembered, "that the garrison of Hull would be left as a thorn in their sides, where there were well formed and active troops, which might march over the country without control, and come into York itself without resistance; that there were many disaffected persons of quality and interest in the country, who, as soon as the king should be gone, would appear amongst their neighbours, and find a concurrence from them in their worst designs; and that there were some places, some whole corporations, so notoriously disaffected,

"especially in matters relating to the church, that "they wanted only conductors to carry them into "rebellion."

These, and the like reflections, made too late impressions upon them; and now, too much, they magnified this man's power, whom before they contemned; and doubted that man's affection, of which they were before secure; and made a thousand propositions to the king this day, whereof they rejected the greatest part to-morrow; and, as the day approached nearer for the king's departure, their apprehensions and irresolutions increased. In the end, they were united in two requests to the king; that "he would commit the supreme command of the country, with reference to all military affairs, to the earl of Cumberland; and qualify him, with an ample commission, to that purpose." The other, "that his majesty would command sir Thomas Glemham to remain with them, to govern and command such forces, as the earl of Cumberland should find necessary for their defence." And this provision being made by the king, they obliged themselves to concur in making any preparations, and forming any forces the earl should require. And his majesty, as willingly, gratified them in both their desires. The earl of Cumberland was a man of great honour and integrity, who had all his estate in that country, and had lived most amongst them, with very much acceptance and affection from the gentlemen, and the common people: but he was not, in any degree, active, or of a martial temper; and rather a man more like not to have any enemies, than to oblige any to be firmly and resolutely his friends, or to pursue his interest: the great fortune of the family was divided, and the greater part of it carried away by an heir female; and his father had so wasted the remainder, that the earl could not live with that lustre, nor draw so great a dependence upon him, as his ancestors had done. In a word, he was a man of honour, and popular enough in peace, but not endued with those parts which were necessary for such a season. Sir Thomas Glemham was a gentleman of a noble extraction, and a fair fortune, though he had much impaired it; he had spent many years, in armies, beyond the seas; and he had been an officer of very good esteem in the king's armies, and of courage and integrity unquestionable; but he was not of so stirring and active a nature, as to be able to infuse fire enough into the phlegmatic constitutions of that people, who did rather wish to be spectators of the war, than parties in it; and believed, if they did not provoke the other party, they might all live quietly together; until sir John Hotham, by his excursions and depredations out of Hull, and their seditious neighbours, by their insurrections, awakened them out of that pleasant dream. And then the greatest part of the gentry of that populous country, and very many of the common people, did behave themselves with signal fidelity and courage in the king's service: of all which particulars, which deserve well to be remembered, and transmitted to posterity, there will be occasion to make mention in the following discourse.

Yet I cannot leave York without the mention of one particular; which, in truth, is so lively an instance of the spirit and temper of that time, and was a sad presage of all the misfortunes which followed. There were very few gentlemen, or men of any quality, in that large county, who were actively or factiously disaffected to his majesty; and of those the lord Fairfax, and his son, sir Thomas Fairfax, were the chief; who were governed by two or three of inferior quality, more conversant with the people; who were as well known as they. All these were in the county, at their houses, within few miles of York; and the king resolved, at his going away, to have taken them all prisoners, and to have put them in safe custody; by which, it was very probable, those mischiefs, that shortly after broke out, might have been prevented. But the gentlemen of the county, who were met together to consult for their own security, hearing of this design, besought his majesty "not to do it;" alleging, "that he would, thereby, leave them in a worse condition, by an act so ungracious and unpopular; and that the disaffected would be so far from being weakened, that their party would be increased thereby:" many really believing, that neither father or son were transported with over-vehement inclinations to the parliament; but would willingly sit still, without being active on either side; which, no doubt, was a policy, that many of those, who wished well, desired and intended to be safe by. And so his majesty left York, taking with him only two or three of inferior rank, (whereof one Stapleton was one,) who were known to have been very active in stirring the people to sedition; and yet, upon some specious pretences, some very good men were persuaded, within few days, to procure the liberty and enlargement even of those from his majesty. So ticklish were those times, and so wary were all men to advise the king should do any thing, which, upon the strictest inquisition, might seem to swerve from the strict rule of the law; believing, unreasonably, that the softest and gentlest remedies might be most wholesomely applied to those rough and violent diseases.

The king came to Nottingham two or three days before the day he had appointed to set up the standard; having taken Lincoln in his way, and drawn some arms from the trained bands of that country with him to Nottingham; from whence, the next day, he went to take a view of his horse; whereof there were several troops well armed, and under good officers, to the number of seven or eight hundred men; with which, being informed, "that there were some regiments of foot marching towards Coventry, by the earl of Essex's orders," he made haste thither; making little doubt, but that he should be able to get thither before them, and so to possess himself of that city; and he did get thither the day before they came; but found not only the gates shut against him, but some of his servants shot and wounded from the walls: nor could all his messages and summons prevail with the mayor and magistrates, before there was any garrison there, to suffer the king to enter into the city. So great an interest and reputation the parliament had gotten over the affections of the people, whose hearts were alienated from any reverence to the government.

The king could not remedy the affront, but went that night to Stonely, the house then of sir Thomas Lee; where he was well received; and, the next day, his body of horse, having a clear view, upon an open campania, for five or six miles together, of the [enemy's] small body of foot, which consisted not of above twelve hundred men, with one troop of horse, which marched with them over that plain, retired before them, without giving them one charge; which was imputed to the lashty [ill conduct] of Wilmot, who commanded; and had a colder courage than many who were under him, and who were of opinion, that they might have easily defeated that body of foot: which would have been a very seasonable victory; would have put Coventry unquestionably into the king's hands, and sent him with a good omen to the setting up of his standard. Whereas, that unhappy retreat, which looked like a defeat, and the rebellious behaviour of Coventry, made his majesty's return to Nottingham very melancholy; and he returned thither the very day the standard was appointed to be set up.

According to the proclamation, upon the twenty-fifth day of August, the standard was erected, about six of the clock in the evening of a very stormy and tempestuous day. The king himself, with a small train, rode to the top of the castle-hill, Varney the knight-marshal, who was standardbearer, carrying the standard, which was then erected in that place, with little other ceremony than the sound of drums and trumpets: melancholy men observed many ill presages about that time. There was not one regiment of foot yet levied and brought thither; so that the trained bands, which the sheriff had drawn together, was all the strength the king had for his person, and the guard of the standard. There appeared no conflux of men in obedience to the proclamation; the arms and ammunition were not yet come from York, and a general sadness covered the whole town, and the king himself appeared more melancholic than he used to be. The standard itself was blown down, the same night it had been set up, by a very strong and unruly wind, and could not be fixed again in a day or two, till the tempest was allayed. This was the melancholy state of the king's affairs, when the standard was set up.

BOOK VI.

WHEN the king set up his standard at Nottingham, which was the 25th of August, as is before remembered, he found the place much emptier than he thought the fame of his standard would have suffered it to be; and received intelligence the next day, that the rebels' army, for such now he had declared them, was horse, foot, and cannon, at Northampton; besides that great party which, in the end of the [fifth] book, we left at Coventry: whereas his few cannon and ammunition were still at York, being neither yet in an equipage to march, though sir John Heydon, his majesty's faithful lieutenant general of the ordnance, used all possible diligence to form and prepare it; neither were there foot enough levied to guard it: and at Nottingham, besides some few of the trained bands, which sir John Digby, the active sheriff of that county, drew into the old ruinous castle there, there were not of foot levied for the service yet three hundred men. So that they who were not overmuch given to fear, finding very many places in that great river, which was looked upon as the only strength and security of the town, to be easily fordable, and nothing towards an army for defence but the standard set up, began sadly to apprehend the danger of the king's own person. Inasmuch that sir Jacob Ashley, his sergeant-major-general of his intended army, told him, "that he could not give any assurance against his majesty's being taken out of his bed, if the rebels should make a brisk attempt to that purpose." And it was evident, all the strength he had to depend upon was his horse, which were under the command of prince Rupert at Leicester, and were not at that time in number above eight hundred, few better armed than with swords; whilst the enemy had, within less than twenty miles of that place, double the number of horse excellently armed and appointed, and a body of five thousand foot well trained and disciplined; so that, no doubt, if they had advanced, they might at least have dispersed those few troops of the king's, and driven his majesty to a greater distance, and exposed him to notable hazards and inconveniences.

When men were almost confounded with this prospect, his majesty received intelligence, that Portsmouth was so straitly besieged by sea and land, that it would be reduced in very few days, except it were relieved. For the truth is, colonel Goring, though he had sufficient warning, and sufficient supplies of money to put that place into a posture, had relied too much upon probable and casual assistance, and neglected to do that himself, [which] a vigilant officer would have done: and albeit his chief dependence was both for money and provisions from the Isle of Wight, yet he was careless to secure those small castles and block-houses, which guarded the river; which revolting to the parliament as soon as he declared for the king, cut off all those unreasonable dependences; so that he had neither men enough to do ordinary duty, nor provisions enough for those few, for any considerable time. And at the same time with this of Portsmouth, arrived certain advertisements, that the marquis of Hertford, and all his forces in the west, from whom only the king hoped that Portsmouth should be relieved, was driven out of Somersetshire, where his power and interest was believed unquestionable, into Dorsetshire; and there besieged in Sherborne castle.

The marquis, after he left the king at Beverley, by ordinary journeys, and without making any long stay by the way, came to Bath, upon the very edge of Somersetshire, at the time when the general assizes were there held; where meeting all the considerable gentlemen of that great county, and finding them well affected to the king's service, except very few who were sufficiently known, he entered into consultation with them from whom he was to expect assistance, in what place he should most conveniently fix himself for the better disposing the affections of the people, and to raise a strength for the resistance of any attempt which the parliament might make, either against them, or to disturb the peace of the country by their ordinance of the militia, which was the first power they were like to hear of. Some were of opinion, "that Bristol would be the fittest place, being a great, rich, and populous city; of which being once possessed, they should be easily able to give the law to Somerset and Gloucestershire; and could not receive any affront by a sudden or tumultuary insurrection of the people." And if this advice had been followed, it would probably have proved very prosperous. But, on the contrary, it was objected, "that it was not evident, that his lordship's reception into the city would be such as was expected; Mr. Hollis being lieutenant thereof, and having exercised the militia there; and there being visibly many dissatisfied people in it, and some of eminent quality; and if he should attempt to go thither, and be disappointed, it would break the whole design: then that it was out of the county of Somerset, and therefore that they could not [legally] draw that people thither; besides, that it would look like fear and suspicion of their own power, to put themselves into a walled town, as if they feared the power of the other party would be able to oppress them. Whereas, besides Popham and Horner, all the gentlemen of eminent quality and fortune of Somerset were either present with the marquis, or presumed not to be inclined to the parliament." And therefore they proposed "that Wells, being a pleasant city, in the heart and near the centre of that county, might be chosen for his lordship's residence." Which was accordingly agreed on, and thither the marquis and his train went, sending for the nearest trained bands to appear before him; and presuming that in little time, by the industry of the gentlemen present, and his lordship's reputation, which was very great, the affections of the people would be so much wrought upon, and their understandings so well informed, that it would not be in the power of the parliament to pervert them, or to make ill impressions in them towards his majesty's service.

Whilst his lordship in this gentle way endeavoured to compose the fears and apprehensions of the people, and by doing all things in a peaceable way, and according to the rules of the known laws, to convince all men of the justice and integrity of his majesty's proceedings and royal intentions; the other party, according to their usual confidence and activity, wrought underhand to persuade the people that the marquis was come down to put the commission of array in execution, by which commission a great part of the estate of every farmer or substantial yeoman should be taken from them; alleging, that some Jords had said, "that twenty pounds by the year was enough for any peasant to live by;" and so, taking advantage of the commission's being in Latin, translated it into what English they pleased; persuading the substantial yeomen and freeholders, that at least two parts of their estates would, by that commission, be taken from them; and the meaner and poorer sort of people, that they were to pay a tax of one day's labour in the week to the king; and that all should be, upon the matter, no better than slaves to the lords, and that there was no way to free and preserve themselves from this insupportable tyranny, than by adhering to the parliament, and submitting to the ordinance for the militia; which was purposely prepared to enable them to resist these horrid invasions of their liberties.

It is not easily believed, how these gross infusions generally prevailed. For though the gentlemen of ancient families and estates in that county were, for the most part, well affected to the king, and easily discerned by what faction the parliament was governed; yet there were a people of an inferior degree, who, by good husbandry, clothing, and other thriving arts, had gotten very great fortunes; and, by degrees, getting themselves into the gentlemen's estates, were angry that they found not themselves in the same esteem and reputation with those whose estates they had; and therefore, with more industry than the other, studied all ways to make themselves considerable. These, from the beginning, were fast friends to the parliament; and many of them were now intrusted by them as deputy lieutenants in their new ordinance of the militia, and having found when the people were ripe, gathered them together, with a purpose on a sudden, before there should be any suspicion, to surround and surprise the marquis at Wells. For they had always this advantage of the king's party and his counsels, that their resolutions were no sooner published, than they were ready to be executed, there being an absolute implicit obedience in the inferior sort to those who were to command them; and their private agents, with admirable industry and secrecy, preparing all persons and things ready against a call. Whereas all the king's counsels were with great formality deliberated, before concluded: and then, with equal formality, and precise caution of the law, executed; there being no other way to weigh down the prejudice that was contracted against the court, but by the most barefaced publishing all conclusions, and fitting them to that apparent justice and reason, that might prevail over the most ordinary understandings.

When the marquis was thus in the midst of an enemy that almost covered the whole kingdom, his whole strength was a troop of horse, raised by Mr. John Digby, son to the earl of Bristol, and another by sir Francis Hawley, (both which were levied in those parts to attend the king in the north,) and a troop of horse, and a small troop of dragoons, raised and armed by sir Ralph Hopton at his own charge; and about one hundred foot gathered up by lieutenant-colonel Henry Lunsford towards a regiment, which were likewise to have marched to the king. These, with the lord Pawlet, and the gentlemen of the country, which were about eight and twenty of the prime quality there, with their servants and retinue, made up the marquis's force. Then their proceedings were with that rare caution, that upon advertisement that the active ministers of that party had appointed a general meeting at a town within few miles of Wells, sir Ralph Hopton being advised with his small troop and some volunteer gentlemen to repair thither, and to disappoint that convention, and to take care that it might produce the least prejudice to the king's service; before he reached the place, those gentlemen who stayed behind (and by whose advice the marquis thought it necessary absolutely to govern himself, that they might see all possible wariness was used in the entrance into a war, which being once entered into, he well knew must be carried on another way) sent him word, "that he should forbear any hostile act, otherwise they would disclaim whatsoever he should do." Otherwise the courage and resolution of those few were such, and the cowardice of the undisciplined seditious rabble and their leaders was so eminent, that it was very probable, if those few troops had been as actively employed as their commanders desired, they might have been able to have driven the bigots out of the country, before they had fully possessed the rest with their own rancour: which may be reasonably presumed by what followed shortly after, when Mr. Digby, sir John Stawell and his sons, with some volunteer gentlemen, being in the whole not above fourscore horse, and fourteen dragoons, charged a greater body of horse, and above six hundred foot of the rebels, led by a member of the house of commons; and without the loss of one man, killed seven in the place, hurt very many, took their chief officers, and as many more prisoners as they would; and so routed the whole body, that six men kept not together, they having all thrown down their arms.

But this good fortune abated only the courage of those who had run away, the other making use of this overthrow as an argument of the marquis's bloody purposes; and therefore, in few days, sir John Horner and Alexander Popham, being the principal men of quality of that party in that county, with the assistance of their friends of Dorset, and Devon, and the city of Bristol, drew together a body of above twelve thousand men, horse and foot, with some pieces of cannon, with which they appeared on the top of the hill over Wells; where the marquis, in contempt of them, stayed two days, having only barricadoed the town; but then, finding that the few trained bands, which attended him there, were run away, either to their own houses, or to their fellows, on the top of the hill; and hearing that more forces, or at least better officers, were coming from the parliament against him, he retired in the noon day, and in the face of that rebellious herd, from Wells to So-merton, and so to Sherborne, without any loss or trouble. Thither, within two days, came to his lordship sir John Berkley, colonel Ashburnham, and other good officers, enough to have formed a considerable army, if there had been no other want. But they had not been long there, (and it was not easy to resolve whither else to go, they having no reason to believe they should be any where more welcome than in Somersetshire, from whence they had been now driven,) when the earl of Bedford, general of the horse to the parliament, with Mr. Hollis, sir Walter Earl, and other ephori, and a complete body of seven thousand foot at least, ordered by Charles Essex, their sergeant-major-general, a soldier of good experience and reputation in the Low Countries, and eight full troops of horse, under the command of captain Pretty, with four pieces of cannon, in a very splendid equipage, came to Wells, and from thence to Sherborne. The marquis, by this time having increased his foot to four hundred, with which that great army was kept from entering that great town, and persuaded to encamp in the field about three quarters of a mile north from the castle; where, for the present, we must leave the marquis and his great-spirited little army.

It could never be understood, why that army did not then march directly to Nottingham; which if it had done, his majesty's few forces must immediately have been scattered, and himself fled, or put himself into their hands, which there were enough ready to have advised him to do; and if he had escaped, he might have been pursued by one regiment of horse till he had quitted the kingdom. But God blinded his enemies, so that they made not the least advance towards Nottingham. They [about the king] began now to wish that he had stayed at York, and proposed his return thither; but that was not hearkened to; and they who had advised his stay there, and against the advance to Nottingham, were more against his return thither, as an absolute flight; but wished the advance of the levies, and a little patience, till it might be discerned what the enemy did intend to do. In this great anxiety, some of the lords desired, "that his majesty would send a message to the parliament, "with some overture to incline them to a treaty;" which proposition was no sooner made, but most concurred in it, and no one had the confidence to oppose it. The king himself was so offended at it, that he declared, "he would never yield to it;" and broke up the council, that it might be no longer urged. But the next day, when they met again, they renewed the same advice with more earnestness. The earl of Southampton, a person of great prudence, and a reputation at least equal to any man's, pressed it, "as a thing that might do good, and could do no harm;" and the king's reasons, with reference to the insolence it would raise in the rebels, and the dishonour that would thereby reflect upon himself, were answered, by saying "their insolence would be for the king's advantage; and when they should reject the offer of peace, which they believed they would do, they would make themselves the more odious to the people, who would be thereby the more inclined to serve the king." So that they took it as granted, that the proposition would be rejected, and therefore it ought to be made. It was farther objected, "that his majesty was not able to make resistance; that the forces before Sherborne,

"Portsmouth, and at Northampton, were three several armies, the least of which would drive his majesty out of his dominions; that it was only in his power to choose, whether, by making a fair offer himself, he would seem to make peace, which could not but render him very gracious to the people, or suffer himself to be taken prisoner, (which he would not long be able to avoid,) which would give his enemies power, reputation, and authority to proceed against his majesty, and, it might be, his posterity, according to their own engaged malice."

Yet this motive made no impression in him. For, he said, no misfortune, or ill success that might attend his endeavour of defending himself, could expose him to more inconveniences than a treaty at this time desired by him, where he must be understood to be willing to yield to whatsoever they would require of him: and how modest they were like to be, might be judged by their nineteen propositions, which were tendered, when their power could not be reasonably understood to be like so much to exceed his majesty's, as at this time it was evident it did; and that, having now nothing to lose but his honour, he could be only excusable to the world, by using his industry to the last to oppose that torrent, which if it prevailed would overwhelm him." This composed courage and magnanimity of his majesty seemed too philosophical, and abstracted from the policy of self-preservation, to which men were passionately addicted: and that which was the king's greatest disadvantage, how many soever were of his mind, (as some few, and but few, there were,) no man durst publicly avow that he was so; a treaty for peace being so popular a thing, that whosoever opposed it would be sure to be, by general consent, a declared enemy to his country.

That which prevailed with his majesty very reasonably then (and indeed it proved equally advantageous to him afterwards) was, "that it was most probable" (and his whole fortune was to be submitted at best to probabilities) "that, out of their pride, and contempt of the king's weakness and want of power, the parliament would refuse to treat; which would be so unpopular a thing, that as his majesty would highly oblige his people by making the offer, so they would lose the hearts of them by rejecting it; which alone would raise an army for his majesty. That if they should embrace it, the king could not but be a gainer; for by the propositions which they should make to him, he would be able to state the quarrel so clearly, that it should be more demonstrable to the kingdom, than yet it was, that the war was, on his majesty's part, purely defensive; since he never had, and now would not deny any thing, which they could in reason or justice ask: that this very overture would necessarily produce some pause, and delay in their preparations, or motions of their armies; for some debate it must needs have; and during that time, men's minds would be in suspense; whereas his majesty should be so far from slackening his preparations, that he might be more vigorous in them, by hastening those levies, for which his commissions were out." For these reasons, and almost the concurrent desire and importunity of his council, the king was prevailed with to send the earls of Southampton and Dorset, sir John Colepepper, chancellor of his exchequer, and sir

William Udall, (whom his majesty gave leave under that pretence to intend the business of his own fortune,) to the two houses with this message, which was sent the third day after his standard was set up.

"We have, with unspeakable grief of heart, long beheld the distractions of this our kingdom. Our very soul is full of anguish, until we may find some remedy to prevent the miseries which are ready to overwhelm this whole nation by a civil war. And though all our endeavours, tending to the composing of those unhappy differences betwixt us and our two houses of parliament, (though pursued by us with all zeal and sincerity,) have been hitherto without that success we hoped for; yet such is our constant and earnest care to preserve the public peace, that we shall not be discouraged from using any expedient, which, by the blessing of the God of mercy, may lay a firm foundation of peace and happiness to all our good subjects. To this end, observing that many mistakes have arisen by the messages, petitions, and answers, betwixt us and our two houses of parliament, which happily may be prevented by some other way of treaty, wherein the matters in difference may be more clearly understood, and more freely transacted; we have thought fit to propound to you, that some fit persons may be by you enabled to treat with the like number to be authorized by us, in such a manner, and with such freedom of debate, as may best tend to that happy conclusion which all good men desire, the peace of the kingdom. Wherein, as we promise, in the word of a king, all safety and encouragement to such as shall be sent unto us, if you shall choose the place where we are, for the treaty, which we wholly leave to you, presuming the like care of the safety of those we shall employ, if you shall name another place; so we assure you, and all our good subjects, that, to the best of our understanding, nothing shall be therein wanting on our part, which may advance the true protestant religion, oppose popery and superstition, secure the law of the land, (upon which is built as well our just prerogative, as the propriety and liberty of the subject,) confirm all just power and privileges of parliament, and render us and our people truly happy by a good understanding betwixt us and our two houses of parliament. Bring with you as firm resolutions to do your duty; and let all our good people join with us in our prayers to Almighty God, for his blessing upon this work. If this proposition shall be rejected by you, we have done our duty so amply, that God will absolve us from the guilt of any of that blood which must be spilt; and what opinion soever other men may have of our power, we assure you nothing but our Christian and pious care to prevent the effusion of blood hath begot this motion; our provision of men, arms, and money, being such as may secure us from farther violence, till it please God to open the eyes of our people."

This message had the same reception his majesty believed it would have; and was indeed received with unheard of insolence and contempt. For the earl of Southampton, and sir John Colepepper, desiring to appear themselves before any notice should arrive of their coming, made such haste, that they were at Westminster in the morning shortly after the houses met. The earl of Southampton went into the house of peers, where he was scarce sat down in his place, when, with great passion, he was called upon to withdraw; albeit he told them he had a message to them from the king, and there could be no exception to his lordship's sitting in the house upon their own grounds; he having had leave from the house to attend his majesty. However he was compelled to withdraw; and then they sent the gentleman usher of the house to him, to require his message; which, his lordship said, he was by the king's command to deliver himself, and refused therefore to send it, except the lords made an order, that he should not [deliver it himself]; which they did; and thereupon he sent it to them; which they no sooner received, than they sent him word, "that he should, at his peril, immediately depart the town, and that they would take care that their answer to the message should be sent to him." And so the earl of Southampton departed the town, reposing himself in better company at the house of a noble person seven or eight miles off. Whilst the earl had this skirmish with the lords, sir John Colepepper attended the commons, forbearing to go into the house without leave, because there had been an order, (which is mentioned before,) that all the members, who were not present at such a day, should not presume to sit there, till they had paid a hundred pounds, and given the house satisfaction in the cause of their absence. But he sent word to the speaker, "that he had a message from the king to them, and that he desired to deliver it in his place in the house." After some debate, (for there remained yet some, who thought it as unreasonable as irregular to deny a member of the house, against whom there had not been the least public objection, and a privy-counsellor who had been in all times used there with great reverence, leave to deliver a message from the king in his own place as a member,) it was absolutely resolved, "that he should not sit in the house, but that he should deliver his message at the bar, and immediately withdraw;" which he did accordingly.

And then the two houses met at a conference, and read the king's message with great superciliousness; and within two days, with less difficulty and opposition than can be believed, agreed upon their answer. The king's messengers, in the mean time, being of that quality, not receiving ordinary civility from any members of either house; they who were very willing to have paid it, not daring for their own safety to come near them; and the others looking upon them as servants to a master whom they had, and meant farther to oppress. Private conferences they had with some of the principal governors; from whom they received no other advice, but that, if the king had any care of himself or his posterity, he should immediately come to London, throw himself into the arms of his parliament, and comply in whatsoever they proposed. The answer which they returned to the king was this:

The answer of the lords and commons to his majesty's message of the 25th of August, 1642.

"May it please your majesty:

"The lords and commons, in parliament assembled, having received your majesty's message of the 25th of August, do with much grief resent the dangerous and distracted state of this kingdom; which we have by all means endeavoured to prevent, both by our several advices and petitions to your majesty; which have been not only without success, but there hath followed that which no ill counsel in former times hath produced, or any age hath seen, namely, those several proclamations and declarations against both the houses of parliament, whereby their actions are declared treasonable, and their persons traitors. And thereupon your majesty hath set up your standard against them, whereby you have put the two houses of parliament, and, in them, this whole kingdom, out of your protection; so that until your majesty shall recall those proclamations and declarations, whereby the earl of Essex, and both houses of parliament, and their adherents, and assistants, and such as have obeyed and executed their commands and directions, according to their duties, are declared traitors or otherwise delinquents: and until the standard, set up in pursuance of the said proclamation, be taken down, your majesty hath put us into such a condition, that, whilst we so remain, we cannot, by the fundamental privileges of parliament, the public trust reposed in us, or with the general good and safety of this kingdom, give your majesty any other answer to this message."

When the king's messengers returned with this answer to Nottingham, all men saw to what they must trust; and the king believed, he should be no farther moved to make addresses to them. And yet all hopes of an army, or any ability to resist that violence, seemed so desperate, that he was privately advised by those, whom he trusted as much as any, and those whose affections were as entire to him as any men's, to give all other thoughts over, and instantly to make all imaginable haste to London, and to appear in the parliament house before they had any expectation of him. And they conceived there would be more likelihood for him to prevail that way, than by any army he was like to raise. And it must be solely imputed to his majesty's own magnanimity, that he took not that course. However he was contented to make so much farther use of their pride and passion, as to give them occasion, by another message, to publish more of it to the people; and therefore, within three days after the return of his messengers, he sent the lord Falkland, his principal secretary of state, with a reply to their answer in these words.

"We will not repeat, what means we have used to prevent the dangerous and distracted estate of the kingdom, nor how those means have been interpreted; because, being desirous to avoid the effusion of blood, we are willing to decline all memory of former bitterness, that might render our offer of a treaty less readily accepted. We never did declare, nor ever intended to declare, both our houses of parliament traitors, or set up our standard against them; and much less to put them and this kingdom out of our protection. We utterly profess against it before God, and the world; and, farther to remove all possible scruples, which may hinder the treaty so much desired by us, we hereby promise, so that a day be appointed by you for the revoking of your declarations against all persons as traitors, or otherwise, for assisting us; we shall, with all cheerfulness, upon the same day recall

"our proclamations and declarations, and take down our standard. In which treaty, we shall be ready to grant any thing, that shall be really for the good of our subjects: conjuring you to consider the bleeding condition of Ireland, and the dangerous condition of England, in as high a degree, as by these our offers we have declared ourself to do; and assuring you, that our chief desire, in this world, is to beget a good understanding and mutual confidence betwixt us and our two houses of parliament."

This message had no better effect or reception than the former; their principal officers being sent down since the last message to Northampton to put the army into a readiness to march. And now they required the earl of Essex himself to make haste thither, that no more time might be lost, sending by the lord Falkland, within two days, this answer to the king:

To the king's most excellent majesty;

The humble answer and petition of the lords and commons assembled in parliament, unto the king's last message.

"May it please your majesty:

"If we, the lords and commons in parliament assembled, should repeat all the ways we have taken, the endeavours we have used, and the expressions we have made unto your majesty, to prevent those distractions, and dangers, your majesty speaks of, we should too much enlarge this reply. Therefore, as we humbly, so shall we only let your majesty know, that we cannot recede from our former answer, for the reasons therein expressed. For that your majesty hath not taken down your standard, recalled your proclamations and declarations, whereby you have declared the actions of both houses of parliament to be treasonable, and their persons traitors; and you have published the same since your message of the 25th of August, by your late instructions sent to your commissioners of array; which standard being taken down, and the declarations, proclamations, and instructions recalled, if your majesty shall then, upon this our humble petition, leaving your forces, return unto your parliament, and receive their faithful advice, your majesty will find such expressions of our fidelities, and duties, as shall assure you, that your safety, honour, and greatness, can only be found in the affections of your people, and the sincere counsels of your parliament; whose constant and undiscouraged endeavours and consultations have passed through difficulties unheard of, only to secure your kingdoms from the violent mischiefs and dangers now ready to fall upon them, and every part of them; who deserve better of your majesty, and can never allow themselves (representing likewise the whole kingdom) to be balanced with those persons, whose desperate dispositions and counsels prevail still to interrupt all our endeavours for the relieving of bleeding Ireland; as we may fear our labours and vast expenses will be fruitless to that distressed kingdom. As your presence is thus humbly desired by us, so it is our hope your majesty will in your reason believe, there is no other way than this, to make your majesty's self happy, and your kingdom safe."

And lest this overture of a treaty might be a means to allay and compose the distempers of the people, and that the hope and expectation of peace might not dishearten their party, in their preparations and contributions to the war, the same day they sent their last answer to the king, they published this declaration to the kingdom:

"Whereas his majesty, in a message received the fifth of September, requires that the parliament would revoke their declarations against such persons as have assisted his majesty in this unnatural war against his kingdom; it is this day ordered, and declared by the lords and commons, that the arms, which they have been forced to take up, and shall be forced to take up, for the preservation of the parliament, religion, the laws and liberties of the kingdom, shall not be laid down, until his majesty shall withdraw his protection from such persons as have been voted by both houses to be delinquents, or that shall by both houses be voted to be delinquents, and shall leave them to the justice of the parliament to be proceeded with according to their demerits; to the end that both this and succeeding generations may take warning, with what danger they incur the like heinous crimes: and also to the end that those great charges and damages, wherewith all the commonwealth hath been burdened in the premises, since his majesty's departure from the parliament, may be borne by the delinquents, and other malignant and disaffected persons: and that all his majesty's good and well affected subjects, who by loan of monies, or otherwise at their charge, have assisted the commonwealth, or shall in like manner hereafter assist the commonwealth in time of extreme danger, may be repaid all sums of money lent by them for those purposes, and be satisfied their charges so sustained, out of the estates of the said delinquents, and of the malignant and disaffected party in this kingdom."

This declaration did the king no harm; for besides that it was evident to all men, that the king had done whatsoever was in his power, or could be expected from him, for the prevention of a civil war, all persons of honour and quality plainly discerned, that they had no safety but in the preservation of the regal power, since their estates were already disposed of by them who could declare whom they would delinquents, and who would infallibly declare all such who had not concurred with them. And the advantage the king received by those overtures, and the pride, forwardness, and perverseness of the rebels, is not imaginable; his levies of men, and all other preparations for the war, being incredibly advanced from the time of his first message. Prince Rupert lay still with the horse at Leicester; and though he, and some of the principal officers with him, were discontented to that degree, upon the king's first message and desire of a treaty, as like not only to destroy all hopes of raising an army, but to sacrifice those who were raised, that they were not without some thoughts, at least discourses, of offering violence to the principal advisers of it, he now found his numbers increased, and better resolved by it; and from Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, and Staffordshire, came very good recruits of foot; so that his cannon and munition being likewise come up from York, within twenty days his numbers began to look towards an army; and there was another air in all men's faces: yet Nottingham seemed not a good post for his majesty to stay longer at; and therefore, about the middle of September, the earl of Essex being then with his whole army at Northampton, his majesty marched from Nottingham to Derby; being not then resolved whither to bend his course, to Shrewsbury or Chester, not well knowing the temper of those towns, in both which the parliament party had been very active; but resolving to sit down near the borders of Wales, where the power of the parliament had been least prevalent, and where some regiments of foot were levying for his service. Before his leaving Nottingham, as a farewell to his hopes of a treaty, and to make the deeper sense and impression, in the hearts of the people, of those who had so pertinaciously rejected it, his majesty sent this message to the houses:

"Who have taken most ways, used most endeavours, and made most real expressions to prevent the present distractions and dangers, let all the world judge, as well by former passages, as by our two last messages, which have been so fruitless, that, though we have descended to desire and press it, not so much as a treaty can be obtained; unless we would denude ourself of all force to defend us from a visible strength marching against us; and admit those persons as traitors to us, who, according to their duty, their oaths of allegiance, and the law, have appeared in defence of us, their king and liege lord, (whom we are bound in conscience and honour to preserve), though we disclaimed all our proclamations, and declarations, and the erecting of our standard, as against our parliament. All we have now left in our power, is to express the deep sense we have of the public misery of this kingdom, in which is involved that of our distressed protestants of Ireland; and to apply ourself to our necessary defence, wherein we wholly rely upon the providence of God, the justice of our cause, and the affection of our good people; so far we are from putting them out of our protection. When you shall desire a treaty of us, we shall piously remember, whose blood is to be spilt in this quarrel, and cheerfully embrace it. And as no other reason induced us to leave our city of London, but that, with honour and safety we could not stay there; nor [to] raise any force, but for the necessary defence of our person and the law, against levies in opposition to both; so we shall suddenly and most willingly return to the one, and disband the other, as soon as those causes shall be removed. The God of heaven direct you, and in mercy divert those judgments, which hang over this nation; and so deal with us, and our posterity, as we desire the preservation and advancement of the true protestant religion; the law, and the liberty of the subject; the just rights of parliament, and the peace of the kingdom."

When the king came to Derby, he received clear information from the well affected party in Shrewsbury, that the town was at his devotion; and that the very rumour of his majesty's purpose of coming thither had driven away all those who were most inclined to sedition. And therefore, as well in regard of the strong and pleasant situation of it, (one side being defended by the Severn, the other having a secure passage into Wales, the con-finies of Montgomeryshire extending very near the town,) as for the correspondence with Worcester, of which city he hoped well, and that, by his being at Shrewsbury, he should be as well able to secure Chester, as by carrying his whole train so far north; besides that the other might give some apprehension of his going into Ireland, which had been formerly mentioned, his majesty resolved for that town; and, after one day's stay at Derby, by easy marches he went thither, drawing his whole small forces to a rendezvous by Wellington, a day's march short of Shrewsbury; and that being the first time that they were together, his majesty then caused his military orders for the discipline and government of the army to be read at the head of each regiment; and then, which is not fit ever to be forgotten, putting himself in the middle, where he might be best heard, not much unlike the emperor Trajan, who, when he made Sura great marshal of the empire, gave him a sword, saying, "Receive this sword of me; and if I command as I ought, employ it in my defence; if I do otherwise, draw it against me, and take my life from me," his majesty made this speech to his soldiers:

"Gentlemen, you have heard those orders read: it is your part, in your several places, to observe them exactly. The time cannot be long before we come to action, therefore you have the more reason to be careful: and I must tell you, I shall be very severe in the punishing of those, of what condition soever, who transgress these instructions. I cannot suspect your courage and resolution; your conscience and your loyalty hath brought you hither, to fight for your religion, your king, and the laws of the land. You shall meet with no enemies but traitors, most of them Brownists, anabaptists, and atheists; such who desire to destroy both church and state, and who have already condemned you to ruin for being loyal to us. That you may see what use I mean to make of your valour, if it please God to bless it with success, I have thought fit to publish my resolution to you in a protestation; which when you have heard me make, you will believe you cannot fight in a better quarrel; in which I promise to live and die with you."

The protestation his majesty was then pleased to make was in these words:

"I do promise in the presence of Almighty God, and as I hope for his blessing and protection, that I will, to the utmost of my power, defend and maintain the true reformed protestant religion, established in the church of England; and, by the grace of God, in the same will live and die."

"I desire to govern by the known laws of the land, and that the liberty and property of the subject may be by them preserved with the same care, as my own just rights. And if it please God, by his blessing upon this army, raised for my necessary defence, to preserve me from this rebellion, I do solemnly and faithfully promise, in the sight of God, to maintain the just privileges and freedom of parliament, and to govern by the known laws of the land to my utmost power; and particularly, to observe inviolably the laws consented to by me this parliament. In the mean while, if this time of war, and the great necessity and straits I am now driven to, beget any violation of those, I hope it shall be imputed

"by God and men to the authors of this war, and not to me; who have so earnestly laboured for the preservation of the peace of this kingdom.

"When I willingly fail in these particulars, I will expect no aid or relief from any man, or protection from heaven. But in this resolution, I hope for the cheerful assistance of all good men, and am confident of God's blessing."

This protestation, and the manner and solemnity of making it, gave not more life and encouragement to the little army, than it did comfort and satisfaction to the gentry and inhabitants of those parts; into whom the parliament had infused, that, if his majesty prevailed by force, he would, with the same power, abolish all those good laws, which had been made this parliament; so that they looked upon this protestation, as a more ample security for their enjoying the benefit of those acts, than the royal assent he had before given. And a more general and passionate expression of affections cannot be imagined, than he received by the people of those counties of Derby, Stafford, and Shropshire, as he passed; or a better reception, than he found at Shrewsbury; into which town he entered on Tuesday the 20th of September.

It will be, and was then, wondered at, that since the parliament had a full and well formed army, before the king had one full regiment, and the earl of Essex was himself come to Northampton, some days before his majesty went from Nottingham, his lordship neither disquieted the king whilst he stayed there, nor gave him any disturbance in his march to Shrewsbury; which if he had done, he might either have taken him prisoner, or so dispersed his small power, that it would never have been possible for him to have gotten an army together. But as the earl had not yet received his instructions, so they, upon whom he depended, avoided that expedition out of mere pride, and contempt of the king's forces; and upon a presumption, that it would not be possible for him to raise such a power, as would be able to look their army in the face; but that, when he had in vain tried all other ways, and those, who not only followed him upon their own charges, but supported those who were not able to bear their own, (for his army was maintained and paid by the nobility and gentry, who served likewise in their own persons,) were grown weary and unable longer to bear that burden, his majesty would be forced to put himself into their arms for protection and subsistence; and such a victory without blood had crowned all their designs. And if their army, which they pretended to raise only for their defence, and for the safety of the king's person, had been able to prevent the king's raising any; or if the king, in that melancholic conjuncture at Nottingham, had returned to Whitehall, he had justified all their proceedings, and could never after have refused to yield to whatsoever they proposed.

And it is most certain, that the common soldiers of the army were generally persuaded, that they should never be brought to fight; but that the king was in truth little better than imprisoned by evil counsellors, malignants, delinquents, and cavaliers, (the terms applied to his whole party,) and would gladly come to his parliament, if he could break from that company; which he would undoubtedly do, if their army came once to such a distance, that his majesty might make an escape to them. And in this kind of discourse they were so sottish, that they were persuaded, that those persons, of whose piety, honour, and integrity, they had received heretofore the greatest testimony, were now turned papists; and that the small army, and forces the king had, consisted of no other than papists. Inasmuch as truly those of the king's party, who promised themselves any support, but from the comfort of their own consciences, or relied upon any other means than from God Almighty, could hardly have made their expectations appear reasonable; for they were in truth possessed of the whole kingdom.

Portsmouth, the strongest and best fortified town then in the kingdom, was surrendered to them; colonel Goring, about the beginning of September, though he had seemed to be so long resolved, and prepared to expect a siege, and had been supplied with monies according to his own proposal, was brought so low, that he gave it up, only for liberty to transport himself beyond seas, and for his officers to repair to the king. And it were to be wished that there might be no more occasion to mention him hereafter, after this repeated treachery; and that his incomparable dexterity and sagacity had not prevailed so far over those, who had been so often deceived by him, as to make it absolutely necessary to speak at large of him, more than once, before this discourse comes to an end.

The marquis of Hertford, though he had so much discredited the earl of Bedford's soldiery, and disheartened his great army, that the earl of Bedford (after lying in the fields four or five nights within less than cannon shot of the castle and town, and after having refused to fight a duel with the marquis, to which he provoked him by a challenge) sent sir John Norcot, under pretence of a treaty and the godly care to avoid the effusion of Christian blood, in plain English to desire "that he might fairly and peaceably draw off his forces, and march away;" the which, how reasonable a request soever it was, the marquis refused; sending them word, "that as they came thither upon their own counsels, so they should get off as they could;" and at last they did draw off, and march above a dozen miles for repose; leaving the marquis, for some weeks, undisturbed at Sherborne: yet when he heard of the loss of Portsmouth, the relief whereof was his principal business, and so that those forces would probably be added to the earl of Bedford, and by their success give much courage to his bashful army, and that a good regiment of horse, which he expected, (for sir John Byron had sent him word from Oxford, that he would march towards him,) was retired to the king; and that the committees were now so busy in the several counties, that the people in all places declared for the parliament; and more particularly some strong and populous towns in Somersetshire; as Taunton, Wellington, and Dunstar-Castle; by reason whereof it would not be possible for him to increase his strength; he resolved to leave Sherborne, where his stay could no way advance the king's service, and to try all ways to get to his majesty. But when he came to Minhead, a port-town, from whence he made no doubt he should be able to transport himself and his company into Wales, he found the people both of the town and county so disaffected, that all the boats, of which there used always to be great store, by reason of the trade for cattle and corn with Wales, were industriously sent away, save only two; so that the earl of Bedford having taken new heart, and being within four miles with his army, his lordship, with his small cannon and few foot, with the lord Pawlet, lord Seymour, and some gentlemen of Somersetshire, transported himself into Glamorganshire; leaving sir Ralph Hopton, sir John Berkley, Mr. Digby, and some other officers with their horse, (consisting of about one hundred and twenty,) to march into Cornwall, in hope to find that county better prepared for their reception.

On the other hand, the earl of Bedford, thinking those few fugitives not worth his farther care, and that they would be easily apprehended by the committee of the militia, which was very powerful in Devon and Cornwall, contented himself with having driven away the marquis, and so expelled all hope of raising an army for the king in the west; and retired with his forces to the earl of Essex, as sir William Waller had done from Portsmouth; so that as it was not expected, that the forces about his majesty could be able to defend him against so puissant an army, so it was not imaginable that he could receive any addition of strength from any other parts. For wherever they found any person of quality inclined to the king, or but disinclined to them, they immediately seized upon his person, and sent him in great triumph to the parliament; who committed him to prison, with all circumstances of cruelty and inhumanity.

Thus they took prisoner the lord Mountague of Boughton, at his house in Northamptonshire, a person of great reverence, being above fourscore years of age, and of unblemished reputation, for declaring himself unsatisfied with their disobedient and undutiful proceedings against the king, and more expressly against their ordinance for the militia; and notwithstanding that he had a brother of the house of peers, the lord privy seal, and a nephew, the lord Kimbolton, who had as full a power in that council as any man, and a son in the house of commons very unlike his father; his lordship was committed to the Tower a close prisoner; and, though he was afterwards remitted to more air, he continued a prisoner to his death.

Thus they took prisoner in Oxfordshire the earl of Berkshire, and three or four principal gentlemen of that county; and committed them to the Tower, for no other reason but wishing well to the king; for they never appeared in the least action in his service. And thus they took prisoner the earl of Bath in Devonshire, who neither had, or ever meant to do the king the least service; but only out of the morosity of his own nature, had before, in the house, expressed himself not of their mind; and carried him, with many other gentlemen of Devon and Somerset, with a strong guard of horse, to London; where, after they had been exposed to the rudeness and reproach of the common people, who called them traitors and rebels to the parliament, and pursued them with such usage as they use to the most infamous malefactors, they were, without ever being examined, or charged with any particular crime, committed to several prisons; so that not only all the prisons about London were quickly filled with persons of honour, and great reputation for sobriety and integrity to their counties, but new prisons were made for their reception; and, which was a new and barbarous invention, very many persons of very good quality, both of the clergy and laity, were committed to prison on board the ships in the river of Thames; where they were kept under decks, and no friend suffered to come to them, by which many lost their lives. And that the loss of their liberty might not be all their punishment, it was the usual course, and very few escaped it, after any man was committed as a notorious malignant, (which was the brand,) that his estate and goods were seized or plundered by an order from the house of commons, or some committee, or the soldiers, who in their march took the goods of all catholics and eminent malignants, as lawful prize; or by the fury and license of the common people, who were in all places grown to that barbarity and rage against the nobility and gentry, (under the style of cavaliers,) that it was not safe for any to live at their houses, who were taken notice of as no votaries to the parliament.

So the common people (no doubt by the advice of their superiors) in Essex on a sudden beset the house of sir John Lucas, one of the best gentlemen of that county, and of the most eminent affection to the king, being a gentleman of the privy chamber to the prince of Wales; and, upon pretence that he was going to the king, possessed themselves of all his horses and arms, seized upon his person, and used him with all possible indignities, not without some threats to murder him: and when the mayor of Colchester, whither he was brought, with more humanity than the rest, offered to keep him prisoner in his own house, till the pleasure of the parliament should be farther known, they compelled him, or he was willing to be compelled, to send him to the common gaol; where he remained, glad of that security, till the house of commons removed him to another prison, (without ever charging him with any crime,) having sent all his horses to the earl of Essex, to be used in the service of that army.

At the same time the same rabble entered the house of the countess of Rivers, near Colchester; for no other ground, than that she was a papist; and in few hours dis furnished it of all the goods, which had been many years with great curiosity providing, and were not of less value than forty thousand pounds sterling; the countess herself hardly escaping, after great insolence had been used to her person: and she could never receive any reparation from the parliament; so that these and many other instances of the same kind in London and the parts adjacent, gave sufficient evidence to all men how little else they were to keep, who meant to preserve their allegiance and integrity in the full vigour.

I must not forget, though it cannot be remembered without much horror, that this strange wild-fire among the people was not so much and so furiously kindled by the breath of the parliament, as of the clergy, who both administered fuel, and blowed the coals in the houses too. These men having crept into, and at last driven all learned and orthodox men from, the pulpits, had, as is before remembered, from the beginning of this parliament, under the notion of reformation and extirpating of popery, infused seditious inclinations into the hearts of men against the present government of the church, with many libellous invectives against the state too. But since the raising an army, and rejecting the king's last overture of a treaty, they contained themselves within no bounds; and as freely and without control inveighed against the person of the king, as they had before against the worst malignant; profanely and blasphemously applying whatsoever had been spoken and declared by God himself, or the prophets, against the most wicked and impious kings, to incense and stir up the people against their most gracious sovereign.

There are monuments enough in the seditious sermons at that time printed, and in the memories of men, of others not printed, of such wresting and perverting of scripture to the odious purposes of the preacher, that pious men will not look over without trembling. One takes his text out of Moses's words in the 32d chapter of Exodus, and the 20th verse; Consecrate yourselves to-day to the Lord, even every man upon his son, and upon his brother, that he may bestow upon you a blessing this day: and from thence incites his auditory to the utmost prosecution of those, under what relation soever of blood, neighbourhood, dependence, who concurred not in the reformation proposed by the parliament. Another makes as bold with David's words, in the 1st Chron. chap. xxii. verse 16. Arise therefore, and be doing: and from thence assures them, it was not enough to wish well to the parliament; if they brought not their purse, as well as their prayers, and their hands, as well as their hearts, to the assistance of it, the duty in the text was not performed. There [were] more than Mr. Marshall, who from the 23d verse of the 5th chapter of Judges, Curse ye Meroz, said he angel of the Lord; curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof, because they came not to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty: presumed to inveigh against, and in plain terms to pronounce God's own curse against all those, who came not, with their utmost power and strength, to destroy and root out all the malignants, who in any degree opposed the parliament.

There was one, who from the 48th chapter of the prophet Jeremiah, and the 10th verse, Cursed be he that keepeth back his sword from blood, reproved those who gave any quarter to the king's soldiers. And another out of the 5th verse of the 25th chapter of Proverbs, Take away the wicked from before the king, and his throne shall be established in righteousness, made it no less a case of conscience by force to remove the evil counsellors from the king, (with bold intimation what might be done to the king himself, if he would not suffer them to be removed,) than to perform any Christian duty that is enjoined. It would fill a volume to insert all the impious madness of this kind, so that the complaint of the prophet Ezekiel might most truly and seasonably have been applied; There is a conspiracy of her prophets in the midst thereof, like a roaring lion ravening the prey; they have devoured souls; they have taken the treasure and precious things; they have made her many widows in the midst thereof. Ezek. xxii. 25.

It was the complaint of Erasmus of the clergy in his time, that when princes were inclinable to wars, alius e sacro suggesto promittit omnium admissorum condonationem, alius promittit certam victoriam, prophetarum voces ad rem impiam detorquens. Tam bellaces conciones audivimus, says he. And indeed no good Christian can, without horror, think of those ministers of the church, who, by their function being messengers of peace, were the only trumpets of war, and incendiaries towards rebellion. How much more Christian was that Athenian nun in Plutarch, and how shall she rise up in judgment against those men, who, when Alcibiades was condemned by the public justice of the state, and a decree made that all the religious priests and women should ban and curse him, stoutly refused to perform that office; answering, "that she was "professed religious, to pray and to bless, not to "curse and to ban." And if the person and the place can improve and aggravate the offence, (as without doubt it doth, both before God and man,) methinks the preaching treason and rebellion out of the pulpits should be worse than the advancing it in the market, as much as poisoning a man at the communion would be worse than murdering him at a tavern. And it may be, in that catalogue of sins, which the zeal of some men hath thought to be the sin against the Holy Ghost, there may not any one be more reasonably thought to be such, than a minister of Christ's turning rebel against his prince, (which is a most notorious apostasy against his order,) and his preaching rebellion to the people, as the doctrine of Christ; which, adding blasphemy and pertinacy to his apostasy, hath all the marks by which good men are taught to avoid that sin against the Holy Ghost.

Within three or four days after the king's remove from Nottingham, the earl of Essex, with his whole army, removed from Northampton, and marched towards Worcester; of which his majesty had no sooner intelligence, than he sent prince Rupert, with the greatest part of the horse, on the other side of the Severn, towards that city; as well to observe the motion of the enemy, as to give all assistance to that place, which had declared good affections to him; at least to countenance and secure the retreat of those gentlemen, who were there raising forces for the king; but especially to join with sir John Byron, whom his majesty had sent, in the end of August, to Oxford, to convey some money, which had been secretly brought from London thither, to his majesty. And he, after some small disasters in his march, by the insurrection of the country people, who were encouraged by the agents for the parliament, and seconded by the officers of the militia, came safe with his charge to Worcester; where he had been very few hours, when a strong party of horse and dragoons, being sent by the earl of Essex, under the command of Nathaniel Fiennes, son to the lord Say, came to surprise the town; which was open enough to have been entered in many places, though in some it had an old decayed wall; and, at the most usual and frequented entrances into the city, weak and rotten gates to be shut, but without either lock or bolt.

Yet this doughty commander, coming early in the morning, when the small guard which had watched, conceiving all to be secure, were gone to rest, and being within musket shot of the gate before he was discovered, finding that weak door shut, or rather closed against him, and not that quick appearance of a party within the town, as he promised himself, without doing any harm, retired in great disorder, and with so much haste, that the wearied horse, sent out presently to attend him, could not overtake any of his train; so that when prince Rupert came thither, they did not conceive any considerable party of the enemy to be near. However his highness resolved to retire from thence, as soon as he should receive perfect intelligence of the motion of the enemy, or where he certainly was, when on the sudden, being reposing himself on the ground with prince Maurice his brother, the lord Digby, and the principal officers, in the field before the town, some of his wearied troops (for they had had a long march) being by, but the rest and most of the officers being in the town, he espied a fair body of horse, consisting of near five hundred, marching in very good order up a lane within musket shot of him. In this confusion, they had scarce time to get upon their horses, and none to consult of what was to be done, or to put themselves into their several places of command. And, it may be, it was well they had not; for if all those officers had been in the heads of their several troops, it is not impossible it might have been worse. But the prince instantly declaring, "that he would charge;" his brother, the lord Digby, commissary general Wilmot, sir John Byron, sir Lewis Dives, and all those officers and gentlemen, whose troops were not present or ready, put themselves next the prince; the other wearied troops coming in order after them.

And in this manner the prince charged them, as soon as they came out of the lane; and being seconded by this handful of good men, though the rebels being gallantly led by colonel Sandys, (a gentleman of Kent, and the son of a worthy father,) and completely armed both for offence and defence, stood well; yet in a short time, many of their best men being killed, and colonel Sandys himself falling with his hurts, the whole body was routed, fled, and was pursued by the conquerors for the space of above a mile. The number of the slain were not many, not above forty or fifty, and those most officers; for their arms were so good, that in the charge they were not to be easily killed, and in the chase the goodness of their horse made it impossible. Colonel Sandys, who died shortly after of his wounds, captain Wingate, who was the more known, by being a member of the house of commons, and taken notice of for having in that charge behaved himself stoutly, and two or three Scottish officers, were taken prisoners. Of the king's party none of name was lost: commissary general Wilmot hurt with a sword in the side, and sir Lewis Dives in the shoulder, and two or three other officers of inferior note; none miscarrying of their wounds, which was the more strange for that, by reason they expected not an encounter, there was not, on the prince's side, a piece of armour worn that day, and but few pistols; so that most of the hurt that was done was by the sword. Six or seven cornets [of the enemy's] were taken, and many good horses, and some arms; for they who run away made themselves as light as they could.

This rencounter proved of unspeakable advantage and benefit to the king. For it being the first action his horse had been brought to, and that party of the enemy being the most picked and choice men, it gave his troops great courage, and rendered the name of prince Rupert very terrible, and exceedingly appalled the adversary; insomuch as they had not, in a long time after, any confidence in their horse, and their very numbers were
